Oliver Colston, strong in the confidence of his skill in woodcraft, or urged forward by some great necessity that justified the risk, entered the cane-brake as the sun came down within two hours of the horizon. At first he moved slowly, and felt every step of his way. When a stray vine presented itself across his breast, as if to forbid his passage, he carefully cut it in two, keeping his horse's head all the time in the original direction. The openings in the cane-brake, and the small paths that would have seemed tempting to an inexperienced traveller, were disregarded by him; but he pushed right onward, with his eye upon the sun. This, for the first half mile, was not so difficult. An occasional glimpse of that luminary could be got, and his course directed accordingly. But as he penetrated deeper and deeper, his solar guide became more and more obscure. It was with much difficulty that he caught it now at all; and as he pushed aside the leafy barrier of a clump, more dense than usual, he lost it altogether, and could not regain it. For a mile or more he continued, by ranging along the few trunks that came in his way, to preserve the direction—for he had not greatly overrated his own skill in forest-craft; but then a large bush struck his face, his horse turned suddenly aside, to avoid a deep gully that was before him, and henceforth it was all random work. Hither and thither he wandered, at first only partly conscious of his error, but as his horse came back again and again to the same gully, and he saw that the bewildered brute, as much at fault as himself, was really travelling in a circle, the full conviction flashed over his mind that he had got himself inextricably lost in the cane-brake.

Oh, how he cursed his folly in leaving the beaten path. With what frantic gestures he beat his forehead! How strangely it sounded, his blasphemy of the great name of God, there in the awful solitude!

Night came swiftly on, an hour sooner than it should have done by the watch, and the traveller was well nigh deranged.

Pompey had now taken control of his own movements, and strove nobly to make headway; now snorting upon the edge of some deep hole—now plunging into a copse so dense that a wounded bear could not have turned round in it—now avoiding a festoon of the sharp green brier—now galloping cheerfully forward, as some thin spot or transient path came under his notice. But still, whether slow or swift, thoughtful or dull, his best efforts and instinct only brought him back again to that enchanted spot.

All that night, then, the seducer, fully shaken now, with his head bare, and his clothes nearly stripped from his limbs, lay crouched down to his saddle-bow, and trusted to the sagacity of the horse. It was such a night of horrors as he had never realised before.

Once he saw a pair of flaming eyes fixed upon him, from the lower limbs of an oak, and heard such a wail as the mother makes over her dead babe. Once a tall, black object rose up before him, and held out his shaggy arms, as if to welcome him to the penetralia of the brake. Large white owls, that seemed to feel safe wherever darkness was, flitted at times near his face—so near that he could have struck them if he had had courage; and when, by very low swoops, they came to understand that the intruder was one of those murderous beings which their travelled comrades had described to them, they flew into the higher trees, and by loud and scornful hoots gave him a forest defiance.

Holy day came at last, bringing release from these annoyances. Panthers, bears, and owls retired to their hiding-places. But neither day, nor the glimpse of the sun which he caught by climbing a tree, nor all his forest skill, could extricate him from the brake.

Still Pompey pushed stoutly forward, and still he but described a larger circle—for, as if by fascination, the unhappy rider was brought back, against his will, against reason, instinct, and knowledge, to the same spot where he had paused an hour, or two hours, or three hours before. And so the day passed by, leaving the noble horse almost exhausted by his labour, and his rider nigh fainting for water, food, and rest.

Gabriel and Tom sat at the door of their little hut, and ate heartily of their store. The remains of a noble turkey gave token of what their previous meal had been. A large fish was spread before them, and several others hung in the smoke above—and it was not hard to see that the runaways were doing well. Both of them, however, were greatly altered in appearance during the four weeks they had spent upon the island. In the midst of all their advantages, their freedom, and their well-filled larder, they could not but feel at times some loneliness. They talked but little to each other. At first Tom had spent much time in singing the religious hymns common to his class—but now he seemed to have no taste for them. Sleep—that great indulgence to the labouring black—began to pall upon their appetites. Their food was not so sweet as at first—for they needed their accustomed exercise to make it palatable. The wild kind of life they were leading was fast impressing their faces with the peculiar look so difficult to describe, which may be equally observed upon a runaway slave or an uncivilised Indian. It is the shadow of the wild woods! In short, comfortable as they seemed to be, it would have taken a good eye to recognise in these smoke-begrimed, forest-marked negroes, the old ostler and his son-in-law, to whom the reader was introduced a month back.

After eating their fill, they threw themselves carelessly back upon the side of the hut, and seemed lost in thought.

Suddenly Tom, who had quick ears, sprang up, and declared that he heard a man's voice!

It is impossible. It is nothing but a panther. Nobody can get through that bottom, unless he knows the secret of it. But yet, there it is again. It is surely a man's voice, a man lost in the cane-brake!

Gabriel raised himself erect, and listened.

"It is a man's voice," he says. "It is no doubt a lost man, and unless somebody relieves him, he will soon starve."

And with this ominous expression on his lips, the old ostler quietly resumes his seat, and falls off into another doze.

So plain a token of his intention is not lost upon Tom, but he will not take the matter so coolly.

Tom is a member of the church. He has claimed and believed himself for several years to possess an interest in religion. It is true, he ran away, and is determined to remain all his life away from servitude, if he can—but this has nothing to do with his religion.

He will not bear a fellow-creature to perish within hail, when food is so plenty; he declares he will not. He wakes up the old man, and tells him so.

After a vain effort to dissuade him from relieving the wanderer, on the plea that he may be a spy, and, at all events, will put their pursuers on the track to capture them, he consents to accompany him, if only to keep him from betraying their hiding-place.

They walk softly to the edge of the island, and there they can distinctly hear the tramping of a horse on the opposite shore. He has found water, and it seems to be no small relief to him.

Presently the rider gives another call, but feeble, and indicative of great exhaustion.

Gabriel put his hand hastily on Tom's mouth and whispered, while every joint in his body trembled as with an ague:

"It's Misty Colston, sure's there's a God! you'll see it!"

Back they hasten to the fire again, and consult upon what they shall do.

ANTHROPOMY OF THE MAGNIFYING GLASS.—It is a curious circumstance that a bona fide magnifying glass, identified by Sir David Brewster as decidedly and designedly such, was recently found by Mr. Layard in one of the temples of Nineveh. Mr. Layard says that many of the cuneiform inscriptions and other smaller sculptures are so delicately cut and so minute, as to be "almost unintelligible without a magnifying glass."

WORKING MEN.—The expression working-class, or working men, must mean either those men who physically work without thinking—in which case it will not be very acceptable to those who arrogate it, and a wind or water-mill, working day and night, would be the beau-ideal of a working man—or it must mean men who work and think. But, if this is meant, who is not a working man, and who is? Is the physician who follows his vocation at any hour of the day, the lawyer who sits up late at night, the scholar who sacrifices his health to his science, a conscientious editor, whose work never rests—are all these, who rise much earlier and go to bed much later than those who call themselves working men, par excellence, not working men? Is a Humboldt, who braves, in the pursuit of his noble and chivalrous career, fever, beasts of prey, and insupportable insects, under a thousand privations—is a Champollion, who exposes himself to the burning sun of Egypt, to learn the lesson of the past—is a Parry, who dares the ices of the pole—a Davy, a Herschel, who enjoy no rest so regular, no health so sound, as that of any farmer,—are not all these hard-working men? The division is entirely artificial and untenable; and, therefore, if acted upon, highly mischievous. It is to be regretted, then, that so fictitious a thing is made, not unfrequently, a ground of political division, as though the interests of those who apply their mind to the changing and moulding of materials were separated from those who consume their productions, or assist them essentially in discovering the best way of mastering the material.

[MR. DARGAN.]

MR. DARGAN, THE MUNIFICENT PROMOTER OF THE GREAT DUBLIN EXHIBITION.

THE great men of the present day are undoubtedly the millionaires. And why not? Have we not had an abundance of poets, warriors, and priests for centuries? Have we not been crammed with greatness in every conceivable form, but the one capable of being productive, and of course useful? Those who wisely discriminate, we are certain, will answer affirmatively; therefore, as this is an age which only fools and children would attempt to stigmatise as material, let us accept the heroes who have brought about its development as among the wisest of their generation.

Their successes are almost the only ones that distinguish the past forty years. While law, statesmanship, and even literature, have only progressed slowly, these men have devoted themselves to pursuits which have raised a condition unexampled for vigour, health, variety, and economical prosperity. In short, to the merchants, manufacturers and tradesmen of England, must be attributed the largest share of the work of having made the empire so great and grand in its material aspects. Emphatically, they have made the country what it is.

Mr. Dargan's father was a very respectable, substantial farmer, in the county Carlow. The property on which he was born was recently sold under the Incumbered Estates Court, when he became the purchaser. He received a sound practical education—the fruits of which are observable in his career through life. He is a rapid and accurate calculator; and his business letters reflect the clearness, decision, and practical character of his mind. He was early distinguished for the persevering energy of his disposition, which, combined with a remarkable quickness of comprehension, a utilitarian good sense, and an inflexible integrity, has enabled him to become one of the professional celebrities of the day—the accumulator of a vast fortune, and, at the same time, the benefactor of his country.

Having completed his education, he spent some time in a surveyor's office; and while yet a very young man, became a candidate for a situation under the grand jury of his native county. At that time, among the many friends who interested themselves in his advancement, on his father's account as well as his own, we may mention the late Lord Congleton, then Sir Henry Parnell, and Mr. Alexander, of Milford. He was, however, disappointed, and immediately afterwards left the country, and obtained employment under the celebrated Telford, who was then constructing the great Holyhead Road. He studied the science of construction under that eminent master, and rapidly rose in his profession. It was while thus engaged, that he became acquainted with Sir John McNeill, who was then Telford's favourite pupil; and the friendship thus early formed has continued uninterrupted.

On the completion of the Holyhead Road, Mr. Dargan returned to Ireland, and became a contractor on his own account. His first works were some sea embankments on the Shannon, after which he made the branch of the Grand Canal from Phillipstown to Kilbeggan.

The character he had obtained by these works, joined, we believe, with the recommendation of Telford, who had the highest opinion of his ability, procured him the contract for the Howth Road, which was the next work he undertook. How well he justified the good opinion of his eminent master, is evidenced by his works. The Howth Road to this day remains an unrivalled work, and attests, in a superior manner, the consummate skill and capacity of its constructor.

The opening of the railway from Liverpool to Manchester, in September, 1830, and the immense traffic it immediately commanded, excited the attention of certain parties, and the feasibility of a line between Dublin and Kingstown was earnestly discussed in 1831. Mr. Vignolles, the engineer, was consulted, and, after full consideration, the company was formed, and an Act of Parliament obtained. Mr. Peirce Mahony, as the solicitor, and Mr. James Pim, jun., as the managing director, were the parties principally concerned in projecting and maturing the company. In due course the contract was advertised, and several tenders were received; but Mr. Dargan's was the lowest, and was accepted. The high reputation he had already acquired by his works, inspired the directors with perfect confidence in his skill and ability to complete successfully what was at that time a work novel in Ireland, and we may say in England, too. Nor were they disappointed. Mr. Dargan commenced operations in 1833, and in December, 1834, had the line completed, and opened for public traffic.

His next work of moment was the Ulster Canal, an artificial navigation of forty-eight miles in length, by which Lough Neagh is connected with the waters of the Upper Erne. Another work of great utility, which added largely to his reputation as a scientific constructor, was the reservoir on the Upper Bann. It was the first—indeed the only undertaking of the kind in this country, and has proved of incalculable advantage to the linen bleachers and mill-owners along that important river.

At this time Mr. Dargan's character was firmly established, as a most conscientious and successful contractor. Consequently, when railway enterprise began to engage public attention, he naturally became identified with its progress and development, and his name is now associated with almost every railway in Ireland.

But Mr. Dargan has not confined his enterprise to the north. His name will be held even in greater reverence for what he has done to promote agricultural industry in the south of Ireland. When constructing the extension of the Great Southern and Western Railway to Cork, he had many opportunities of witnessing the lamentably backward state of agriculture. He had taken a warm interest in the establishment of the Belfast Flax Society; and, well aware of the highly profitable character of flax as a crop, under judicious management, and how largely it contributed to the prosperity of the farming interest in Ulster, he resolved to do all in his power to extend the cultivation of that crop in the south. Acting on the approved maxim, that teaching by example is much more efficacious than by precept, he became the proprietor of a large farm, containing some 3200 statute acres, at Kildinan, in the county of Cork, and at once commenced a scientific course of farming. It is needless to say what a blessing his presence has proved in the neighbourhood. He has the satisfaction of seeing agricultural improvement extending, slowly to be sure, but still making gratifying progress. He actively encourages the growth of flax, and for that purpose has erected a large flax-mill in the vicinity of Rathcormac. He has also another farm, of some 2000 statute acres, near Moate, in the county Westmeath. In these farms he naturally feels a laudable pride, and, with the energy peculiar to his character, finds time to bestow upon them a vigilant superintendence.

While promoting the Cork Exhibition of last summer, the possibility of holding a successful exhibition in Dublin, to be international in its character, and worthy of Ireland, became impressed upon Mr. Dargan's mind. Once satisfied upon this point, he not only volunteered to find the money, but to construct the building; and his advances, at first limited to £20,000, have at length risen to a sum little short of £80,000. There is every reason to hope that this immense outlay will be covered by the receipts; but the liberality and disinterestedness of Mr. Dargan's conduct are not the less deserving of praise.

He has done for Ireland what not one of her political patriots could ever approach, much less accomplish. He has given her an idea which she has seized hold of with avidity—an idea of peace, an idea inciting to industry, to honourable emulation, and to the cultivation of those qualities in the national mind, which, by their judicious employment, have enabled Mr. Dargan to rise from a humble to a distinguished position in society, and to become to his countrymen one of the best patriots and benefactors they ever had. He is a practical as well as talented Irishman; and when we say that we think, without intending the slightest invidiousness, that we have presented to us the character of a man who, believing that

To know
That which before us lies in daily life
Is the prime of wisdom, is quite prepared and fully able to take the lead in the great work of his country's regeneration.

[GENERAL VIEW OF ROME.]

R O M E.

WE this week present our readers with an engraved view of Rome—Eternal Rome, as it has been styled by those who would set up human grandeur as a deity, and fall down before it in abject worship.

But Rome, stripped of all false pretences, is ineffaceably stamped on the brow of Time, as the mightiest creation of man—mighty in its deeds, mighty in its traditions, mighty in that inventive and adaptive genius, which can grasp the keys of destiny, and not only make an empire, but lay deep the foundations of many empires. Rome, as a great fact, is indeed eternal—eternal in its name, eternal in its renown; for no generation can think of it but as

The city, that, by temperance, fortitude,
And love of glory, towered above the clouds;
Then fell—but, falling, kept the highest seat;
And in her loneliness, her pomp of woe,
Where now she dwells, withdrawn into the wild,
Still o'er the mind maintains, from age to age,
Her empire undiminished.

How grand are the lessons which Rome has taught the world! We are first presented to her as a commonwealth—a republic of fabulous origin—then as a monarchy—a state which one of her own historians has described as “the infancy of Rome—for it is certain that under her kings, she was hardly able to find her own legs, and at the best had but a very feeble motion.” The story of Tarquin and Lucretia fitly ends this imbecile period, and then we are introduced to the Consulate, and interminable wars with the Gauls, the Greeks, and the Carthaginians. Here the reign of Rome as an empire commenced, and we find her rapidly extending her conquests over Europe, Asia, and Africa. Then we have the triumvirate—a tripartite division of the known globe—and the fatal quarrel that led to the murder of Pompey, and the establishment of Caesar as “Father of his country,” and “perpetual dictator.” His assassination paved the way for the empire, and the records of the reigns of the Cæsars read like a brilliant romance. They teem with wonders, and we behold crime in purple, vice lifting up its head, like a forked serpent, far above the high wall that surrounds the Eden which never wholly leaves the earth. Imperial Rome! Imperial Horror! strangled by Odoacer, but, like the grim phantom at the gates of Pandemonium, irate in death. Rome survived, although the Goths watered their horses in the Tiber, and the avalanche of barbarians that descended on the ancient city overwhelmed the palace, the Forum, and the cottage alike.

But the fall of Rome was natural and inevitable. It was one of those revolutions in the world, which its moral diseases from time to time render necessary. It was a thunder-storm that cleared the atmosphere of sultry and pestilential vapours. The continued exactions of property had broken the spring of industry—the absence of honourable motive had palsied all the exertions of the people: they ceased to struggle when their utmost efforts brought no alleviation to their misery—when wretchedness was the only barrier they could oppose to the never-ceasing claims of their masters. The great and the rich fell from their height, when oppression had undermined the supports of their wealth and power—when a broken-hearted people, relaxing from their exertions, no longer supplied the materials for greatness.

But the fall was only political—the people, the laws, the architecture remained. Some two or three hundred thousand barbarians might destroy a dynasty, but not a people. Rome survived to bring forth a new life—to initiate a new reign on earth. The extinguishment of the Cæsars but heralded the coming of the Pontiffs. The decapitation of that prince of courage, that invincible logician, St. Paul, by the mad Nero, gave Rome a new era—a third life. Emigration had destroyed old Rome; migration brought a heart, and a brain, and a new doctrine—and a Rome was erected on the ruins of the past, to startle and astonish the universe.

The modern Rome was power in its highest embodiment. Through the agency of a bright particular manifestation, it made tributary all the nations of the earth; and when a new world was revealed to the vision of western Europe, modern Rome dared to wave the magician's wand, and declare who should have earthly omnipotence in the lands into which true sons of the church carried the cross of salvation in one hand, and the thirsty sword of destruction in the other. Well might a great living poet say of Pope's “Early and Late:”

Those ancient men, what were they, who achieved
A sway beyond the greatest conquerors;
Setting their feet upon the neck of kings,
And, through the world subduing, chaining down
The true, immortal spirit? Were they not Mighty magicians? Theirs a wondrous spell,
Where true and false were with infernal art
Close interwoven—where together met
Blessings and curses, threats and promises,
And with the terrors of futurity
Mingled whate'er enchants and fascinates—
Music and painting, sculpture, rhetoric,
And dazzling light and darkness visible,
And architectural pomp, such as none else.
What in his day the Syracusan sought,
Another world to plant his engines on,
They had—and having it, like gods, not men,
Moved this world at their pleasure.

So that Rome has lived thrice, and would live over again; but fate seems to have doomed her for a period to be a huge monument of the past—a great book full of lessons, and mysteries, and solemn warnings. The Pope, that would rule mankind from his palace-chambers, is but a speck in the Roman sky—his voice is drowned in the thunder that rolls from Britain, and comes every now and then with a roar from the great land of the west; but history has imperishably embalmed Rome—it must ever have a place in the human firmament. The reminiscences of

The Appian, once an avenue
Of monuments most glorious, are imperishable, although

In many a heap the ground
Heaves, as if ruin in a frantic mood
Had done his utmost. Here and there appears,
As left to show his handiwork—not ours—
An idle column, a half-buried arch,
A wall of some great temple. It was once,
And long the centre of their universe—
The Forum—whence a mandate, eagle-winged,
Went to the ends of the earth. Let us descend
Slowly. At every step much may be lost.
The very dust we tread stirs as if with life,
And not a breath but from the ground sends up
Something of human grandeur.

There is a city and a population, but they that issue forth

Wander like strangers who had built among
The mighty ruins—silent, spiritless;
And on the road where once we might have met
Caesar and Cato, and men more than kings,
We meet, none else, the pilgrim and the beggar.

The Campagna is deserted by all, save the tombs and memories of the past. We note the gigantic ruins scattered about, and as the eye falls on the remains of the Coliseum—one of those huge circi in which, on Roman holidays, Romans were seen in one of their lowest aspects—we think of the gladiators—

Spared not to die, a public spectacle,
In combat with each other, and required
To fall with grace and dignity—to sink,
While life is gushing, and the plaudits ring
Faint and yet fainter, on the falling ear,
As models for the sculptor.

From this amphitheatre—so studded with terrible memories, and which is the most conspicuous object in the foreground of our engraving—the eye turns willingly to the pillars of the Emperors Trajan and Antoninus. The former was erected in the centre of Trajan's Forum, and was composed of twenty-four large pieces of marble, so ingeniously cemented as to appear one entire block. The height was one hundred and forty-four feet, and it is ascended, on the inside, by one hundred and eighty-five winding stairs. There are forty windows for the admission of light. The whole pillar is incrustured with marble, on which was carved a history of all the noble actions of the emperor, together with representations of forts, bridges, shields, helmets, swords, spears, daggers, soldiers, and all the materials and appliances of war. And then we are told that the noblest ornament of this pillar was the statue of Trajan on the top, no less than twenty feet high. He was represented in a coat of armour proper to the general, holding in his left hand a sceptre, in his right a hollow globe of gold, in which his own ashes were deposited after his death.

The column of Antoninus was raised in imitation of this, and was higher—being 176 feet high. On the top was a colossal figure of the emperor. Both these columns are still standing in Rome; but Pope Sixtus the First pulled down the emperors, and set up in their places statues of St. Peter and St. Paul. The former took Trajan's place; the latter Antoninus's. Not a bad transformation: the Roman emperors had little to commend them to the admiration of posterity.

Their boasted patronage of literature and the arts brought no improvement in the condition of their subjects. The arts and sciences owe to their protégés no discoveries: they were merely poets and linguists. Science actually slumbered under the Roman rule: scarcely an invention can be traced to the genius of the Imperial City. And little praise is due to her political system; for it always left her a prey to bad government. Hardly a good prince can be named in the long catalogue of her sovereigns. The Antonines might have had a respectable position in an academy; but what was the world the better for their power? Lost in the idle and endless discussions of the followers of Aristotle, neither they nor their subjects gave any heed to the calls of useful knowledge. They busied themselves with words. We cannot believe that they were smitten by a love of philosophy, who listened to long, prosy lectures on metaphysics during a dinner, for which they had prepared themselves by a vomit. This passion for good eating they had, indeed, in common with the other great luminaries of antiquity. The most eminent philosophers of Greece were all diners out by profession. Both nations were prone to excess. Their philosophy and love of literature brought no check to their vices.

The arches—almost all of them entirely of marble—were designed to reward and commemorate noble enterprises; but the antiquities of Rome—especially those that relate to the emperors—are blackened with crimes. And if we direct our attention to modern Rome, what do we behold? A people enslaved—a government tottering to ruin—and a French army vainly attempting to give vitality to a sacerdotal oligarchy that has long served out its appointed time of utility. The condition of Rome, like the strata below the foundations of the city, is volcanic. The unseen fire slumbers, but the day is hastening when, in one grand eruption, the dominion of the successors of St. Peter will be swept away, leaving behind, as monuments of its glory, those twin giants, the Vatican and the cathedral. The latter fills us with awe, and as we gaze at it, we think of the pontiffs as they were—and, in one wide, generous sweep of the imagination, we subscribe to the opinion that the greatness of the great of this extraordinary order of men dwarfs and crushes the vices of the meaner ones; and we cheerfully confess that, if in the days of Hildebrand there was in reality much less of talent and virtue than in our day, they who possessed them were much more certain of obtaining advancement. The Church of Rome, in the full blaze of its power, cherished talent. It only ignored the education of the laity when it became weak, and feared the piercing eye of scrutiny. Knowledge lifted the veil of twelve centuries, and the Roman pontiffs necessarily became intolerant and cruel. The discovery of a new world destroyed the prestige of the papal traditions. They were proved to be incomplete, and when once speculation commenced, the authority of the Church was shaken to its centre. St. Peter, on Trajan's column, smiles grimly on his neighbour St. Paul; but the latter being more of a Protestant—being more a representative of progress, even in spiritual matters—may be supposed to hail the change with the satisfaction natural to more enlarged and better cultivated mental powers. But we must accept it as a conclusion, that from the hour in which the unity of the papal power was destroyed, its decline commenced. Having performed its appointed duty in the realm of religion and morals, its decay was natural and inevitable. Change set her seal on Christian forms, and a new dispensation—or rather a modification of the original one—was required by new circumstances, and the accumulated necessities that arose out of them. But change has not touched the Vatican, that magnificent residence of the Popes. There it stands, on the hill from which it derives its name—a hill famous in ancient days for the vaticinations of the pagan prophets, and afterwards long celebrated for the sepulchre of Scipio Africanus.

The term, in its modern sense, refers to a collection of buildings on one of the seven hills of Rome, which cover a space of 1200 feet in length, and 1000 feet in breadth. It is built on the spot once occupied by the gardens of the cruel Nero. It owes its origin to the Bishop of Rome, who, in the early part of the sixth century, erected a humble residence on its site. About the year 1150, Pope Eugenius rebuilt it on a magnificent scale. Innocent III., a few years afterwards, gave it up as a lodging to Peter II., King of Arragon. In 1305, Clement V., at the instigation of the King of France, removed the Papal See from Rome to Avignon, when the Vatican remained in a condition of obscurity and neglect for more than seventy years. But soon after the return of the pontifical court to Rome—an event which had been so earnestly prayed for by the poor Petrarch, and which finally took place in 1370—the Vatican was put into a state of repair, again enlarged, and it was thenceforward considered as the regular palace and residence of the Popes, who, one after the other, added fresh buildings to it, and gradually enriched it with antiquities, statues, pictures, and books, until it became the richest repository in the world. The library of the Vatican was commenced 1400 years ago. It contains 40,000 manuscripts, among which are some by Pliny, St. Thomas, St. Charles, Borromeo, and many Hebrew, Syriac, Arabian, and Armenian Bibles. The whole of the immense buildings composing the Vatican are filled with statues found beneath the ruins of ancient Rome—with paintings, by old masters—and with curious medals and antiquities of almost every description. When it is known that there have been exhumed more than 70,000 statues from the ruined temples and palaces of Rome, the reader can form some idea of the riches of the Vatican. The Vatican will ever be held in veneration by the student, the artist, and the scholar. Raffaele and Michael Angelo are enthroned there, and their throne will be as durable as the love of beauty and genius in the hearts of their worshippers. Here are held the ecclesiastical councils of the leading spirits of the Papal church.

THE MASKED MARRIAGE.

CHAPTER I.

THE summer moon looked softly down on the silvery waters of the Arno, whose cool waves washed the marble steps of the noble palaces upon its banks. Rich music pealed from those lighted halls; lovely forms floating in the dance were seen through the open casements, whose curtains were flung back by the cool night wind, which swept in, laden with the perfume of the orange-groves below. Stately knights and fair ladies stood on the balconies, soft words were spoken, tender vows were made; while the quiet stars looked down on many a blushing cheek and downcast eye.

From one of these gay mansions a cavalier emerged, and, hastily descending to the water-side, sprang into a light gondola, which darted away through the starlit waves.

On it went, amid drooping boughs and fragrant flowers slumbering in the soft moonlight, that fell so brightly on the countenance of him who looked so sadly at the quiet evening sky. It was a pale and noble face, with nothing of the Italian in it, save the dark, lustrous eyes, and the raven hair the night wind flung so freely back; while the unadorned and simple dress told that, though brave and true, a humble fortune must be his.

Meantime, the light boat sped along by lighted palaces and moonlit gardens till the high, dark walls of the Convent of St. C— rose before him. The faint, low chant of the evening prayer rose softly on the quiet air, and as the solemn sound of the holy music ceased, the gondola glided into the dark shadow of the walls. A moment more, and it was moored beneath a solitary casement, while, in a low, sweet voice, these words were sung:

The summer wind is sighing
Across the moonlit sea,
And bears my bark, dear lady,
Through whispering waves to thee.
Oh, wake! for the evening star
Casts her soft light o'er me:
Thou art my star, and I the wave,
Reflecting naught but thee.

As the song ceased, the casement opened, and a light female form appeared in the balcony, where the moonlight revealed a young and lovely lady. It was no nun; for the silken robe was clasped with jewels, and no close veil hid the bright locks that fell so softly round the fair, young face, as, bending from the balcony, she said:

"Ah, Ferdinand, why hast thou ventured forth to-night? They will miss thee at the palace, and all may be discovered!"

"Pardon, dearest Alice, but I could not rest till I had told thee what I this day learned. To-morrow thou wilt leave the convent, where, till now, thy life has flowed along beneath a cloudless sky. The gay world thou wilt enter is too full of sin and sorrow for one so pure and gentle as thou art. Oh, Alice! my heart is filled with sad forebodings for thee!"

"Nay, why fear for me, dear Ferdinand? Amid the sins and follies of the world my heart shall be a holy shrine, where all the pure, undying love I bear thee shall be gathered up, and, with all a woman's constancy and faith, be treasured but for thee!"

"That bright dream is over, dearest," replied her lover, and his voice was sad and low. "This is why I could not rest. I would be the first to tell you all our sorrow, and share the grief I bring thy gentle heart. Thy father has betrothed thee to Count Antonio, and by solemn vows hath bound himself to wed thee only unto him, the heir of those rich English lands he so long hath coveted. I knew not of this till it was too late to claim the hand where I had won the heart. I cannot doubt the tidings; our happy visions for the future are no more. Thou must be led a victim to the altar, and I, amid the ruins of my life's fair hopes, will seek for patience to bear this sorrow as I ought!"

He ceased and bowed his head, and the few heavy tears that fell showed how hard a struggle love and honour made within that noble heart.

"How can I free myself from this unholy marriage?" said the gentle girl, while the bright tears fell like summer rain. "I cannot give my hand where my heart can never follow! Ah! save me, Ferdinand, from such a fate!"

"Alice, what a heart's best love can do shall not be wanting now. I'll plead as never lover pleaded before—and if I cannot win my suit, hard as the task may be, we must teach our hearts to share the sorrow nobly, and forget the joy that hath been ours."

"Thou shalt not bear this grief alone; these idle tears shall never dim the light that leads me to my duty. Thy noble words have stilled the deep despair of this poor heart; the happy dream that made my life so bright and beautiful is gone; those hopes and joys have passed away—all but my love and constancy to thee. They may wed me where they list, my heart is ever thine!"

"God bless thee, dearest, and reward thee as thy true heart's tenderness deserves! But hark! the convent bell is sounding. I must leave thee, but not yet for ever we shall meet again; till thou bear bravely up! And now farewell, dearest; may good angels guard and comfort thee!"

"Farewell!" said the weeping lady. "If we must part, may you find a heart as true and tender as the one now sorrowing for thee, is the prayer of thy poor Alice!"

The boat was gone, the balcony deserted, and the moon's soft light fell only on the bright waves rippling below.

CHAPTER II.

THE Count De Adelon was a proud and high-born Italian, wedded in his youth to a lovely English lady, who had borne him one fair child, and then, like the sweet but short-lived southern flowers that bloomed around her, faded gently away, and was borne to the tomb of the proud De Adelons.

Years went by, and the mother's child found a calm and happy home among the gentle nuns of St. C—, and grew up amid the holy sisterhood lovely as a poet's dream, pure and gentle as the saints she worshipped with such pious love.

A father's tenderness and care she had never known; for he had brought another bride to his stately home, and amid the many joys that rank and wealth can bring, forgot the gentle child who was growing into womanhood and beauty in the dim old convent.

At length poverty stole into his luxurious home; for years of careless splendour had brought the proud Count's fortune low. Then, while wandering through the stately halls where no trace of the coming ruin was yet seen, he remembered that a lovely daughter, yet unknown to the gay world, dwelt within the gloomy convent. She might wed some lord, whose wealth would well repay the honour done him by the noble house of Adelon.

He sought the daughter he had so long neglected, and, with wondrous delight, beheld a form and face that well might grace the proudest home in Italy. Tender memories rose in his cold heart, and with kind and loving words he won his daughter's love, and from time to time had taken her to his splendid home, that others might see the loveliness of his fair child.

"Twice there she had seen and learned to love Ferdinand De Vere. Young, brave, and rich in manly virtues he soon won the heart he longed for, and amid the proud and high-born guests who thronged her father's halls, the English stranger was the only one whose image did not fade like a bright dream, when in the silent convent she forgot the gay scenes that had passed before her. And thus ere long the loving hearts were joined, and the bright waves rippling by St. C— bore on their bosom the happy lover to the little cell where all his earthly happiness was found.

Little dreaming of the tender scenes the moon looked down on through those long summer nights, the Count De Adelon was winning for his child the hand of Count Antonio, an Italian noble, whose unbought wealth would build up the broken fortunes of the bride's father.

And at length the young lord, won by the daughter's beauty and the father's rank, besought the Count's leave to bring her from the convent to his own noble palace, as his wife. That leave was given, and the lovers' happy dream was broken by the summons of the gentle Alice home.

CHAPTER III.

THE setting sun stole with a softened light through the curtains of a humbly-furnished chamber, where sat Ferdinand De Vere, pale and sad, struggling to calm the bitter sorrow of a hopeless love.

A low tap broke the deep silence, and a servant entered, saying:

"Signor, a stranger waits below, entreating you to see her! Shall I admit her?"

"Nay, Bertoni, I can see no stranger now! Yet, if she is poor, or in sorrow, it were cruel to refuse. I will see her, whoever it be!"

A light step sounded on the stair, and a young girl stood before him, wrapped in a dark mantle; but the veil so closely folded ill concealed the bright, dark eyes and clustering hair.

"Signor, I come on a strange errand," she said; "but to me a sad one! My mother lies upon her death-bed, and cannot die in peace till she has revealed to thee a secret which will bring thee wealth and honour. Wilt thou trust me as thy guide, and follow quickly?"

"'Tis a strange summons!" said the young man. "How can I, a stranger here, be known to thy mother? Nay, do not weep, poor child: I will follow thee, if my presence can bring comfort to a suffering spirit!"

And with his unknown guide he passed into the silent streets.

Twilight shadows were deepening, and the soft light had faded away, as the young girl stopped before a ruined gate; then passing in, she led the way through a deserted garden to a low door, which was opened by an old servant, who said:

"The Virgin be praised, you are not too late! Come quickly! she is with the priest."

Up a flight of narrow stairs they went, into a darkened room, where on a low couch lay a woman, in whose pale and haggard face traces of great beauty still were seen. Beside her stood a grey-haired priest, holding a golden crucifix before her fading eyes.

"Mother, he is here!" said the young girl, kneeling beside the couch, while her tears fell thick and fast.

"Ah!" said the dying woman; "lift me higher, Rosalie; and do thou, holy father, bear witness to the last words of this sinful heart. Young man, draw nearer. Is thy name Ferdinand De Vere?"

"It is," replied he, wondering at the strange scene before him.

"Then listen, while I unfold to thee the tale of sin I could not carry with me.

"Thy father, years ago, when he was gay and young, wooed and won a simple village maiden's heart. It was her only wealth—and she gave it freely, asking for no return but constancy and truth. She knew not that her humble lover was a rich and noble knight. He vowed to love and wed her, and she believed him. Happy days passed, and then she was left to sigh in lonely sorrow. He was wedded to a noble lady, and forgot the warm heart he had won. I was that poor maiden, and in the bitter hour of agony and grief I vowed a fierce revenge.

"That vow I kept. Years rolled away, and I was wedded to a wild mountain robber, and sought in the stirring scenes of a wandering life to still the voice that whispered of forgiveness; but an evil demon drove me on, and my vow was at length fulfilled. Thy father's life had been a long, bright dream of happiness and love; wealth such as few possess was his, and 'twas all gathered up for thee. Thou wert a fair, unconscious child, and often did I wander to thy home, to look upon thy mother bending over thee, and with all her heart's love blessing thee as mothers only can. Her life seemed all bound up in thine, and I hated her for possessing the joy I could not win.

"At length thy father died. Thou canst not remember thy mother's grief, nor her wonder and alarm, when no will was found—and thus all the wealth so hoarded up for thee passed to thy kinsman, Count Antonio. Thou wert left fatherless and poor.

"My revenge was gained. I had stolen the will that left all to thee, and thou and thy mother were penniless. Death took her hence, and thou hast made thyself loved and honoured for thy nobleness and truth. My cruel work was done, and for years I wandered over the earth, a sinful, sorrowing outcast.

"Think not, young man, I called thee hither to learn this sad and simple story for no purpose. I can give thee now thy father's wealth. My life is well-nigh spent, and I would perform one good deed ere I depart. My child, bring hither the ivory casket; thou knowest the secret hiding-place."

The weeping girl stole out, and a deep silence followed. No words can tell the wonder, joy, and tender grief the dying woman's tale had stirred within the breast of the young listener. Thoughts of Alice, golden dreams of wealth and happiness, and sad memories of the mother who had so deeply suffered for the sins of the wild, revengeful woman who now, long years after lay dying here before him—these came crowding to his mind like a troubled dream, till the silence was broken by the return of Rosalie, bearing the casket in her hand.

"Unclasp it, love," said the dying woman, faintly; "my strength fails, and my work is yet undone. These papers," she continued in broken accents, "will prove thy right to all thy father's wealth. Would it could buy this poor soul its pardon and forgiveness!"

"Now, farewell! I cannot die in peace with a face so like thy father's bending over me. I have told all. This good priest will counsel thee. Now go, and may this last deed repay thee for the great wrong this sinful heart hath done thee!"

"May God forgive thee as freely as I do, and grant thee peace!" whispered the young man; and, with a few words to the old priest, he stole softly out into the silent night.

CHAPTER IV.

DAYS had passed—the dead was buried, and Rosalie in a safe home. Long and anxious were the counsels of the priest and young De Vere. The strange discovery had brought many difficulties: those who had witnessed the will were to be found. After a long and careful search they were at length traced to Rome. Messengers were dispatched to bring them secretly to F—.

Amid all these wearisome duties, one thought still cheered the happy lover on—thought of the hour when he might claim Alice as his own; and this he could not hope to do until his right to all the English wealth was clear.

So he eagerly hurried on the work, and thus the weeks rolled on, when tidings reached him that in three days the nuptials of the Count Antonio would take place. Then in the wildest haste he sought the priest for comfort and advice.

"My son," said the old man, "there is but one way left thee. Go to thy lady's father, and ask her hand. Thou hast virtue, and an honourable name. She loves thee, and if he bear a father's heart within his breast, he will never sell her for the Count Antonio's gold, when her heart is given to thee. Say nothing of the strange tale thou hast lately heard—for if he makes his daughter's happiness by giving up his worldly hopes, then it will be a fit reward when he shall learn that the fortune he so coveted is thine."

He went, and pleaded his love with all his heart's deep devotion—but in vain. The ambitious count had set his worldly heart on the wealth of Lord Antonio, and with haughty coldness answered the young lover's prayers, saying, as he turned to go:

"My daughter is the last of her noble name, and whose wins her hand must possess the wealth and rank befitting such an honour!"

"My lord," replied the young man, while the light shone in his dark eyes, "the name of De Vere is noble as your own! I am not poor, and can give your daughter a happy home, and a heart whose only care shall be to spare her every sorrow. Count Antonio's wealth may pass away! Where, then, will be the happiness you now seek for your child, in paltry gold and a titled name?"

"Enough, young man!" exclaimed the count. "When you can boast a name and fortune noble as the count's, I will yield my daughter when and where you please to claim her!"

And with a scornful smile he turned away.

"Stay, my lord!" cried Ferdinand. "Did I hear aright and will you give your daughter's hand when I shall bring you wealth like that Antonio now possesses? I take you at your word! Remember, it is pledged! Three days hence I will claim my bride!"

And with a proud, triumphant smile, he passed out.

"Three days, sayest thou!" muttered the count. "Thy bride shall then be another's, and thou wilt claim her then in vain! 'Tis a strange vow I have made! I fear I have said too much! But no—it cannot be! No mortal could in three days gather up such boundless wealth as Count Antonio brings my child! 'Tis a foolish fear! I'll think of it no more!"

And in dreams of grandeur yet to come, the haughty noble thought not of the sorrowing heart that beat so sadly in the bosom of his gentle child.

The three days were nearly spent, and well had the old priest done his work. The witnesses were come, all was proved, and Ferdinand De Vere was lord of the English wealth.

The morning of the third day came, and proudly went the Count De Adelon through his lordly home; for that night would the barter of his fair young daughter bring all the wealth he coveted.

As thus he mused, a paper was placed in his hand: it was in the writing of Count Antonio, and thus it ran:

"My lord,—This night, according to my promise, your daughter shall wed the heir of Lord Devereux's unbounded wealth. Pardon whatever mystery may appear when next we meet. Ask nothing, and all shall be explained when the ceremony is over."

"Some romantic folly!" thought the count; "I care not what! He shall have no cause to chide me, for not a word will I speak till all is over. And now to Alice—she must know of this new whim."

And he passed on to where his daughter sat, pale, and still striving to banish the tender thoughts as they rose in her sorrowing heart.

CHAPTER V.

GONDOLA after gondola swept up to the marble steps, and deposited their light-hearted occupants to swell the brilliant throng that filled the stately halls of the Count De Adelon.

Plumes and gay hearts fluttered, jewels and bright eyes flashed, soft words were spoken, tender glances given, and jests went round. Knights and ladies, elves and pages, kings and flower-girls, all mingled gaily in the dance—sweet voices and rich melody filled the air—and so with mirth and music the masquerade went on.

"Has your highness seen the Lady Alice?" asked a stately knight of the fairy queen who stood beside him. "Lovely she has ever been, but to-night her beauty is beyond aught that I have ever seen!"

"Her dress is well chosen," replied his gay companion; "that bridal robe is but a token of the one she will shortly wear—for Count Antonio claims her hand, and if I do not err, the next time we tread these halls it will be to dance at the sweet lady's bridal. But look! yonder comes the Count Antonio. I know him, in spite of his mask, by the star of the Devereux upon his breast."

"He, too, is attired as for a bridal," said the knight; "but never did I see him bear himself so nobly as to-night. Did you mark that whisper, as he offered Lady Alice upon white rose she seems so proud of?"

"That I did," answered the lady, with a gay laugh. "I wish all knights grew as strangely graceful and gallant when a fair lady smiles on their suit. I must ask Alice for the charm she has used to change the awkward, rude Antonio into your graceful cavalier in the white velvet doublet. The music sounds; do you dance?"

And knight and lady passed away through the flower-decked halls.

Many were the wondering remarks at the bridal dress of Alice and her lover; and ere long it was whispered through the crowd that the proud Count De Adelon had drawn them hither to celebrate the nuptials of his fair daughter with the young lord so many hearts had tried to win: not for his bravery or love, but for the name and fortune he possessed. And when at length the priest appeared, a low murmur passed through the crowd.

Then the Count De Adelon stepped proudly forth, saying:

"My friends, pardon this little plot, but I desired to show all honour to the noble Count who this night weds my child—and where can they more fitly pledge their faith than here, amid festivity and joy, surrounded by happy hearts and loving friends? Father, we wait your services."

A deep stillness fell upon the throng as the bridal party stood before the priest; but a murmur of astonishment was heard when the bridegroom took his place—for the mask he had so carefully worn was not removed. All had wondered at the unbroken silence of the young count. To none but Alice had he spoken—all others he had carefully avoided; and many had noticed the graceful ease of the once untroubled count.

Curiosity and wonder were at their height, but respect restrained all questions till the solemn words were spoken. Then the eager crowd gathered round the Count De Adelon, and poured forth their unbounded astonishment at the strange scene they had witnessed.

"Gladly will I tell you when I am told myself. My lord," he said, turning to the bridegroom, "patiently have I borne my part in this strange masquerade of yours. The bridal is now over, and I claim your promise of revealing your reason for so mysterious an act."

"It shall be given," replied the bridegroom; and the next moment the mask was off, and the noble face of Ferdinand De Vere appeared, glowing with joy and manly beauty, his stately form drawn proudly up, the brilliant star of an English earl flashing upon his breast, and Alice, radiant with happiness, leaning on his arm.

Not a sound broke the stillness that followed, after the first low murmur of astonishment, till the tones of his musical voice sounded through the long hall, saying:

"My lord, you bid me claim your daughter when I could show as high a name, as boundless wealth as Count Antonio. I can do more; and even your ambitious heart can find nought to wish for, when the son of the Earl of Devereux, with all the English wealth you covet, and his own fair fortune, is the happy husband of the child you would have sold for the worthless gold that cannot buy a noble woman's love. My right is proved, and Count Antonio has left Italy; and now, my lord, no longer as a simple knight, but Ferdinand Earl of Devereux and De Vere, I claim this hand, dearer than aught the earth can give—for with it comes a heart wealth could not buy, nor titles tempt. Kind friends," continued he, turning gayly to those knights who gathered warmly round him, "my best wish is that you may gain as fair a fortune and as true a bride as I have won by this MASKED MARRIAGE!"

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

IMPROVED STEAM AND OTHER GAUGES.—Mr. W. E. Newton, of Chancery Lane, London, has recently patented an apparatus for indicating the pressure of steam and fluids. It consists of a diaphragm, or corrugated plate of steel, attached securely to a chamber, into which the steam is admitted; and its force lifting up the elastic plate, which is attached to mechanism acting on the index of the dial, instantly shows the amount of pressure. The force being removed, the hands return to zero; the elasticity of the diaphragm enabling it to return to its first position. This looks marvellously like an Aneroid barometer.

SAMUELSON'S PATENT DIGGER.—This promising implement has recently been tried at Adderbury. First of the implement itself. It bears a lively resemblance to the clod-crusher, a large revolving cylinder, about three feet in length, externally bristled with numerous slightly-curved iron spikes; in substance something between harrow teeth and the tines of a pitchfork, and, with easy-moved cranks and levers can be made to turn the earth at any required depth, from four to ten inches. In our specimen trial it was working eight inches deep, a rather light surface, with clay subsoil; and been winter-ploughed, of pretty good tilth, but not over clean; newly in the occupation of Mr. William Cales. It was drawn by four powerful horses, and the draught seemed heavy; but it did its work wonderfully well. A person present said: "Why it both ploughs and harrows at the same time!" and so it did. As to the roots and weeds, they could not live with it a minute; they were kicked and scratched in all directions, and always left on the surface. Possibly, had it been set a few inches shallower, it might have worked easier, and answered all agricultural purposes equally well. Certainly long-buried seeds may now be called into action. Let the coming barley crop speak for itself.

ARTIFICIAL ILLUMINATION AND HEATING.—A patent has been taken out by Mr. A. M. Dix, of Salford, by which apparatus is so arranged, illuminated, and heated, that the gas, or other combustible, shall be consumed, and the necessary oxygen supplied thereto for the support of combustion, quite irrespective of the atmosphere of the apartment where the apparatus is placed. To this end the light is contained in a close vessel, having tubes for the admission of oxygen, and the conveyance away of the products of combustion—so that the vitiated air does not mingle with or contaminate the surrounding atmosphere. The same contrivance also prevents injury to the steadiness of the light, from the opening and closing of doors, or other disturbances in the atmosphere. It may also be applied to the lighting of mines, or may be used under water, or in any other situation where an exposed light might be impracticable or dangerous, as the light can be sustained independent of the nature of the immediately surrounding medium. In heating apartments, the closed chamber in which the combustion is carried on may be either transparent or not, as preferred, and it may be either plain or ornamental, care being taken that the ingress of fresh air for combustion, and the egress of the foul or exhausted air from the vessel, shall be duly proportioned; and it is to be here remarked, that for heating purposes it is preferable for the fresh air to be conducted directly to the gas, the foul air circulating in the vessel, and allowing the heat to radiate into the apartment, and in cases where a downward draught is required for the consumed air.

DANIELL AND SON'S PATENT STEEL-SHRED STAMPS-HEAD.—The merits of this invention consist not only in the great durability of the material, as compared with cast-iron, which has hitherto been used, or the ease and facility with which the shoe, when worn, may be replaced by a new one—thus rendering the frequent stoppage of the machinery unnecessary—but it also has the very important merit of always presenting a flat surface to the mineral under operation, thereby adding materially to the effective power of the engine; and, which is of still more importance, it will most effectually prevent the deterioration of the tin, or other metals, by the admixture of metallic iron, derived from the wear and tear, or abrasion of the cast-iron stamps-head now in use, which, being of similar density with the oxide of tin, becomes inseparably mixed therewith, and greatly injures the metal for many practical purposes, as it is frequently found to contain from five to ten per cent. of iron. It has generally been supposed that the presence of this great quantity of iron was owing to iron ore contained in the tin ore; but that is a popular error. The specific gravity of most of the iron ores seldom exceeds 4.0, and they are still further lightened in calcination, to which most tin ores are submitted; and therefore the iron ores are readily separated from the tin ores in the process of dressing. In this respect, Messrs. Daniell and Son's patent stamps-head will effect a most important improvement in the quality of the metals, and of tin especially.

LIME-WATER FOR HENS.—During the last season, Mr. Joseph Wilcox, of Wayne, having occasion to administer lime-water to a sick horse, inadvertently left a pail of the preparation in his barn, which remained there for some months, serving as a favourite drink for hens. He soon found that the laying of his hens was increased to a considerable extent. Being convinced of the importance of the (to him) new discovery, he has during the present season kept his hens continually supplied with lime-water, placed in troughs within their convenient access, and the result is an increase of eggs of nearly four-fold as compared with previous experience.

W. SYMINGTON, THE ORIGINATOR OF STEAM-VESSLS

THE claim of Mr. William Symington to be the first real originator of steam navigation, or, more properly speaking, the first person who applied steam efficiently as the means of propelling vessels through the water for any practical purpose, has been often brought before the public since the year 1840; and proofs were not wanting to establish the validity of that claim. Mr. Symington was, however, allowed to die in comparative want, or at least dependent upon his children; his claims, which were laid before the government of that day, were not even allowed to be investigated, and his drawings, together with the numerous affidavits that he left at the Treasury to substantiate them, were lost or refused to be given up, and £150 given by his Majesty George IV. from his privy purse, was all he ever received from a government for which his genius had done so much; and it appears very certain that his claims could never have been properly advocated or understood, or a country that gave £50,000 to Compton, for his mule-jenny; £10,000 to Cartwright, for his power-loom; £30,000 to Harrison, for his chronometer; £50,000 to Palmer, for his mail-coach system; and, more recently, £7000 to Messrs. Foudrinier, for their experiments in the manufacture of paper, would never have refused honourable compensation to Symington.

The recent discovery of some manuscripts relative to the just application of steam-power to navigation, by Symington, have, however, so completely set aside the claims of all other inventors, that we may yet hope to see his services recognised in some testimonial offered by the government and the nation to his surviving family, who are, we believe, dependent upon their own exertions for their daily bread, whilst thousands are living in luxury upon the successful results derived from his invention. As our readers may not, however, be cognisant of all the facts connected with the subject, we will extract, for their information, the following account of the inventor and his invention, from the Glasgow Citizen, of the 1st of January, 1853:

"There have been many claimants to the honour of the invention of steam navigation; but that the late William Symington was the first person who successfully applied the power of the steam-engine to the propulsion of vessels, we think there can now be no reasonable doubt. Blasco de Garay, in 1543, the Marquis of Worcester, in 1663, and Jonathan Hulls, in 1737, may all have thought of applying steam to navigation, but their ideas led to nothing. In 1786, however, Mr. Symington, then residing at Wanlockhead, Dumfriesshire, conceived the bold idea that the steam-engine might be rendered available for the propulsion of land carriages; as also that vessels might be propelled by the same power. He and his brother George were at that time joint engineers to the Wanlockhead Mining Company, and Mr. John Taylor was manager of the mines—to whom they were much indebted for the facilities afforded them in having the idea soon embodied in a working model, which an old man named John Black, still living there, remembers having seen. It was constructed on four wheels, moved in any direction by the power of a small steam-engine (patented by Mr. S.), and designed so as to carry sixteen cwt., besides coals, water, &c.

"In the Edinburgh Evening Courant of July 12, 1786, it is described as being 'one of the most capital discoveries of the age.' It was shortly afterwards taken to Edinburgh, and exhibited by Mr. Meason (one of the Mining Company), to the Professors of the University and other gentlemen there, who were all so highly pleased with the invention, that they strongly recommended Mr. M. not to lose sight of so promising a genius as the inventor. Amongst others, Mr. Miller, of Dalswinton, who had been experimenting a good deal amongst vessels, examined the model, and expressed his high admiration of it. Speaking of the disappointment he had felt in endeavouring to propel vessels by turning paddle-wheels with a capstan by manual power, Mr. Symington suggested the application of the steam-engine, and explained how it could be connected with the wheels of the boat—showing its practicability by reference to the model. Mr. Miller accordingly desired Mr. S. to construct a steam-engine similar to his own, and have it fitted into a boat with which he had been experimenting at Dalswinton. Mr. Symington did so, and, as is known to the world, the experiment was crowned with success on Dalswinton Loch, in 1788.

THE PATTERN WIFE.

A creature easily passed by;
Not lovely to the stranger's eye.

WINNIE WINLOVE is not a beauty, but she has a sensible, loveable, kissable face, which is not only good-looking, but looks good; and then her dress is always so neat, her smile so bright, and her voice so sweet, that, though she would attract no attention at theatre or ball, she is the dearest ornament of a husband's home.

She is never "caught," call when you will; for her house, like herself, is the pink of neatness—not that uncomfortable sort which makes us dread to use the polished furniture; but an easy, all-pervading order, which seems so natural one scarcely wonders at it. If in accomplishing this, her servants give her trouble, she does not "fight her battles o'er again," for the entertainment of her husband or visitors. She is not, in the usual sense of the term, accomplished—does not perform brilliant fantasias on the pianoforte, or sing incomprehensible Italian bravuras; but she plays a sensible accompaniment or dance correctly, with taste, and in perfect time; sings an English ballad with feeling and expression; and does either, when requested, without putting on airs or requiring the stimulus of a large audience. She has actually been known to play and sing for more than an hour, with no listeners but her husband and family. She does not dance, but as her husband does and likes to, she willingly attends balls and dancing parties, where her observing mind, keen appreciation of the ludicrous, and genial good humour, find no lack of entertainment. She does not speak "all the modern languages," but her English is well worth listening to.

She is not, strictly speaking, pious—were this a fancy sketch, she would be, but as it is a portrait, the truth must be told—but she has a heartfelt love of the good, the true, and the beautiful, and does the duty which lies nearest her to the best of her ability. Cheerfulness is her chief characteristic; and promoting the happiness of her husband and family the business of her life. In matters of importance, if she and her husband differ in opinion, she states hers calmly, and listens to his reasoning with a mind open to conviction; but in trifles his wish is her will.

Is she ready for visiting or shopping, and he thinks it looks like rain, she lays off her bonnet and stays at home. Is she tired and somewhat indisposed for exertion, and he requests her to go out, she complies. Has she a new dress or cap to which he objects, it disappears.

She never wants to read when he wants to talk, nor to talk when he wants to read; never complains of her nerves; never makes any reply when he hints that breakfast is a little late; never objects to his smoking; never teases him to give her new furniture, dresses, etc., knowing that when he can afford them he will do so without being asked. She never looks glum, or calls him "my dear," in that carefully softened, but portentous tone which strikes terror to the heart of the hen-pecked husband, when he brings an unexpected visitor to dinner; never asks what kept him, when he comes home late; and, climax of wifely amiability, never objects to his kissing all the young ladies who visit them!

Her health never compels her to leave him four or five months every summer to the house-keeping of servants, and the ennui of loneliness; or, worse still, the discomforts of boarding, and the society of his bachelor friends.

Her children—of course she has plenty—are never tormented about keeping clean and taking care of their clothes, nor screamed over and petted when they happen to fall; nor paraded for exhibition when they get new garments, nor scolded or neglected at any time. They are well governed, well bred, active, healthy, and happy.

Her faults—of course she has some—are mostly those that lean to virtue's side, and are, in her husband's estimation, amply counterbalanced by the antithetical virtues of being fond, yet reasonable; clear-sighted, yet confiding; wise, yet womanly.

THE REALITIES OF GOLD-DIGGING.

To most people at a distance there appears some romance in gold-digging: they are excited with the idea that they may kick up a stone, and find twenty pounds of gold under it, and cannot imagine how people can refrain from seizing a pick and breaking every piece of quartz they pass, to see if there is another monster nugget in it. But this is all delusion: gold-digging is a real, downright, matter-of-fact trade—so many hours of common labourer's work, so much gold—so many buckets of earth, so many ounces; and once a man is amongst the diggers, he feels no more inclination to take a pick in his hand for the chance of what he may turn up, than he would to enter upon the labour of English navvies, whose allowance is three cubic yards per day. The labour is always great, and sometimes exceedingly so. A great many fall—and the dirty work, mud, and slush in water—the wretched cooking and uncomfortable beds—if such as the great mass have can be called beds—the discomfort of sitting about in the open air between sundown and bed-time, and rising cold and damp in the morning—besides the pain of training the body to a severe and incessant labour—are so contrary to the habits of the many, that few can stand the trainings. No one, therefore, should think of attempting such work unless he feels himself equal to any exertion, mentally and bodily, and prepared to rough it in the extreme sense of the term. It is very easy to distinguish those who have been any length of time at work from the new arrivals, by their worn and dirty dress, their beards, and their thin, lank faces; for even the most healthy of them have a haggard appearance. A few were complaining of dysentery, and some of them had bad eyes—the latter occasioned by the flies, which are terribly annoying; and the former generally goes its round among the new comers, though most of the men are remarkably healthy at this time of the year; but the water in many places was very bad, and its ill effects were much felt.—Mossman's Australia Visited and Revisited.

HOW MURAT MET HIS FATE.

THE sentence of the military commission was read to him with due solemnity. He listened to it as he would have listened to the cannon of another battle during his military life, equally without emotion or bravado. He neither asked for pardon, for delay, nor for appeal. He had advanced of his own accord towards the door, as if to accelerate the catastrophe. The door opened on a narrow esplanade, lying between the towers of the castle and the outer walls. Twelve soldiers, with loaded muskets, awaited him there. The narrow space did not permit them to stand at a sufficient distance to deprive death of a part of its horror. Murat, in stepping over the threshold of his chamber, found himself face to face with them. He refused to let his eyes be bandaged; and, looking at the soldiers with a firm and benevolent smile:

"My friends," said he, "do not make me suffer by taking bad aim. The narrow space naturally compels you almost to rest the muzzles of your muskets on my breast; do not tremble—do not strike me in the face—aim at the heart—here it is."

As he spoke thus, he placed his right hand upon his coat, to indicate the position of his heart. In his left hand he held a small medallion, which contained, in one focus of love, the image of his wife and of his four children, as he wished thus to make them witnesses of his last hour, or to have their images in his last look. He fixed his eyes on this portrait, and received the death-blow without feeling it, absorbed in contemplation of all he loved upon earth! His body, pierced at so short a distance by twelve balls, fell with his arms open and his face to the earth, as if still embracing the kingdom which he once possessed, and which he had come to re-conquer for his tomb.

They threw his cloak upon the body, which was buried in the Cathedral of Pizzo. Thus died the most chivalrous soldier of the imperial epoch; not the greatest, but the most heroic figure among the champions of the new Alexander.—Lamartine's History.

THE DAYS GONE BY.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

THE days gone by,—'tis sad, yet sweet,
To list the strain of parted hours;
To think of those we loved to meet
When children, 'mid a thousand flowers!
The scenes we roved—romantic—lone—
Ere yet our hearts had learned to sigh—
The dreams of glory once our own—
In days gone by—in days gone by!

The days gone by—oh! is there not
A charm—a feeling in those words—
A music ne'er to be forgot—
Struck from the memory's sweetest chords!
With many a tone to wake a tear,
And many a thought we fain would fly;
Oh! still to every heart are dear
The days gone by—the days gone by!

The days gone by—they have a spell
To burst the ceremonies of the grave;
And from oblivion's deepest cell,
The forms we loved and lost—to save!
Time may not fade those looks of light,—
Still beauteous to the mental eye
As the first hour they blest our sight,
In days gone by—in days gone by!

The days gone by—Man's best essay—
One fadeless work to leave behind—
Before their might hath passed away
Like dust upon the desert wind:
The very mountains have grown grey—
And stars have vanished from the sky—
The young—the fair—oh! where are they?
With days gone by—with days gone by!

The days gone by—from shore to shore
Their ever lengthening shadows spread
On—on till Time shall breathe no more—
And Earth itself be with the dead:
Each brief—unnoticed—minute bears
The mandate of its God on high:
And death and silence are the heirs
Of days gone by—of days gone by

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXX.

Fiends! foll'd at my own game! Sport Lucifer—
He struck me. COLMAN THE YOUNGER.

ON the night following the visit of the tapster to Woodstock, Basset and his company, which had been gradually augmented till it amounted to about fifty men, left the hostel of The Fair Rosamond for the royal borough. The avaricious host rubbed his greasy palms—for the ruffian leader of the hiring band had gratified his soul in that which was dearest to it—gold! He was one of those earthworms whose dreams were of the pale yellow idol—it was the god enshrined in the polluted sanctuary of his heart—he knew and served no other.

Reuben and his pretty cousin saw the departure of their guests with mingled terror and satisfaction—terror at the prospect of their succeeding in the treasonable design against the life of Elizabeth, and satisfaction at the feeling that the house was rid of them.

"I think there be poachers about, hunting the queen's deer," observed the landlord, as he stood on the threshold of the hostel. His nephew only smiled—he knew the game the supposed poachers were tracking.

The observation of the speaker had been caused by the appearance of several lights, resembling the Will-o'-the-Wisp, which appeared in rapid succession in different parts of the forest, or royal chace, which extended in a parallel line with the high road, far beyond the old inn.

"Come, bustle, bustle!" continued the old man; "it is time to close the house!"

"Do you not expect your guests to return?" inquired Reuben.

"What is that to thee, malapert?" answered his uncle, angrily; "a tapster should be content to draw wine and liquor for his master's guests, and neither ask questions nor pry into their goings and comings!"

"But I do not intend to remain a tapster all my life!" observed the young man.

His relative retorted by assuring him that unless he improved his wits and mended his manners, he would never rise to be the host of any well regulated hostel.

The liberal sum which the fellow had just received from the conspirators had made him more than usually bitter against his nephew, whose pretensions to the love of Mabel had been a frequent theme of contention between his wife and himself: the dame, although scarcely less fond of money than her partner, was a mother—and we rarely find a mother's heart capable of entertaining hatred towards the man who honourably loves her child.

We are told that woman was the last to leave Paradise—Adam crossed its threshold first. No wonder that some trace of Eden lingers in her nature yet; although, like the vein of gold in the quartz, we must sometimes crush the rock before we find it. All do not wear their good qualities upon the surface.

Just as they were on the point of closing the hostel, a traveller, whose accoutrements denoted that he was in the royal service, rode up to the porch, and, throwing the rein to Reuben, intimated his intention of taking up his quarters at the Fair Rosamond for the night.

In that age military men were not the most desirable guests that a taverner could receive: true, they called freely for the best wine the house could afford, but they frequently forgot to pay their score; and, as the father of the pretty Mabel used to observe, "it was ill quarrelling with men who rode in steel, and bore the queen's commission." Eyeing the new comer with a dissatisfied air, the host informed him that he could not afford him accommodation.

"Why so, varlet?" exclaimed the stranger; "is thy house full?"

"Not full, worthy sir," replied the Boniface; "but it has been occupied for three days past by worshipful guests, who may return. It is but a short ride to Woodstock: at the Crown, or any of the hostels in the town, you will meet with fitting quarters. The moon is rising—you cannot miss the way."

No sooner was the officer of Sir Henry Beddingfield—for such the stranger was—assured that the party he had been sent to watch had quitted the house, than he raised a bugle, which he wore suspended, hunter fashion, from his side, to his lips, and gave one prolonged note. The terrified host would have closed the door, but the soldier, with a resolute air, pushed it aside, and, laying his rough grasp upon his shoulders, said:

"In the queen's name I arrest you for high treason!"

"High treason!" echoed the host, in a voice of terror. "This must be some mistake! Her majesty has not in the whole shire of Oxford—nay, for the matter of that, in all England—a more loyal subject than myself!"

"That remains to be seen," replied his captor, sternly. "Harboured traitors is as bad as the treason itself."

Whilst the prisoner was meditating the possibility of escape—for he knew by bitter experience that, whatever his chance of proving his innocence, the expense of the process would be ruinous—the signal which the stranger had given was responded to by a party of twelve horsemen, who, issuing from the wood, surrounded the group, who were still debating the point at issue, in front of the porch.

With a deep-drawn sigh, the father of the pretty Mabel saw at once that evasion was useless—so he resigned himself, with a sullen air, to his captors.

"Look well to the house, sirrah!" he said, addressing his nephew, "and see that there be neither waste nor riot, till my return!"

It was intimated to him that Reuben and his wife and daughter were equally prisoners, and must accompany the soldiers to Woodstock. The terrified girl clung to her father and lover alternately. In her grief and agitation, she could not help exclaiming:

"Reuben—Reuben! it was an ill day that took thee to Woodstock!"

The eyes of the innkeeper flashed fire.

"So, rascal!" he said, "after having saved thee from the beggar's dish and wallet—reared and fed thee—this is thy gratitude! thou hast betrayed me! Not that," he added, correcting himself, "there has been anything to betray: if I have erred, it has been unwittingly."

"Uncle!"

"Uncle me no uncles!" continued the old man, passionately; "thou art ambitious, too, and hast lifted thine eyes to thy cousin Mabel! I will tell thee," he added, scornfully, "when she shall be thy wife!"

"When?" demanded the officer, who commanded the party of the guard, and who appeared not a little amused with the scene.

"When I am standing under the gibbet, with the rope around my neck, and word from him will save me!" answered the host of the Fair Rosamond; "and not till then! that is, if Mabel marries with my consent; and if she does not, living or dead, my bitterest curse will cling to her!"

The poor girl vainly tried to stop the words which seemed to raise an insuperable bar between herself and the young tapster, by her caresses; but her father, who loved her as dearly as his coarse and selfish nature would permit him to love anything except himself and his money-bags, was not to be diverted from his resolution.

"Cheer up, lad!" whispered the officer, who knew the part which Reuben had taken in the affair of Basset. "You have a good friend in Sir Henry Beddingfield: he may find the means to shake your uncle's resolution yet!"

After minutely searching the house, and securing the valise which Basset had left in charge of the host, Captain Grant—for such was the name of the officer—started with his prisoners. The host of the Fair Rosamond was the only one whose escape was at all guarded against: he rode between two soldiers, who kept close to his side, with their hands upon the matchlocks of their petronels.

When Basset and his band of hired assassins approached the royal borough of Woodstock, they divided into five separate parties, in order to avoid exciting attention, should any of the citizens or soldiers of the palace guard happen to be on foot at such an hour. The place of rendezvous which he indicated, was a gate opening into the chace and reserved gardens, about half a mile from the outside of the town, where they were to meet an agent of the Chancellor Gardiner—whom, with a view to the murder of Elizabeth, the unprincipled churchman had appointed to the office of keeper. This fellow, whose name was Doubleday, had long acted as a spy for the prelate. More than once Sir Henry Beddingfield had been puzzled to understand the channel through which the Chancellor had been apprised of the minutest details of all that passed in the palace. Once in possession of the intentions of the head of the Catholic movement, he was not long in guessing at his instrument.

The gate alluded to was an old gothic pile, partially screened by a small grove which separated it from the high road. There is little doubt that it formed a portion of the original buildings so recklessly destroyed by Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough.

Doubleday had promised to be at his post and conduct the emissaries of his employer to the long-disused banquetting-hall directly under the lodgings of the royal captive; a staircase which led to the music-gallery, communicated also with the apartments of the princess.

One by one the different bands arrived at the place of meeting. As they emerged like shadows from the little wood, they resembled more a troop of shadows than living men.

Their leader counted them over. All were present. Not a ruffian had failed to reach the place.

After waiting some time, the clock of the distant church was heard to strike the hour of one. Before the vibration of the iron bell had died upon the air, a low whistle was heard, to which Basset replied by a similar signal.

A postern was carefully opened, and a man, whom Basset concluded to be Doubleday, appeared.

He and the leader of the expedition exchanged a few hurried words, in an under-tone.

"Where are your horses?" demanded the former.

"Picketed in the wood," was the reply.

"Follow me, then: everything is prepared!"

It was arranged that half their number were to remain concealed within the grounds, whilst the rest penetrated to the apartments of the intended victim. Everything seemed to favour their enterprise, and the unprincipled ruffian whose hand was prepared to shed the blood of the future queen, already grasped in anticipation the large reward promised him by his priestly employer.

"Where is the guard?" he demanded of the man who had admitted him.

"On the south side of the building," answered the fellow; "our entrance is at the north porch: little fear of their hearing us till all is over!"

"Good!" whispered the villain; "we cannot fail!" And, without further parley, he and his men prepared to follow their conductor through the thickly-wooded grounds of the palace.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Thou causest the guilty to be loosed,
From bands wherein are innocents inclosed,
Causing the guiltless to be strait reserved,
And freeing those that death had well deserved.
But by her envy can be nothing wrought—
So God send to my foes all they have brought.

LYNES WRITTEN BY ELIZABETH IN PRISON.

In a chamber hung with faded arras and scantily furnished, considering that its occupant was the heiress to the crown, sat the Lady Elizabeth. Her mind was occupied by a reflection which haunted her like an ill-omened shadow. It was evident that her enemies would never rest satisfied till they had removed her from their path: they were both numerous and powerful. First, the leaders of the Catholic party, who directed not only the government but the conscience of the queen; then the Spanish interest, with the emperor at their head, and his unscrupulous minister, Renard, to carry out his views; and, lastly, many of the old nobility of the kingdom, who contemplated with dissatisfaction the prospect of Anne Boleyn's daughter succeeding to the throne. The only real friends of the captive were the burgesses and the people, who at that period possessed far less influence in the state than at the present. Everything considered, her position was a painful one. Gardiner, the most persevering of her enemies, might eventually succeed in persuading his bigoted mistress to remove her from the ward of Sir Henry Beddingfield, when he found that stern old knight too honourable to lend himself to his dark purpose. The only hope and trust of Elizabeth was in the capricious affection of her sister: it was a faint barrier between her and her foes; still it was one.

The royal maiden held in her hand the black-letter edition of the Epistles of St. Paul, the covers of which were worked in cunning devices by her own hand, and which is still shown to the curious, in the Bodleian Library, at Oxford. Her eye rested upon the sacred page, but her thoughts were not upon its text. With a sigh she laid it on the table near which she had been sitting, and began to pace the narrow limits of her prison-chamber.

"God help me!" she sighed. "I am sore beset! I could almost have wished that I had accepted the hand of the Prince of Savoy! I should at least have been safe from the machinations of those who seek my blood, although I never wronged them!"

Gradually the countenance of the speaker assumed a more resolute expression. Her eye brightened as the vista of the long-contemplated future rose on her imagination.

"Unworthy weakness!" she pronounced. "Vain regret! Were it to do again, I would reject him! The crown of England must not be balanced for an instant against the danger of traitors—their plots and wicked scheming! The crown!" she repeated, with a shudder; "alack, the tedious path which leads to it is shadowed by the headsman's axe, the poisonous phial, and the assassin's knife!"

At the same instant, as if to confirm her fears, the noise of armed men was distinctly heard in the ante-chamber. Elizabeth turned very pale; but her resolution and self-possession did not fail her.

There was a loud knock at the door of her apartment. There were no means of fastening it on the inside—no means of flight.

Mentally commending herself to God, she pronounced the word, "Enter!" Her gentleman usher and Frank Jerningham entered the room. At the sight of the young officer, her courage revived. She felt assured that if treason were on foot, he had not descended to become its instrument.

"Now, Jerningham," she said, as the young man bent the knee before her, "what means this visit? It is a strange hour, methinks, even for the kinsman of my gaoler to enter the chamber of the sister of his sovereign!"

"Pardon me, gracious madam!" exclaimed the young man; "but there are duties which admit not of idle etiquette! I have already requested that your women may be called!"

"Hath an order arrived for my departure?" inquired the princess, anxiously.

The gentleman informed her that no such order had been received from court; that his presence was merely a precaution taken by Sir Henry Beddingfield, who had directed him to occupy the apartment of her grace with a party of picked men, on whose fidelity and courage he could rely; and that, having explained the cause of his intrusion, he would retire.

"Stay, sir!" said the royal prisoner; "such precautions are not taken without a motive. An attempt has been, or is about to be, made upon our person, and your kinsman—"

"Is honour's self!" interrupted Jerningham; "trust to him, your grace, as you would to an angel's promise!"

"I do trust to him!" said the princess. "God help me, I have no other hope!"

The two or three female attendants whom the speaker had been permitted to retain about her person, came crowding into the apartment. Their looks were terrified—like scared children, they gathered round the chair of their mistress.

"With your highness's permission, I will withdraw," added the officer; "but let me assure your grace, that before treason or danger can approach your royal person, it must pass over my body, and the bodies of my faithful soldiers! Should you hear a clamour in the old banquet-hall below, heed it not—there is nothing to fear!"

So saying, he once more bowed, and left the apartment.

Surrounded by her women, Elizabeth remained in prayer—but the words were frequently arrested upon her lips, by terrors which she could not repress; she listened anxiously for every sound. In less than an hour, a loud shout, in which the voice of her stern old guardian was distinctly heard, broke from the hall beneath. It was instantly followed by the clashing of steel.

The sound in an instant restored Elizabeth to herself. She started to her feet, and, with a calm, resolute air, stood leaning with her hand upon the shoulder of one of her women, with her eyes intently fixed upon the door of the apartment.

Basset and his band followed the footsteps of their conductor, in the deepest silence, through the woods and shrubberies of the royal domain, till they reached that portion of the ancient bower of Woodstock commonly called the Royal Lodging.

"It is infernally dark!" whispered the ruffian to the supposed Doubleday; "the shutters of the banquet-hall are closed!"

This observation was not made till they all stood beneath its quaintly-carved roof.

"It will be lighter soon!" whispered the guide.

At the extreme end of the hall was a gallery of cedar-wood, with large folding-doors in the centre. A straggling ray of light penetrated the gloom which reigned around. Basset pointed it out, and inquired the meaning of it. The same person answered that it was a lamp left burning upon the stairs which led to the apartments of the Lady Elizabeth.

The leader of the band of midnight assassins in a low tone ordered his companions to light the torches which several of them carried with them. At the first stroke of the steel and flint, his guide silently withdrew from his side; the door of the hall by which they had entered at the same time was closed from without.

No sooner was the apartment lighted up, than Basset perceived that he was betrayed. Five-and-twenty of the blue-coats, with Sir Henry Beddingfield at their head, guarded the passage leading to the gallery, whilst an equal number of his men attacked the intruders from behind.

"Traitors!" shouted the knight, as he rushed, sword in hand, upon the villains whom he had so cleverly caught in their own snare; "your accomplice, Doubleday, is in a dungeon! Yield, for your lives!"

Basset's only reply was to discharge the weapon he carried in his hand at the speaker. The ball slightly wounded the old man in the arm.

The contest was a brief one. The murderers, completely taken by surprise, and overpowered by numbers, were either cut down or secured. In less than ten minutes Basset, with his arms bound tightly behind him with a cord, stood face to face with the stern soldier.

"So, sir," said Sir Henry. "you have attempted to surprise a royal palace and the person of its governor—with what intent, or by whom instigated, it needs not to inquire! Doubtless when you undertook this honourable employment, you were aware of the risk and punishment?"

"Punishment!" muttered the baffled prisoner.

"Death!" exclaimed the knight, sternly; "and, by St. Mary, I will hang you like a dog, before the day is an hour older, unless you can show me authority for this night's work, under the hand and seal of our sovereign lady! Have you such token?"

"Send to the Chancellor."

"No!"

"The Queen herself!"

"Liar!" interrupted the old man. "Your warrant?"

"Gardiner," faltered the terrified Basset, "assured me that it was by the express command of her majesty!"

His judge laughed scornfully.

"Gardiner will not save thee!" he said. "Thou hast tasted his liberality, I doubt not; the rest of the meed due for this noble action is from the justice of Sir Henry Beddingfield! Anthony Basset," he continued, "thou hast, without lawful authority, attempted to surprise the royal residence of Woodstock. By virtue of mine office, which empowers me in such cases provided, I condemn thee to the gibbet—that and the priest are ready!"

The terrified wretch would have remonstrated, but the speaker turned coldly upon his heel, and, despite his frantic entreaties for mercy, he was dragged with his companions from the banquet-hall, and hanged, with three of his principal accomplices, at a short distance from the palace. The rest were secured in the prisons of the palace.

Whilst the execution was taking place, Sir Henry kept pacing the floor of the apartment. He felt deeply the dishonour brought upon his faith by the infamous attempt of Gardiner. Although he could not reach the master-spirit of the enterprise, he felt a great satisfaction at having defeated his project, and executed justice upon his instruments. His reveries were broken by the entrance of an officer, who announced to him that all was over.

"And the ruffians in the park?" he said.

"Taken or slain, as you directed!"

Without a word, the stern Catholic soldier directed his steps towards the lodgings of the Princess Elizabeth.

TRUTHFULNESS is a corner-stone in character—and if it is not firmly laid in youth, there will ever after be a weak spot in the foundation.

FENELON observed to a priest who was complaining to him of the dances of the peasantry: "My friend, neither you nor myself need to dance—we can be happy in our own way; but if dancing makes these poor people happy, who have so few sources of enjoyment, why should they not dance?"

FACÉTIE.

AN ACCIDENT.—"What makes the milk so warm?" said Betty to the milkman, when he brought his pail to the door one morning. "Please mum, the pump-handle's broke, and missus took the water from the biler."

"GOODNESS ME!" cried a nice old lady, the other day, "if the world does come to an end next year, what shall I do for snuff?"

DOWN SOUTH a newly-appointed gaoler once told the convicts that if they did not behave themselves he would "kick them out of the establishment."

SOME lone bachelor editor is guilty of the following: Why is the heart of a lover like the sea serpent? Because it is a secretar [sea creature] of great sighs [size].

FISCHER, the celebrated performer on the oboe, was invited by Lord Kelly to sup with him. In the course of the evening his lordship hinted that he hoped he had brought his oboe with him. "My lord," said Fischer, "my oboe never eats supper."

IN Dresden the Master of the Ceremonies prohibits any lady from appearing at court a second time in the same dress; and the poor old nobility have to live on bread-and-cheese that they may be enabled to pay their wives' dressmakers.

A SUGGESTION.—That all the Dutch eels supplied to the new market at Billingsgate should come under the inspection of the worshipful company of Skimmers, with a view to the repeal of anything in the shape of a draw-back.

MILITARY LAW.—A French paper informs its readers that the Bulletin des Lois was founded under the old republic. However, this appears to be open to doubt, for Paris has seen many a "bullet in" of very questionable law, both Republican and imperial.

APPROPRIATE PUNISHMENT.—A salutary punishment for the offence of dockyard bribery, such as that discovered at Chatham, might be found in the process of tarring and feathering the guilty parties, and sending them to the hulks afterwards. This being within the economical arrangements of a dockyard, might save much trouble and expense in devising other means of branding culprits with disgrace.

IMPOLITIC POLITICS.—If the several parties implicated in the bribery business at the last Chatham election had been less talkative, they might possibly have saved themselves from unpleasant consequences. However, they chose to make it too much of a "chat 'em" affair.

SLOW BIRDS.—An Irishman has been heard to observe that the Chinese fowls recently imported into this country, must of necessity be very slow in their movements, since they don't travel by rail, being only "Co(a)chin" China fowls.

"DON'T rob yourself," as the farmer said to the lawyer who called him hard names.

"FORGOT HER OTHER NAME."—"Tom," said an acquaintance of his, who met him on the Winne House steps, last evening—"Tom, who did you say our friend B. married?" "Well, he married—forty thousand pounds—I forgot her other name."

SOMETHING SERIOUS.—Sheridan's answer to Lord Lauderdale was excellent. On the latter saying he would repeat some good thing Sheridan had mentioned to him, he said, "Pray don't, my dear Lauderdale: a joke in your mouth is no laughing matter."

WAITING FOR MATURE AGE.—A youth went to a barber's shop the other day to be scraped. The barber having adjusted the cloth, and soaped the smooth skin, left him, and went lounging about the door. As soon as the young "gent" saw him sauntering, he impatiently called out: "Well, what are you leaving me all this time for?" "Sar, I am waiting until your beard grows."

"Now, papa, tell me what is humbug?" "It is," replied papa, "when mamma pretends to be very fond of me, and puts no buttons on my shirt."

A COMMON CASE.—"Doctor," said a person once to a surgeon, "my daughter has had a terrible fit this morning; she continued full half an hour without knowledge or understanding." "Oh," replied the doctor, "never mind that: many people continue so all their lives!"

A gentleman was accosted by a poor leaver, who asked for charity. "I will remember you the next time," replied the gentleman. "Please your honour," said the leaver, "I don't credit; I deal on the cash principle."

"MY dear," inquired a gay young wife of her calculating husband, as she reached up her rosy little mouth to be kissed on his return from business, "have you seen that magnificent set of parlour furniture which the Jenkisses have just bought?" "Them! no, my love, but I have seen the upholsterer's bill for it!"

THE following sign is in a shop-window in the neighbourhood of Great Marlborough Street, London. It runs: "Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully informed that black eyes are effectually concealed on moderate terms."

A local newspaper says: "A marriage lately took place with the following peculiarities: the groom measured six feet four, and the bride four feet six. If this is not the long and short of matrimony, we don't know what is."

THREE CROWNS.—St. James's Park is the property of the sovereign; only certain persons have the privilege of driving through it, and if the sovereign chose to exercise her legitimate power, she might close it up altogether, and prevent even foot-passengers passing through it. It is not probable that her Majesty will exhibit such freak of despotism; but if she did, we do not think her people would inflict upon her the penalty which Sir Robert Walpole told Caroline, Queen of George II., would follow the visitation of such a deprivation upon the Londoners. She wished to shut up the park, and convert it into a private garden for the palace, and asked Sir Robert what would be the expense. "It would be but a trifle, madam," replied the minister. "But what would it be, as nearly as you can guess?" "Why, I believe, madam, it would cost you three crowns." Her majesty understood his meaning, and replied, good-humouredly: "Then, Sir Robert, I will think no more upon it."

WANTED to know, by a citizen of New Bedford, whether filling a whale-ship is not of fish-ial business?

QUESTIONABLE.—The two children from the Orange River, now exhibiting in London, are called "Earthmen." Seeing that one is a boy, and the other a girl, it is not easy to comprehend how the term "Earth-men" can apply to both.

CONSISTENCY.—Colonel Sibthorp sets his face against foreign opera-singers and dancers. He would have them all heavily taxed. At all events, the gallant Colonel is consistent in his creed: for we never recollect his turning, and making a political pirouette in his life!

TROUBLESOME "TIMES."—Mr. Charles Mathews has written to the Times, to explain that the furniture and costly effects which were advertised to be sold by the sheriff, are not his, but those of another Charles Mathews. The manager says: "I have no objection to being 'used up' as often as need be. I will even confess to being sometimes 'hard up.' But I have a decided objection to be 'sold up.'"

A GOOD ONE.—"Paddy, honey, will ye buy my watch, now?" "And is it about selling your watch ye are, Mike?" "Troth it is, darlin'!" "What's the price?" "Ten shillings and a mutchkin of the creature." "Is the watch a decent one?" "Sure and I've had it twenty years, and it never once desaved me!" "Well here's your tin: now tell me, does it go well?" "Bedad an' it goes faster than any watch in Connaught, Munster, Ulster, or Leinster, not barring Dublin!" "Bad luck to ye, Mike, you have taken me in! Didn't you say it never desaved you?" "Sure an' I did—nor did it—for I never depended on it!"

WHO SHOULD JOIN THE MILITIA?—All pickpockets, because they are accustomed to rifle practice; stokers, because they can stand fire; and shopkeepers, because they are practised in counter-marching.—Diogenes.

A VULGAR ERROR.—It is erroneous to suppose that gold has only lately been discovered in Australia, considering the thousands of men there who have been getting it from their cradles.—Ibid.

GREAT OVERSIGHT.—The police should have broken into Kossuth's nursery. They then would have discovered even his children in arms.—Ibid.

GIVE HIM PLENTY OF SOAP, AND HE'LL WASH HIMSELF.—(Old Proverb, slightly altered).—Mr. Gladstone, in introducing his budget, stated that the repeal of the soap tax would tend to do away with the slave trade. We understand the honourable gentleman's calculations were founded upon actual experiment. By applying an abundant quantity of soap and water to the face of an Ethiopian serenader, he found he could transform the wretched negro into a free white man.—Ibid.

DE GOOSTEBUS, &c.—A newspaper paragraph speaks of the extraordinary appearance of "a gosling hatched by Mr. Palmer, of Lockington, Nottinghamshire." What a goose Mr. Palmer must be!—Ibid.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—Among the presentations to the Prince at a recent levee, we observed, "Rustonjee Vicoajee Jevanjee Pestonjee." What a nice name! what a mouthful of peculiar words! Who can this be with so many "jees," in such a high position? He must enjoy quite a "jee-up" reputation.—Ibid.

TAKE CARE OF YOUR HEALTH.

To a young man who asked of Horace Mann counsel to guide him towards success in the legal profession, that extraordinary man replied tersely, promptly, and definitely. He opens with the following very common-sense and important suggestions touching the necessity of health:

"First, you need health. An earnest student is prone to ruin his health. Hope cheats him with the belief that, if he can study now without cessation, he can do so always. Because he does not see the end of his strength, he foolishly concludes there is no end. A spendthrift of health is one of the most reprehensible of spendthrifts. I am certain I could have performed twice the labour—both better and with greater ease to myself—had I known as much of the laws of health and life at twenty-one, as I do now. In college, I was taught all about the motions of the planets, as carefully as though they would have been in danger of getting off the track if I had not known how to trace their orbits; but about my own organisation, and the conditions indispensable to the healthful functions of my own body, I was left in profound ignorance. Nothing could be more preposterous. I ought to have begun at home, and taken the stars when it should have come their turn. The consequence was, I broke down at the beginning of my second college year, and have never had a well day since. Whatever labour I have been since able to do, I have done it all on credit, instead of capital—a most ruinous way, either in regard to health or money. For the last twenty-five years, so far as it regards health, I have been put, from day to day, on my good behaviour, and during the whole of this period, as a Hibernian would say, if I had lived as other folk do for a month, I should have died in a fortnight.

"Health has a great deal to do with what the world calls talent. Take a lawyer's life through, and high health is at least equal to fifty per cent. more than brain. Endurance, cheerfulness, wit, eloquence, attain a force and splendour with health, which they never can approach without it. It often happens that the credit awarded to the intellect belongs to the digestion. Though I do not believe that genius and encephaly are convertible terms, yet the former can never rise to its loftiest heights, unaided by the latter.

"Again: a wise man, with a great enterprise before him, first looks round for suitable instruments wherewith to execute it; and he thinks it all-important to command these instruments before he begins his labour. Health is an indispensable instrument for the best qualities, and the highest finish of all work. Think of the immense advantage you would have in a suit in court, if, after a week's or a fortnight's investigation of facts, you could come in for the closing argument on the last day, fresh and elastic, with only so much more of momentum and fervour for the velocity and the glow you had acquired."

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

A man cannot be generally admired, if his merits are above the general comprehension.

LIFE is most wearisome when it is worst spent.

AIM HIGH.—A writer well remarks, that men are often capable of greater things than they perform. They are sent into the world with bills of credit—and seldom draw to their full extent.

CONTINUAL CHANGE of course is continual loss of momentum.

You can't prevent the birds of sadness from flying over your head, but you may prevent them from stopping to build their nests there.—Oriental Proverb.

GENERAL HAPPINESS can have no other basis than the universal law of justice and love.—Victor Scholchen.

MAN'S INHUMANITY.—If a man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn, what is the effect of man's inhumanity to woman?

WERE the true visage of sin seen at full light, undressed and unpainted, it were impossible, while it so appeared, that any one soul could be in love with it, but would rather flee from it as hideous and abominable.

MISCELLANEOUS.

EDUCATION.—A parliamentary paper lately published, contains a copy of minutes, dated April 2, 1853, by the Committee of the Privy Council of Education, respecting grants for the support of schools in agricultural districts, and grants to promote voluntary assessments towards the expenses of school building in rural districts. Such schools may receive grants towards the expenses of the preceding year at the rate of 6s. per scholar in boys' schools, and 5s. in girls' schools, if the number of scholars be under fifty. Above fifty and under a hundred, the grants are 5s. for each boy, and 4s. for each girl; and if the number of scholars be above a hundred, 4s. may be granted towards the expenses of the instruction of each boy, and 3s. for each girl. These rates shall not diminish on account of any increase in the number of scholars, until the increase is such as to make the reduced rate for the higher number balance the unreduced rate for the smaller number. The grants, however, are conditional, and shall only be awarded in case the income of the school from endowments, subscriptions, collections, and school pence, shall have amounted to 14s. per scholar in schools for boys, and 12s. per scholar in schools for girls, exclusive of the annual value of the teacher's house or other school buildings. There are other conditions respecting attendance, the contributions of the scholars, the qualifications of schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, and the training of pupil teachers. With regard to voluntary assessments towards the expenses of school buildings, the Committee of the Privy Council have resolved that whenever school room is wanting in any parish under 5000 inhabitants, and in case the owners and occupiers of property shall raise a sum equal to one-half of the estimated outlay for the erection of suitable premises, the committee will grant one-half of the same outlay.

AN ECCENTRIC MILLIONAIRE.—Pope has told us how some old people "die and endow a college, or a cat." We have seen, even in our time, some eccentric bequests; but here, in Paris, we have a dying millionaire, who is perplexed with the wildest phantasies that ever were aroused by Death's approaching footsteps. This old man has been sadly annoyed by finding his couch incessantly surrounded by crowds of country cousins—even to the third and fourth generation—who, sniffling, vulture-like, the carrion from afar, have flown hither, to hover over the death bed. In order to scare away the vultures, he has intimated to them that he will select as his heir any of his relations who chooses to bind himself to accompany his body into the vault, and remain there for twelve months. During this period, he engages that a sumptuous repast shall be provided daily in the charnel-house; and at the expiration of the twelve months he will settle 20,000 francs per annum on the sharer of his grave. The relations have recoiled before this strange condition, and it has been accordingly extended to other persons not connected with the dying man; but the conditions are less favourable. He simply offers 1000 francs per month so long as the person remains in the vault with him. A provincial actor, and a couple of bankrupts, are candidates for this legacy; but the authorities are going to interfere, to prevent the desecration.

TASTE.—There is more uniformity than is generally imagined in the taste of individuals. There is more uniformity in their taste than in their actions—and why? Because they are passive to the operation of principles, while in the act of judging of works of art; but it is not possible for them, on all occasions, to be so while performing the business of life. We never know the better and prefer the worse, in matters of taste. If we err, it is through ignorance. But an ignorant man can never be a man of taste. From nature he may have had a good judgment, he may be able to seize the more obvious distinctions of things—but he will never make a perfect discrimination between what is beautiful and what is showy. The power to do that is taste. Taste is, indeed, nothing more than the result of repeated actions of the mind, of numerous comparisons of most delicate distinctions. It is the habit of applying knowledge to distinguish rapidly between truth and beauty in works of imagination and their mere resemblances. If we sometimes consider taste as something distinct from judgment, it is because the mind that has been trained to judge arrives at its conclusions so rapidly, that it seems to know by intuition. We lose sight of the operations of the mind, on account of their celerity, and thus imagine that those are faculties distinct in nature, which are only degrees of the same thing. The differences in kind which appear in this faculty of judgment arise entirely from the different degrees of imagination which are united with it. The man who has much fancy will be led to exercise his judging faculty upon such terms of beauty and loveliness as art and nature have presented to his imagination.

REMARKABLE CLAIRVOYANT REVELATIONS.—On Christmas Day I visited a professional clairvoyant, who lived near the Revere, Boston. The husband of the lady first presented himself, asking me if I wished to consult her about anything lost or stolen, because she declined answering those questions. I said no—I wished her to go to England, and tell me what my friends there were doing. He then fetched her into the room, made a few passes before her, when her eyes were closed, told me to take her hand, made a few more passes over our united hands, and left the room, telling me I might question her. She described my brothers and sisters very correctly—told me the names of two of them. I then took her into a house of a friend in Liverpool, which she described accurately and minutely, as well as each member of the family, and told me what they were all doing: whether she was right in the latter, I had no means of ascertaining. She was wrong in the occupations she gave to my own family at that time. She told me I should soon see a gentleman from my native place, who would tell me a great deal about my friends—which I did in two days after. I asked when I should return to England, and whether I should travel north or south in my next journey? She replied I should not return to England so soon as I expected, and my next journey would be south. This was the case, though I did not believe it then, for I expected to go to Canada. I suppose I expressed my incredulity in some way, for she said, "I cannot talk to you so well as many—you don't believe what I say; you think I guess, but I don't—I only tell you what I see." At the expiration of twenty minutes—the time allowed for a dollar—her husband returned, and I, not caring to look further into the future, paid my money and departed.—An Englishwoman's Experience in America.

THE BELGIAN LAW OF DIVORCE.

SOME few years since, a young Belgian lady, fresh from her convent education, appeared in society, captivated a young fellow-countryman with well-oiled hair and patent leather boots, and after an acquaintance of a few weeks married him. The happy pair sojourned, as is often the custom abroad, with the father and mother of the lady. The young wife was a gay lady, and her husband was quite as gay a lord. At every ball and party in the capital they were present; and, as married ladies are especially selected by continental gentlemen for what they call "adoration," the young wife, although she got no more of it than she liked, was honoured with considerably more than pleased her husband. The latter remonstrated—the lady rebelled—and "my wife's mother," ut solent matronas, supported her daughter. The husband settled the matter by putting on his hat and referring to his own paternal mansion. The marital feud was now intense; the conjugal couple were only of the same mind touching one single subject—application to the tribunals for a divorce. This was done; but the Belgian law will allow of no such annulling of marriage contract until the angry parties have renewed their demand for a divorce once every year for three years. Our young couple nourished their wrath during this triennial period of probation—thrice made the demand—and were duly summoned last year to hear consent given that they who had been one should henceforth and for ever remain two. From different sides of the court the married pair witnessed the untying of the knot; and, when they were free, they passed out at the common portal into the public street. Approximation fired friendship, and the gentleman offered his hand to the lady in token that there was no longer malice between them. Friendship had no sooner lit his torch than he illumined the slumbering cinders on the chilled altar of love; and the young couple walked together to their first married home, whence the husband has never since permanently withdrawn.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. B. F.—When a gentleman and lady, known to each other, happen to meet in the street, the lady should speak or bow first. If she do not, the gentleman must not notice her, for she has given him an intimation that she does not desire it.

DONCASTER.—Break off the engagement at once. The girl is a flirt, and ought to be punished for her levity. To justify yourself, make public the cause of your rupture.

OWEN GLENDALE.—The river Wye has its source near the summit of Plinlimmon Mountain, in Montgomeryshire. It runs between Radnorshire and Brecknockshire, and then flows into Herefordshire.

ANNE P. G. wishes to know why second love is the strongest? Because it is more rational. What is called first love is very often no love at all—so that the second attachment was the only one that ever really existed. First love is a passion, an aberration of the senses, a creature of ungovernable impulses. It rarely leads to marriage. When it does, it is only under the most auspicious circumstances—such as compatibility of temper, equality in position, and moral idiosyncracies—that happiness is the result. Second love borrows strength from the judgment rather than the passions—therefore it promises to be more durable.

J. D. W.—Imprisonment for debt did not exist in the age of Moses, but appeared to prevail about the period of the dawn of Christianity. It was therefore an invention of more modern times. It took its present form in the middle ages, when the owners of the soil adopted every means by which they could screw the utmost farthing out of their dependents, and the tenants resorted to every expedient they could discover, or prevail upon the legislature, whom they bribed, to adopt, by which they could fence themselves round with every possible species of security against losses incurred in their unrighteous traffic in the accumulations of the nation. Feudalism and usury were the parents of the modern infliction of imprisonment for debt; and when trade and commerce arose, it was only natural that those engaged in them should, when the necessity occurred, avail themselves of the law in all its stringency.

H. F. L.—The personal property of an intestate who dies, leaving neither wife nor children, goes to his father—if none living, then it is divisible among his mother and brothers and sisters, and the children of a deceased brother or sister. The division is into so many shares as there are mother and brothers and sisters; the mother taking one, and each family of children the share their deceased parent would have taken if living.

H. E.—The sentiment contained in the lines—

Let the dull wretches dream o'er heaps of wealth,
And in the search for more still waste their health;
To bounteous nature, I my song will tune,
And make my whole life long a honey-moon—

Is applicable to the present time. It is folioitiously expressed, but we cannot name the author. Can any of our readers?

L. T. A.—The wife of a transported felon cannot legally marry again. The law is very exact on this point—perhaps unjustly so—but still such is the fact. A conviction, followed by a lengthened incarceration—say seven years—ought, on the application of the wife or husband, as the case might be, to be a sufficient reason for a complete divorce. Morality would be benefited by such a change in the law.

SNOWDROP.—You quarrelled with a gentleman who formerly paid you attentions, and he became only a friend. Now he makes you a confidante of his attachment to your cousin, and you have discovered that you doat upon him. Very likely. When you thought he had no fancy for any one else, you thought you had not much for him, and treated him accordingly. You are only punished for an indiscretion—but probably he is only acting a part. Cousins are convenient, when a rejected lover wishes to recover a lost or abandoned position. You must consult your self-respect, and shun his society.

E. M. M.—In business, a man should use the name or names he received at the baptismal font, or by which he is generally known. If he is rightly plain John Smith, he should not describe himself as John Shakespeare Smith. An alias is awkward. But when a man has many names he should use the first, or the first and second. Too many initials often form a ridiculous word: for instance, Thomas Augustus Granville makes T. A. G.

HENRY MILES.—The husband of Lady Jane Grey was the fourth son of Admiral Viscount Lisle, first created Earl of Warwick, and afterwards Duke of Northumberland. The family name was Dudley, and the unfortunate young man inquired about was christened Guildford Dudley, and called Lord Guildford by courtesy. His martyred wife always styled herself "Jane Dudley."

T. G.—Every treatise on what is termed the intellectual and moral development of the present age, must be read with caution. Few writers understand the present age, although they pretend they do. How can they reason soundly, when the hurricane of life rages around them? Besides, no age understands itself. It is all impulse. It cannot examine its conditions as a geologist would the strata of the earth. It is happily reserved for posterity to accurately measure intentions. While the cauldron of life is bubbling, the brain cannot be trusted—it cannot define itself.

JUVENIS.—In the event of the Prince of Wales ascending the throne, by what title would he be recognised? Would he be Edward VII., or Albert I.? The name would rest with himself. The queen chose her second name, and we think the country would prefer that her successor should be distinguished by the patronymic borne by the most illustrious sovereigns of England. Albert is a German name—Edward purely English.

ROBERT WRIGHT.—The moral crime known as a breach of promise of marriage, is only known to the common and civil law. The municipal law does not recognise such an offence. But the civil law is severe when it can be. A defendant not paying the damages, through inability, or from a worse motive, cannot take the benefit of the insolvent laws immediately. He must undergo a previous lengthened imprisonment.

MARTIN.—The country is not ruled by Downing Street, or parliament or church—but by the circumstances and principles which constitute society in its moral, mental, and industrial aspects, and also come with every fresh development, just as new ideas dawn upon the mind after a combination of previous impressions. The mind and morals of a country are mighty agents in its progress; but in the material condition of that country lies the foundation of every one of its outward manifestations; and knowing this—as every one of average attainments must know it—we think that at no period of our national career was it more imperative that the whole community should trample on the shams called politics, and examine boldly our present position and future prospects as a great country.

CALISTA has for some time past been receiving attentions from a young gentleman who professes to be her friend. He has, by his preference for her society, awakened warmer feelings than those of friendship. She thinks he reciprocates her sentiment—for he always escorts her wherever she goes, and is very jealous; but he never avows his love by look or word. Calista has always conducted herself towards him so that he has not the slightest suspicion of her feeling. A clear case of mutual attachment. The gentleman wishes to make a deep impression on Calista's heart before he declares his passion. Cool-headed men don't contract love engagements without much previous sensible consideration.

THOMAS WILLIAMS.—A marriage in France, between a member of the Roman Church, and a Protestant, is legal, when solemnised by the civil process.

MARY JANE must wait patiently until the gentleman declares his passion. Calling twice in one afternoon is certainly significant, but not proof positive.

DAMIAN DE LACY.—For the last time, we must state that we are in the fifty-third year of the century, and that the period of 1853 years will not be completed until midnight of the last day in the year. Our era commenced at midnight in the beginning of a century. If it had begun with Anno I. the first whole century and the first whole year would be represented by different characters; but it did not, and this is the fifty-third year: on the same principle, we say a person seventeen years and three months old, is in his eighteenth year. Only for notation, the figure representing the year must be used prospectively.

R. N.—We have a fancy that we have seen your "Enigmatical Love Letter" before. It is easy to read as will be perceived.

She	One	He	One
Only	Only	Only	Only
Are	But	Am	But
You	Loves	I	Is
And	That	And	There
He	One	Me	Same,
Only	Only	Unto	The
Are	But	You	For
You	Loves	Say	Me
And	I	And	Requite

CACOTHES SCRIBENDI.—Church courtships are desecrations. The Moslems were wise to keep the women out of sight in their temples, and the Jewish plan of separating the sexes is advisable. We cannot give any advice. As you have made such good use of your eyes, you ought surely to know that you have a tongue in your head also.

W. M.—You ask, "Ought public-houses to be closed on the Sabbath Day?" Yes. But at the same time close every other place of public resort. Shut up the parks, the coffee-houses, and water-side promenades. Do not draw a line anywhere but at Sunday—the whole Sunday, and nothing but Sunday.

RED RALPH.—You say you are in love with a woman twelve years your senior, but suspect she is by no means in love with you. Very likely—nothing more so—for she is not only twelve years ahead of you in age, but twenty-four in knowledge, and forty-eight in sentiment. A cold bath would relieve you.

CLIO (Glasgow).—The young lady you do not know stares at you broadly every time you meet her, and has done so for more than two years. And her eyes are hazel. Have you not stared at her? The Die Vernon race of girls do not like to be beaten. What you had best do is to bring the matter to a termination by boldly accosting her. Our own opinion is not favourable to her. The sooner she leaves off staring at a strange young man the better it will be for her self-respect. The tongues of young men run quite as fast as those of young girls.

EPAMINONDAS.—Love correspondence is a matter of taste. A lover's letter is prose run mad. But the safe rule is to be simple and true. Love itself is exaggeration, but expletives do not strengthen a cause that is in itself a very strong expletive. You may pile the agency too high. Just tell her what you really think—do not sermonise—and if you love truly, you cannot be ridiculous.

T. W. C.—We consider Keats to have been one of the greatest of poets. His large ideas were all beautifully enunciated; his small ones were music itself. Who can forget his—

And she forgot the stars, the moon, and sun,
And she forgot the blue above the trees;
And she forgot the dolls where waters run,
And she forgot the chilly autumn breeze?

or that description of himself—for Keats had the sensitive soul of a virgin woman—where he refers to the bird that trills his lay when the "lamps in Jove's high palace shine:

Thou wast not born for death, immortal bird!
No hungry generations tread thee down;
The voice I hear this passing night, was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown;
Perhaps the self-same song that found a path
Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
She stood in tears amid the alien corn!

E. H.—When the intended husband is forty-four, and the bride twenty-six, there is no disparity. Such an union promises every felicity. From forty to fifty is the summer of a man's life—from twenty-six to forty-five that of a woman's.

D. C. L.—We like to see both sides of a question fairly put. And as we have not yet expressed an opinion either way, there can be no objection to publish yours. You state, that "It is certain St. Peter did not die after the year 66 or 67, the 13th of the Emperor Nero. Now, in 63 he was, as stated by the Bible, either at Jerusalem, or Caesarea, or Antioch. He had not reached Rome in the year 68, since he is not even mentioned in the salutations of the Epistle to the Romans, written that year by St. Paul. In 62 he was not there either—for we do not find him among the brethren who welcomed St. Paul on his arrival in that city. In 66, also, he could not have been there—since it is not possible to believe that, had he been there, he would have deserted Paul, his brother in the faith, when the latter writes—'I abandoned him in his first defence before the emperor.' 'Supposing,' says Neander, Vol. I., p. 169 (Bohn's translation), 'we admit the tradition that Peter visited Rome, it is impossible to believe that he founded that church, or was ever bishop of it.'"

MONT BLANC.—There are four distinct periods, or ages—if you like the term better—in the life of man. They are his spring, summer, autumn, and winter, corresponding to the four seasons. The first commences at birth and terminates at maturity—which by law is fixed at twenty-one; but as some are fully grown earlier and some later, no definite age, at least not to a couple of years—can be assigned. Some men are not fully developed until they are twenty-five; but it may be accepted almost as a rule, that the second period, or summer, is about double the first, and the third period, or autumn, treble the decline, or winter, is the most indefinite. So that supposing the allotted age to be seventy, if we take the termination of the first period at twenty-one, the second would end at forty-two, and the third at sixty-three, leaving a period corresponding to a third of each, or a ninth of the whole three, for the last scene of all—frosty-headed winter. But as this is far exceeded—the late Duke of Wellington, notwithstanding the hardships he encountered during twenty years of his early life, nearly doubled his maturity—we say far exceeded in innumerable instances, it follows that the duration of our lives, in a great measure, is under our own control. If we go too fast in the two first periods, the third must be darkened and abridged, and the final one be brief indeed. It has been observed that the men who die about fifty did not take care of themselves between the ages of twenty-five and forty. Nursing an enervate body after forty won't do. At thirty, turning over a new leaf may afford a chance of reaching seventy; but it is safer and nobler to begin well at maturity, when all the youthful pulses play merrily, and the pure red blood dances joyously from the heart to the brain, to prepare the system for the bloom of summer and the harvest of health, wealth and happiness to be gathered in the autumn.

LIONEL LINCOLN.—Your cure for drunkenness is not original, but as it seems feasible, we insert it. First ascertain the quantity of spirits or other intoxicants the wife, or other person, partakes of daily, and how many times taken; then, if the party—by way of supposition—swallows a pint of gin in twelve doses, or draughts, three grains of tartar emetic in the gin will, in ordinary cases, suffice; thus the party, without actually being sick, will suffer from a constant nausea—will, in fact, be exceedingly unwell, without knowing the cause—and this will engender the disgust that will effect the cure. The preparation being both tasteless and harmless, the same quarter of a grain doses will do in malt liquors. It dissolves readily in spirits, and from its colour—pure white—does not alter the colour or taste of spirits or malt liquors.

ELLEN SAVILL.—You have, without your parents' consent, engaged yourself to a young man whom they dislike, and who has lately provoked them to dislike him more. What shall you do? Having acted indiscreetly all along, you must break off the connection. Parents have generally sound reasons for their inveterate dislikes. Besides, as the young man has taken no pains to ingratiate himself with your parents, but rather widened the gap between himself and them, he cannot have loved you with the warmth, generosity, delicacy, and depth of feeling essential to the maintenance of a true affection. There is something wrong about his character. A clandestine courtship is unendurable. It is a snare and a deception. It is the villain's opportunity, the fool's apology. Be wise in time.

ST. AGNES, a young lady aged eighteen, would consider herself most happy in being united to such a gentleman as "Catholicus." She has a small income, is handsome in person, and would not object to correspond with him through the Bristol Mercury.

CLAUDE ST. JOHN, a young man of independence, and not considered to be bad-looking, of very good family, and with excellent prospects, whose principal object now is to meet with a suitable companion for life, most sincerely wishes to hear something more of "Inez," who seems to be the kind of lady he has anxiously searched for during the last two years.

KITTY MCCOO having arrived at the age of nineteen, begins to think she would not object to a comfortable home, if she could find a husband steady and good-tempered; she does not much mind personal appearance, if he has qualities of the heart and head that are unobjectionable. She is tall, with brown hair and eyes, considered pretty, and has £300 per annum.

FRED. HARDCASTLE would be happy to correspond with "Rosa C." He is a country gentleman, of prepossessing appearance, very warm in his affections, generally considered good-natured, of quite a domestic turn, and only wants such a wife as Rosa to make him thoroughly happy.

CLEOPATRA wants a beau. She describes herself as being of the middle stature, with hazel eyes, dark-brown hair, a clear complexion, and a good set of teeth. She is highly accomplished, and passionately fond of music and flowers. She would prefer a gentleman of high birth to riches. Her views are not mercenary, having a snug little income of £800 a year.

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

THE JESUIT, "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER CIX.

Since fortune cannot recompense me better
Than to die well, and not my master's debtor."

SHAKESPEARE.

WHEN Dr. Orme, accompanied by our hero, Farmer Ashton, and the Khan, returned to the house, they were met at the door by Mrs. Jarmy, who, with a face full of importance, informed him that Martin had awoke from the deep sleep into which he had fallen immediately after the examination, and had been anxiously inquiring for him.

"Any change?" inquired the rector, in a tone of alarm.

"Only for the better," replied the old lady. "I heard the surgeon tell the butler that he entertained strong hopes of his recovery. Heaven grant it!" she added. "He has proved himself a good and faithful servant to our late dear master; there are few of us left who served Sir William in his youth, poor gentleman!"

"And did Martin request to see me alone?" said the rector.

"Alone, sir."

"Not Henry?"

"No!"

Feeling that it was a request which he ought to lose no time in complying with, the worthy man directed his steps to the chamber of the sufferer, whom he found propped up in his bed upon pillows. Despite the agitation which he had recently undergone, his manner was calm and collected; the expression of his features was of profound thought. Occasionally he passed his withered hand across his wrinkled brow, as if to smooth the deeply-indented lines which his cogitations knit there.

Once or twice he muttered to himself, "Would I were in the stable: I should think better there—better there! I never could collect my thoughts half so well in any other place!"

Dr. Orme seated himself by the bed-side, and silently took the hand of the speaker. The old man raised his clear, blue eye, and gazed upon him for some moments in silence. Tears at last began to trickle down his pale and furrowed cheeks. He thought of the words the baronet had spoken to him at midnight, in the library at Carrow, when he discovered to him the secret recess in which to conceal his will.

"Cheer thee, old Fidelity!" said the clergyman, kindly. "I have great hopes of your recovery."

"It is not of myself that I was thinking," murmured Martin, with a sigh: "what was my worthless life to his? I have been thinking of my dear, good master and his sufferings! I wish to see you, sir, to inquire respecting his will."

The rector explained to him the manner in which that important document had been abstracted from the person of the lawyer, and the share which Will Sideler had taken in that mysterious transaction.

During the recital, the brow of the sufferer became yet more deeply wrinkled, and he nodded and smiled significantly.

"But do not fear," continued the narrator; "although you and the rest of Sir William's faithful and attached domestics have been deprived of the reward of their services—a provision for their age, which I am sure my lamented friend had made—I will see that his intentions are not defeated."

Martin waved his hand impatiently.

"You shall never wait!" added the rector.

"It is not that—it is not that!" exclaimed the aged groom; "what matters whether I close my days in the poor-house or die in a ditch, so that those he loved are cared for? And no trace, you say, has been discovered of the will?"

"None!"

The speaker was not aware of the aint clue which Elworthy had obtained from the valet of the late Captain Elton.

"It is time I spoke, then," said Martin, with resolution. "I cannot find it myself, but I can direct you where to place your hand upon it."

"The will?"

The old man nodded in the affirmative.

"A few days before the murder of my master," he continued, "Sir William sent for me into the library, and directed me to disclose to him the secret places where, in troublesome times, his ancestors had been accustomed to conceal the heirlooms, jewels, and family plate, together with the title-deeds of the Mowbray estates.

There are a dozen such hiding-places, at least, in the abbey. I pointed out two to him. In the first we deposited the treasures and records of his house; in the latter," he added, "the duplicate copy of his last testament."

"Great heavens!" exclaimed the rector, deeply agitated by the importance of the discovery, which filled him with hope and confidence; "we shall defeat the machinations of his enemies yet!"

"We shall."

"Where are they?"

"To only two persons in the world," continued the aged domestic, "dare I reveal the secret."

"Two persons!" repeated the rector, with intense anxiety.

"Yes! I have a secret; or each. To my master's friend I may point out the will; but to his son alone dare I disclose the secret of the treasures and the papers: and I shall live to see him," he added, with sudden energy, at the same time grasping the arm of his hearer; "I am sure I shall! God will not permit the bad man to inherit! The rightful heir will be found! I shall see him in his father's place! I could not die till then!"

"Heaven grant it!" said the worthy clergyman. "heaven grant it! But the will, Martin—the will! The happiness of Ellen's life depends upon it!"

"Where is my dear young lady?" inquired Martin.

"With her relative, Colonel Mowbray, whom the Chancellor has appointed guardian of her person and fortune!"

"He her guardian!" exclaimed the old man, passionately. "Heaven help her, then! for she is in the hands of one who never yet respected the ties of blood, the helplessness of woman, or the confidence of man! Listen to me!" he continued. "On the night I met Sir William in the library, he used these words. I treasured them in my memory, as I did every syllable which fell from his honoured lips. 'Martin,' he said, 'I have selected you as the oldest servant of my house, and Dr. Orme—a true and valued friend to whom I intend to confide the secret—to be the guardians of my last will, to be produced only in the event of accident or crime causing the disappearance of the one in the hands of my solicitor.' The second casket, he added, was never to be disclosed but to his son. In pointing out where the first is concealed to you, I feel I but fulfil his wish. He would have told you himself, had not the hand of the midnight murderer cut short his thread of life."

"The will! the will!" exclaimed Dr. Orme, impatiently.

"You know the library, sir?"

"Yes! yes!"

"And the shield in carved oak over the chimney-piece?" asked Martin.

"I have observed it a hundred times," replied the rector; "it has the device of the Mowbray family:

"IN TRAN VAST. (IN FIDELITY FIRM!)"

Seldom that a race has better merited it."

"Press the bleeding hand in the shield upwards," continued the old man, "and it will disclose a small recess, in which you will find the testament. Heaven grant that it prove not too late to defeat the villany of his unnatural brother! who, unless I wrong him, rejoices more at the prospect of succeeding to Sir William's estates than sorrows for his loss."

The speaker was overcome by the effort he had made, which, added to the excitement of the previous examination in the morning, severely taxed his strength. Within a few minutes after the disclosure, he turned upon his side, and slept like a tired child.

Dr. Orme silently left the room.

"The mist—the mist disperses!" he murmured, as he descended to the apartment in which he had left our hero; "and the hideous outline of all the actors in this dreadful tragedy appears more and more distinct! We shall recognise their features soon; for Will Sidelar and the young Indian, I suspect, are not the only authors of this cruel murder!"

Henry's first inquiry, on the return of the rector, was for Martin. He did not ask the subject upon which the poor old man had sent for him; but his looks betrayed the anxiety he endured.

"He is better—much better!" answered the rector; "and has communicated some important information."

The Khan and Farmer Ashton appeared scarcely less interested than our hero.

"Touching the last will of Sir William."

"The will?" eagerly exclaimed his hearers.

"Yes!" continued the rector; "in a few hours it will be in my possession, and then we may defy the usurped authority of Colonel Mowbray!"

He was about to relate all that had passed in the sick man's chamber, when the door of the library opened, and, to the astonishment of all present, the ayah entered the apartment. There was an air of sullen resolution upon her dark countenance, which indicated a struggle between her feelings and her purpose. Henry—conscious that she had ever been the enemy of his suit to Ellen—beheld her with a feeling of vague mistrust.

Without noticing any of the party present, the Indian woman advanced direct towards our hero, and, gazing on him for a few moments, said, with a sigh:

"So you have returned?"

"To the confusion of my enemies, no doubt!" replied the young man; "among whom I have not to learn that Zara is one of the most bitter!"

"I was your enemy!" observed the ayah.

He looked upon her doubtfully, suspecting that her visit concealed some design inimical to his happiness and love.

"But am no more so," continued the woman; "would I could be; but the strong love of the fair girl hath broken my resolution! It is my heart which yields," she added, scornfully; "not my reason!"

"Explain!" said Dr. Orme, impatiently; "what mean you?"

"In two hours," replied the ayah, "Ellen and Meeran Hafaz will stand together at the altar—the priest is ready—and—"

"Never!" exclaimed our hero, interrupting her; "never—never! The thunders of heaven are not idle terrors—they will not sleep, and see the orphan girl who loved Sir William as a child should love its parent, plight her faith to—"

"Any but the man her uncle's love designed for her!" hastily interrupted the Khan: evidently he had some reason for preventing the speaker from finishing the sentence.

Zara looked alternately at both the speakers: she was ready to save her foster-child, but worlds would not have tempted her, had she known it, to utter a word to compromise the safety of Meeran.

"Heaven will not prevent!" she observed, with a scornful smile; "but her own resolution can and will! She is armed—armed against her own life! Meeran may clasp her hand, but it will be that of a corpse!"

The heart of Henry bounded with gratitude, love, terror, and admiration, at the devoted constancy of his betrothed.

"Save her!" he exclaimed, "and I will bless you! Not for myself, but for her sake I ask it! Remember it the child you nurtured at your breast—who loved you with such confiding affection, till you—"

He paused, not wishing to complete the sentence, fearing it should offend her.

"Betrayed her!" said the ayah, fixing her eyes steadily upon his agitated features.

He was silent.

"Had I seen," she continued, "one girlish weakness—detected one irresolute movement of her heart—I had persevered! But I cannot sacrifice the child I have nurtured! On one condition I will save her—bestow on you the choicest treasure earth can yield—the being whose love you have won, who would brave death for you!"

"Name it—oh, name it?" exclaimed the excited youth.

"If gold," added Dr. Orme, "fear not to state your price! I am rich, and, to secure the happiness of my adopted son, will cheerfully satisfy your avarice!"

His speech was cut short by the scornful glance of the Indian woman.

"Gold!" she repeated; "how the sons of Europe judge the rest of mankind by their own sordid nature! Could you count down to me the treasures of India—all my unhappy country has been plundered of by your accursed race—it would not tempt me! Zara is not to be bribed or bought, save through her feelings!"

Both the rector and Henry were struck by the simple dignity of the speaker's manner, as she pronounced the above words. It was impossible to doubt them, for the accent in which they escaped her was that of truth.

"Promise me," she continued, "that you will not raise your hand—seek directly or indirectly—to injure Meeran Hafaz, and I will prevent this marriage; refuse me this, and I remain a passive spectator of all the misery that may follow!"

This was a sore trial to the lover of Ellen, who looked upon avenging the death of his benefactor and the outrage to his niece as a sacred duty—a legacy bequeathed to him by the dead. He could not promise, if that promise involved the immunity of Sir William's assassin. With a pale countenance and quivering lip, he refused the pledge which Zara required.

"I cannot give it," he said; "and I will not deceive you! I will hunt the villain through the world!"

"Farewell!" said the ayah, coldly; at the same moment advancing towards the door of the library.

It was now the Khan's turn to interfere.

"Stay!" he whispered to our hero; "your refusal has been rash and inconsiderate! Have you no firmer reliance on the justice of heaven? Think you its powers are so limited that it can find no other arm, save yours, to execute its purposes? Leave him to that which sooner or later must overtake him!"

Henry hesitated.

"Remember," added Dr. Orme, speaking in the same under-tone, "that human justice is already on his track!"

"Well, then," said the young man, after a momentary struggle with his feelings, "unless in self-defence, or to protect those whose lives are far dearer to me than my own, I solemnly promise never to raise my hand against my rival!"

"And you will keep your pledge?" demanded Zara.

"As I hope to call Ellen mine!"

"This well," she continued. "Ellen is at the abbey! In two hours she is to be forced into a marriage which her soul abhors: it is to take place in the library; her uncle and the false, painted sepulchre—the heartless thing he calls his wife—will both be present! I will place you where you may witness everything which passes; and at the moment when all but heaven and Zara appear to have deserted her, step in and save your bride!"

"The library!" exclaimed the lover, bitterly; "it is indeed the fitting place for such a crime—it is fitting that the scene of the first sacrifice should have been chosen for the second! Come, come," he added, turning to the rector and the Khan; "my heart is consuming with its own impatience—the blood mounts to my brain, like fire from the volcano's troubled bosom! Let us to the abbey!"

"It is not yet the time," observed Zara.

"We must have assistance," added the rector; "wait the return of Joe and his friends."

"It was this I feared," said the renegade, placing his hand upon the arm of our hero. "I was aware of the place where her worthless uncle had sequestered his innocent ward, but would not disclose it till the fitting moment! Be cool," he added; "suffer your impetuous spirit to be guided by those whose judgment passion cannot lead astray!"

"Cool!" repeated the youth, dashing his hand aside; "Cool! when the deadly serpent has already twined a poisonous fold around the innocent dove—when ruffian violence threatens the maid I love—my boyhood's earliest dream—my manhood's crown and hope! Cool!" he repeated, bitterly; "I must change my nature first!"

Without waiting a reply, he rushed from the apartment, and the next instant was seen dashing like a madman over the lawn and through the shrubbery of the rectory garden.

"He will ruin all," said the Khan, "by this impetuosity! It is his destiny—who can avoid his fate?"

The affection of Farmer Ashton and Dr. Orme took a more active form. The latter ordered his carriage to be got ready on the instant, and both prepared to follow.

"Take me with you!" said the ayah.

"Why?"

"To watch that the mad boy fulfils his promise—woe to him if he breaks it!"

"I, too, will accompany you," added the Khan; "I have a debt to pay both to the living and the dead: the moment, perhaps, has arrived."

A few minutes later, the carriage, with the rector, Farmer Ashton, and the speaker, was rolling over the common at a rapid pace, in the direction towards Carrow Abbey.

CHAPTER CX.

Lead forth the victim, trembling, pale—
Her tears are but the bride's sweet sorrow;
Fling over her the silver veil—
Her eyes will sparkle bright to-morrow.

BRIDE OF THE RHINE.

No sooner was Red Ralph safely ensconced among the lofty branches of the sycamore tree at the end of the avenue, than he began to reflect on the best means of preventing the Rev. Mr. Twinetext's arrival at the abbey. Although not over-gifted with intelligence, in the legitimate signification of the word, he was far from being deficient in that which is its general substitute—cunning—a quality which he resolved on the present occasion to exert to the uttermost, in order to prove his gratitude to Joe Beans, whom he looked upon with the same species of savage affection and reverence with which an Indian might regard the first civilised son of Europe that had crossed his path.

Several times during his cogitations he regretted that the scene of his difficulty was no longer at Cromwell House—it would have been so easy there.

Joe had forbidden him to execute his first intention, of breaking the reverend gentleman's neck or leg: he felt monstrously inclined to disobey him.

"I mun do summat," he muttered, as he swung himself backwards and forwards, with a gentle movement, upon the branch—most probably to assist the laborious process of thinking—"more nor watch—that can't do I or Joe any good! I bean't such a fool as folk do think I!"

Several times he scratched the rugged red mass of hair upon his poll—it would not do. In his embarrassment and desire to distinguish himself, he might have exclaimed, with the poet:

My invention comes from my pate
As bird-lime does from furze: it plucks
Out brains and all.

More than once he came to the conclusion that his first idea was the best one.

"I mun break his neck or his leg," he muttered, "arter all! There be nought else left for it!"

Fortunately for the reverend object of his cogitations, Ralph, after having all but settled the point in his own mind, cast his eyes around to take a survey of the place, and noted that at the end of the avenue there was a broad, deep ditch—in fact, it might almost be termed a moat—which separated the garden-ground round the house from the rest of the park. It had originally been dug to prevent the deer or cattle from destroying the shrubs and flowers. A luminous idea immediately seized him, and his little, deep-set, ferret-like eyes sparkled with joy and mischief. The ditch, which was only partially filled with water, could only be crossed, except at a considerable distance lower down, by a rustic bridge, intended merely for foot passengers—the carriage drive being at the opposite side of the park.

"It 'll do!" he said; "it 'll do!"

Carefully descending from his elevated perch, he glided down the trunk of the tree, and seated himself, just as he saw the Rev. Mr. Twinetext approaching up the avenue, evidently fatigued with the weight of his carpet-bag.

The urchin began to whistle: a sure sign that he meditated mischief.

"Holloa, parson!" he exclaimed, as the gentleman reached the spot where he was seated; "thee best a plaguy time in getting round! I be here afore 'ee!"

"And what do you want with me?" inquired the pedestrian.

"I! nought. That is nought partikler!" answered the lad; "only I thought as thee wor kind to I, and g'd I five shillin', thee might speak a good word for I to some of the farmers!"

"Are you out of work?"

"Ees!"

This, we are sorry to say, was not exactly true; but Red Ralph was troubled with few scruples of conscience, as far as regards uttering an untruth, when he had any purpose to gain.

"And how came you to leave Mortlake?" inquired the gentleman, who perfectly recollected him, not only from his unorthodox appearance, but as one of the most troublesome and mischievous lads about the place.

"That bean't fair, parson!" replied the boy, with grin. "I didn't ax thee—it won't a bum-halif tho'!"

The querist coloured slightly, and asked Ralph no more questions. The answers were embarrassing.

"Here!" he said, giving him the bag, the weight of which had tired him; "bring this after me to the house, and I will give you a shilling."

"Beest thee a-going there?"

"Yes."

"But they do say it be haunted!" observed the cunning urchin, with well-affected hesitation.

"Stuff!—nonsense!"

"Thee won't ax I to go in?"

"Go in!" repeated the gentleman; "certainly not!"

"Then I'll take it!" exclaimed Ralph; "thee doesn't mind the ghosts more nor I do Master Remnant's cows—it be thee trade, loike. I allays heard folks say parsons are a match for ghosts!"

"Pooh! pooh!" ejaculated the former curate of Mortlake.

"And the old un, too!" continued the lad; "that is, when they wor good parsons, I suppose!"

Not wishing to prolong a conversation in which he received so many not unintended hits—although they were uttered with great apparent simplicity—the Reverend Mr. Twinetext inquired if the little rustic bridge to which he pointed, was not the nearest approach to the house; and, on being answered in the affirmative, resumed his walk, leaving Ralph to follow with the bag. Just as he reached the centre of the plank—for the bridge consisted only of one, and a single handrail—the lad, with a vigorous effort, hurled him in.

So completely was the unprincipled man taken by surprise, that he could offer no resistance, but continued for several minutes to flounder in the stream, till he had passed under the bridge.

Ralph's delight at his achievement exceeded, if possible, that which he had felt at the capture of the warreners. A parson was so much higher game!

"Rascal! villain! I'll—pooh! I'll break every bone in your skin!" roared the gentleman, at intervals between his splashing and floundering—for the water was unpleasantly deep, and the banks so much elevated that without assistance it was impossible he could extricate himself.

"When you catch I!" answered the urchin.

"Help me out, I say!"

"Noa, noa," replied Ralph; "I had too much trouble to get thee in!"

"I'll—I'll give you a guinea!"

"Noa!"

"Two, you rascal!—that is, my good boy, I mean!"

"Noa! Thee beest a-lying, I am sure—sartin!"

"Why so?"

"Because thee didst call I a good boy! Now I be an't a good boy—an thee know'st it!" added Red Ralph; "nor I don't think I be quite a bad un! Summut like thee, parson, in t' water—a cross 'twixt a goose and a raven!"

This was the nearest attempt at a witticism which the speaker had ever been known to utter; and either the deed or the novelty so amused him, that he threw back his head and grinned and shouted with mirth—very much to the annoyance of the reverend Mr. Twinetext, who, by alternate menaces and offers of money, tried to induce his tormentor to assist him out of the ditch.

"I can't do that," replied the urchin; "thof I could find in my heart to help 'ee, for the fun thee hast made for I; but I'll tell 'ee what I'll do for 'ee!"

"What?" impatiently demanded his victim.

"Sit on the rail here, till constable comes to take 'ee to prison, and see that thee does not quite drown thee-self."

At the allusion to a constable and a prison, the reverend gentleman secretly felt more alarm than he thought proper to express, and he once more renewed his offers to Ralph—but with no better success. The boy gravely seated himself upon the slender rail, and continued to watch the fate of the parson, and for the arrival of Joe.

A danger which neither the tormentor nor the object of his persecution had foreseen, at last presented itself, in the shape of a solitary swan—one of the pair which Ellen had been accustomed to feed. The keepers, since the abandonment of the abbey, after the death of Sir William, had grown negligent, and some poacher had shot its mate.

As the bird came sailing majestically down the stream, it erected its feathers, and emitted that peculiar half-hiss and half-croaking cry, which indicates anger.

"Ralph—Ralph!" shouted the clergyman, "do you not see?"

"Ees, it won't hurt 'ee!"

"Help me out!" continued the parson, seriously alarmed—for the bird, with no very amicable intentions, was approaching most uncomfortably near to his person. "You will be hanged, you young villain, for this!"

"Not if swan kills 'ee, parson!" roared the boy; "that be an't my fault—I didn't set un on. But I won't bear no malice to 'ee," he added, as the hostile intentions of the bird became more and more apparent; "here be a stick to help 'ee."

So saying, he threw to the discomfited clergyman a strong switch of black-thorn which he carried in his hand, and then settled himself as comfortably as the narrowness of the rail would permit, to watch the issue of the contest: which, as he afterwards described it, "wor a sight more curious nor cat-hunting."

The Rev. Mr. Twinetext contrived to steady himself by grasping the branches of an overhanging willow with his left hand; whilst with his right, which was armed with the stick Red Ralph had thrown him, he prepared to ward off the attacks of his antagonist, who, with stately evolutions, sailed in semicircles round him—gradually approaching nearer than was agreeable to his person. The neck of the bird was thrown gracefully back, as if ready to strike him, and its plumage erected till its body appeared considerably larger than its usual size.

"Mind his wing, parson!" roared his tormentor; "they do hit plaguy hard, I've heerd folk say."

Even Ralph began to feel uneasy at the fury of the contest which ensued. The swan, now thoroughly enraged, rushed, rather than swam towards the man, whose presence in its own peculiar domain had so greatly irritated it, and directed a succession of blows with its powerful wing at the intruder's head, who parried them with a dexterity which might have been more naturally expected in a prize-fighter than one of his sacred calling.

"Bravo—bravo!" shouted the urchin, at the same time clapping his hands with delight.

These exclamations were renewed at intervals, as the bird, whose courage and fury increased at the blows it received upon its pinions and body, renewed the attack. Sometimes it would sail sullenly away to a short distance, with its plumage depressed—then it would suddenly wheel round, erect its feathers and arch its wings, and rush with fresh ardour to the contest.

"Egad, parson," observed Ralph, highly amused at the result of one of these attacks; "but he hit thee then!"

Twinetext began to feel seriously alarmed—for the strength and rage of his antagonist appeared to increase rather than diminish with the contest. He had already received several severe blows from the pinions of the bird, and he roared out hastily for assistance.

"It be no use, I tell 'ee!"

"Help—help!" shouted the parson.

"No one will hear 'ee!"

Ralph was mistaken. The cries of the clergyman and his own wild shouts of laughter were heard in the house. A side door was opened, and two of the servants of Meeran Hafaz appeared—they were both of them well armed.

It would be difficult to say whether or not the confederate of Joe Beans had ever heard the well-known line, that the better part of valour is discretion. Most probably not. But he certainly illustrated it in the present instance; for no sooner did he perceive the man, with their guns, advancing towards him, than he slid rom the rail, and crept, with the agility of a stoat, or wild cat, into a thick clump of underwood—from which retreat he had the mortification of seeing his old enemy, the parson, dragged from his perilous situation in the ditch. To be sure, he appeared more dead than alive: so that Ralph was not altogether deprived of consolation.

One of the servants returned with the Rev. Mr. Twinetext to the abbey. The other, directed, doubtless, by some information which he had received, began to cross the rustic bridge, carrying his gun upon his shoulder. He stopped to pick up the carpet-bag, which had been dropped there in the struggle.

The boy waited to see whether the man intended to proceed any further than the bridge, before he decided how to act.

"I am off!" he muttered, as the domestic crossed it. "Guns, and such-like bludgeons, be an't no good! Ah, look!" he added, as he noticed that the man began to peer into every clump of shrubs and underwood that he passed; "thee must have sharp eyes to find I!"

With as little noise as possible, Ralph pushed his way through the brambles and cover; nor paused till he had placed a considerable distance between himself and his pursuer.

During the day, both Colonel Mowbray and his precious lady had been considerably puzzled to understand the calm, quiet demeanour of Ellen. The poor girl neither descended to complaint nor entreaties. Both, she knew, would have been unavailing. Once or twice, when her glance encountered that of her unprincipled relative, his eyes sank beneath her gaze. His wife, on the contrary, impudently braved it. Like most little minds, she felt a degraded pleasure in tyrannising over any one who had either mortified her vanity, or otherwise offended her. She would have been delighted to have seen Ellen kneeling at her feet, and imploring her pity or protection; but the petty triumph was denied her. The orphan felt that she must rely upon herself, since all human aid appeared to have deserted her.

One consolation—and it was no trivial one—she possessed in the midst of her sorrow.

Meeran Hafaz scrupulously kept his promise, and had not intruded upon her presence. She knew that she must meet him in the library at the hour appointed; but she had fortified her soul with prayer, and was prepared for the fearful interview.

"I scarcely know what to make of the girl!" observed Lady Mowbray to her husband, as they left the chamber of their persecuted niece. "She is not sullen or resigned!"

"True!" observed the colonel, with a sarcastic smile. "She is like most women who have been defeated!"

"She does not consider herself defeated, I am certain!" answered her ladyship. "There is something which I cannot comprehend—which—"

"You had better not puzzle yourself to find out," said her husband, interrupting her; "since, in a few hours, it will explain itself! Would the night were over!" he added. "I am tired of the presence of this Meeran!"

"And I, too! But of course you will keep faith with him?"

"Of course!" replied the colonel. "How else am I to obtain the fortune of my niece? Once married, and on their voyage to India—which I should recommend the bridegroom to arrange as soon as possible, for many reasons—"

"And I, also!" chimed in her ladyship, significantly.

"My mind will be at rest," added the gentleman, concluding his previous speech.

"And mine, too! When does the Rev. Mr. Twinetext arrive?"

"I expect him hourly!"

"Of course," said the lady, "he can be depended on?"

"Of course!" answered her husband. "I seldom fail in the choice of my instruments!"

To Ellen the departure of her unworthy relatives had been a relief; it enabled her to fortify her mind with prayer. She did not require it to strengthen her resolve: love gave her nerve for that.

Firmly as she had decided upon sacrificing her life rather than be forced to give her hand to the man whom she felt to be in conception, if not in act, the murderer of her uncle, it was not without a struggle that she had taken the dreadful resolution.

"Heaven will pardon me!" she repeatedly murmured to herself; "it is the only choice between perjury and dishonour!"

During the day she had written two long letters: one containing a touching farewell, to Henry; and the second explaining the reasons of her voluntary death.

"It will vindicate my memory to the world!" she said, placing the last epistle under her pillow, "and perhaps avenge it!"

The one to her lover, having been passionately kissed and bedewed with her tears, she concealed in her bosom. She felt that it would one day reach him—his eyes dwell upon every word her trembling hand had traced. It seemed to unite, by some invisible chain, the living with the dead; for such, despite the promise of the ayah to preserve her, she already considered herself.

There was something fearful in the desolation of one so young and innocent—rich in the world's gifts of birth and fortune, as well as nature's more costly one of beauty—which in her case had proved, indeed, a fatal dower—fatal not only to herself but to her friends: since it had caused the madness of Meeran Hafaz—the murder of her uncle—the sufferings of poor old Martin and Henry.

Yet she was scarcely conscious that she possessed it.

"It is hard to die!" she murmured—"die, without one being whom I love to close my eyes, or bid the parting spirit peace—die alone and unlamented! Not un-lamented!" she added; "one noble heart, at least, will mourn my destiny!—one true arm avenge it!"

The time-piece in the chamber of the prisoner struck the hour of seven. She shuddered, as the sound reminded her that, in two hours more, the crisis of her fate would be decided.

Throwing herself upon her knees, she fixed her eyes upon the portrait of Sir William, which, at her urgent entreaty, Colonel Mowbray had directed to be removed from the picture-gallery to her apartment.

"Spirit of the dead," she exclaimed, "watch over and protect me!"

CHAPTER CXI.

Be thy heart bold, thy weapon strong,
Avenge thou Blanch of Devon's wrong.

SCOTT.

RED RALPH had not retreated more than half a mile through the thick underwood and young plantations, before he distinctly heard the tramping of approaching footsteps in an opposite direction. He paused, scratched his shaggy head—his usual resource when puzzled—and reflected for a few moments what he should do.

"If I go back," he reasoned, "I meet the chap with the gun, who would no more mind shooting I, than I should mind shooting a rabbit! If forwards, I tumble into the hands of the lord knows who!"

The prospect, it must be confessed, was not very inviting, and the boy made the best choice, perhaps, that was left him, when he decided upon continuing his route. He thought it better to fall into the hands of those whom he did not know, and who might prove friends, than into the grasp of one respecting whose hostile intentions there could be very little doubt.

If Ralph could not reason, it must be admitted that he sometimes jumped to very safe conclusions.

Fortunately for his inventive powers, which, as well as his reasoning ones, were exceedingly limited, he had not to draw upon them again; for, listening attentively, he recognised the voice of his friend and patron, Joe Beans—who, with a party of rustics, was on his way to the abbey. With a shout, he sprang from the covert where he had crouched to meet him, exclaiming, in his usual chuckling voice: "that he wor never so glad to meet a friend in all his life."

"Why?"

"'Cause I be folloed!" replied the boy.

"And who follows you?"

In as few words as possible, Ralph explained to him his adventure with the parson and the swan. The anger which the young man at first felt at the lad's having disobeyed his injunction, and quitted the tree, was allayed when he discovered that it had been the means of delaying the arrival of the parson, whose presence, he instinctively felt, boded no good to the happiness either of Ellen or his dear Master Harry. So great had been his anxiety that he had not returned, as he had promised, to the rectory; but proceeded, as soon as he had gathered a party of friends in the village, at once to the abbey.

This party consisted of half a dozen stout young fellows who had been the companions of his and Henry's boyish sports. There was not one of them but would have risked some danger to serve either Joe or his friend.

As the expedition was considered entirely under the command of the last-named personage, he proceeded to point out the manner in which they were to approach the south side of the building.

"But how are we to get in?" demanded one of the young men.

"Doors be all locked!" added Ralph.

Our readers have not forgotten the means by which, on a previous occasion, Joe and the sexton had obtained entrance to the deserted mansion, when they visited it with poor old Martin in their company. He resolved to enter it in the same manner now.

Just as they were about to proceed, they were startled by some one breaking his way through the copsewood near them.

"Here be he!" exclaimed Ralph, thinking it was his pursuer; "but I be an't afraid on un!"

One or two of the young men, who were armed, levelled their guns, not knowing what or whom to expect.

The branches were dashed on one side, and Henry Ashton, his hair wild, his clothes torn with the furze and brambles, stood in the narrow, open sward before them. In order to arrive at the abbey sooner, he had taken the direct route to the house—neither plantation nor lake had stopped him: he had broken his way through the one and swam the other. His heart and brain were on fire—he looked and felt like a madman—in every breeze he fancied he heard the despairing cry of Ellen appealing to him for help. No wonder that it unnerved him.

"Harry—Master Harry!" exclaimed the faithful Joe; "stay—here be true friends to serve thee!"

Our hero, who was about to pursue his headlong career, stopped at the sound of the well-known voice of his humble friend.

"Joe!" he said.

"Ay, Master Harry! ready to die for you, if it be necessary; but I need not tell you—you know it all!"

"I do!"

"That Miss Ellen—"

"Is in the abbey, in the hands of her uncle's murderer—of her enemy and mine!"

"We'll have her out!" exclaimed one of the young farmers, resolutely, "if we pull down the old walls! What! you do not remember me?" he added, seeing that Henry Ashton gazed upon him with an inquiring eye; "true, I have been absent from Carrow these seven years, but I have not forgotten the generous fellow who, when we were boys together, jumped off the point to save my life, at the risk of his own!"

"I cannot thank you," replied Henry, grasping him by the hand; "but you have well repaid my boyish services by your assistance at this hour!"

Whilst Henry and Joe were arranging their plans, and giving the necessary instructions to their friends, Red Ralph—who, with that terrier-like instinct which constituted his highest claim to intelligence, had thrown himself upon the sword, with his ear close to the ground, to catch the first sound of an approaching footstep—suddenly started from his recumbent position, exclaiming, with a loud voice:

"They be a comin'!"

"Who?" demanded our hero.

"Don't know—but here they be!"

The rustling of the branches announced that the intruders were not far off. Ralph slunk round to the rear of his friends, as a measure of precaution: not that the boy was naturally a coward, only—to use his own words—he had a natural antipathy to guns, pistols, and such-like bludgeons. No sooner had he taken what he considered a secure position, than the Khan and Farmer Ashton made their appearance. They had heard, from some idler on the common, that Henry had been seen to scale the wall of the park; and they had quitted the carriage to follow him—the trampled grass and broken branches of the trees affording them sufficient clue.

"Uncle!" exclaimed our hero.

"Thank God," said the honest farmer, removing his broad-brimmed hat, and wiping the perspiration from his sun-burnt brow, "we have found thee at last! What wouldst thee do?"

"Proceed at once to the abbey!" replied the young man, with flashing eyes and quivering lip; "meet this hated Meeran face to face—rend the trembling dove from the vulture's gripe, and—"

"Kill her!" said the Khan, in a calm, deep tone; "break your promise to the ayah, and provoke a contest which may end fatally to one or both of you! You must be patient!"

"Patient!" repeated the agitated lover, "and know the serpent near the heart of her I love, ready to sting it! Patient, whilst the monster has already twined its hideous coils around her! You speak like a man to whom affection, duty, manhood, are but shadows—not breathing realities!"

"Don't 'ee, Harry!" said his uncle, in a tone of entreaty. "Don't 'ee speak so to him—thoe mayst one day repent it! He—"

A look from the renegade seemed to prohibit his giving utterance to the words which were about to follow.

"Mr. Ashton, I am sure," he said, "will be guided by those who can have no other wish than his happiness and welfare! The rector and Colonel Butler are under the guidance of the ayah."

"I mistrust that woman!" interrupted Henry.

"She will not deceive them now!" continued the speaker; "place yourself under my directions. To me the ins and outs, recesses, and quaint nooks of Carrow, are better known than to any living man, except poor old Martin. I will conduct you where, at the appointed moment, you may step between Ellen and your rival—Meeran and his passions."

The doubting youth regarded him for an instant in silence: it was possible that he might be sincere in his offer; equally possible, too, that the Khan might deceive him.

"And what pledge have I of your fidelity?" he demanded.

"Simply that my life will be in your hands," replied the renegade, "if I betray you! You are armed; the weapon in your hand, resolution in your heart and eye. If I prove false, level, and strike me dead!"

"And I will, too!" muttered Joe; but so inaudibly that the words were only caught by Ralph.

"Don't 'ee talk of such an unnatural thing!" exclaimed the farmer, with a look of horror; "better a thousand times that Henry should break my old heart—nay, e'en kill me—than harm a hair of his—"

"Friend's head!" hastily added the Khan, finishing the sentence for him. "You are right: I am indeed his friend—his true and faithful friend—although the headstrong boy will not believe it! Farewell!" he added, turning away; "I would have served you, had your rash humour and headstrong will permitted me!"

"Stay!" exclaimed our hero, taking him by the hand. "I am wilful, but I am not ungrateful! Something whispers to my heart that I am bound to trust you! Did you know," he added, "how that heart has been wrung, its confidence abused, its feelings trampled on, you would wonder that so much faith in my fellow-man remained!"

"Tis well!" said the Khan, withdrawing his hand, with an air of restraint. "You have decided wisely!"

By his direction, the party, instead of proceeding in a direction towards the abbey, made their way to the little ruined pavilion, which jutted over the wall of the park, where the ayah had held her first rendezvous with the renegade.

"Here be stairs!" exclaimed Red Ralph, who had run on before; "but door be locked!"

Several of the young men offered to break it open.

"It needs not," replied their guide; "the entrance is not from the apartment above."

"Where, then?" demanded the impatient Henry, whose heart and mind yielded alternately to the most cruel doubts or hopeful confidence.

"Here!" said the Khan; at the same time pointing to a large stone under the staircase, which rose on the exterior of the building. "This is the entrance to the passage which communicates with the little vaulted chamber in which was discovered the gibbern of the warrener, and is connected, by a similar contrivance, with the library."

All present felt that the speaker had thrown an additional light upon the circumstances of Sir William's murder.

Henry could only extend his hand in token that he was—so impatient did he feel to tread the gloomy maze, and reach the scene of action. By a simple contrivance the stone, which turned upon an iron axis, was made to revolve, disclosing an aperture sufficiently large for them to enter one at a time. Joe Beans was about to proceed, when his friend placed his hand upon his arm to restrain him:

"No, Joe!" he said; "not even to you can I resign the post of honour!"

"But it may be one of danger, Master Harry!" observed the faithful fellow.

"The greater reason that it should be mine!"

"But if any harm—"

"Joe," said the young man, "I cannot dispute! My heart and arm are steel! I will!"

His friend at once gave way. Few who knew him, ever contended with our hero, after he had once pronounced those words.

But for once he was mistaken: during the contest between the friends, Red Ralph had quietly glided through the aperture.

"Drat that boy!" exclaimed Joe Beans, when he perceived it; "there will be some mischief yet!"

THE LAST LETTER.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

THEY tell me, I am greatly changed,

From that which I have been:

So changed, it would have passed belief,

Had they not known—not seen:

They tell me, my once graceful form

Is waning—pale and thin—

Alas! these blighted looks scarce speak

The deeper blight within!

They tell me, in one little month,

I seem to have lived years;

My ringlets have the shade of age,

My eyes are worn with tears:

They say, the beauteous cheek you praised,

Now wears a deathly hue;

And, oh! I feel within my breast,

My heart is dying too!

I do not wish to send one pang

Of sadness to thy soul;

But there are feelings—deep and strong—

We may not quite control:

I do not—do I love reproach?—

Oh! if—forgive—forgive—

'Tis woe to think of thee—and die!

'Tis worse than woe—to live!

My sleep is wild and dark to me,

My dreams are of the dead;

I wake—and bless the light of day,

Though day brings its own dread:

The visions and the tongues of home,

Haunt all my steps with pain;

Till fire is in my aching sight—

And madness in my brain!

This may not—will not—long endure;

I know death's hour is nigh,—

And, oh! 'tis all on earth I ask,—

To see thee—ere I die!

Is it too much for all my tears,

For all my anguish past,

To grant me this—my parting prayer—

My last—my very last!

SLAVERY IN EGYPT.

It is a rule in Egypt that every villager shall bring his tax to the depôt of the sheikh; and every officer his quota to the depôt of the next above him. The sheikh sits in great state at his house, and the Fellahs appear before him. The poor people bring their money, but will not part with it if they can help it. They are too much used to excessive exactions to part with it easily. They know too well that the demands, which even now well nigh exceed the utmost limits of their physical powers to procure, would be greatly increased, if the present amount could be wrung from them with comparative ease. They even boast of the number of nabootings they have undergone; for they feel that they endure them in a good cause.

Hence, when the day of payment arrives, they go prepared to resist to the utmost. The sheikh makes proclamation of the amount each shall pay; and, appealing to Allah and his Prophet, exhorts, with the most fatherly solicitude, all whom it may concern to think of their latter end. And thus in the coolest manner possible this important business is transacted.

The first is called up, and the tax demanded. He refuses—and is immediately ordered to be nabooted (bastinadoed). This he endures with determined constancy. At length, when the suffering overpasses his powers of endurance, the money is slowly produced; and when it is thought no more is to be extracted from him, he is dismissed to make way for another, who will inevitably meet the same fate. He departs without complaining; and rejoicing if he has been able to endure their severity, without giving up a few coins he had concealed under his tongue as a reserve, in case the punishment became too severe.

At the close of the day's business, the sheikh himself finds cause for secret joy, if he thinks he has been able to extort something over and above what the nazir will demand from him, as a speculation for himself. But woe be to him if he has obtained less. He is treated with the same severity as the poor Fellahs are by him. He may be bastinadoed, or sent to the galleys—i. e. to work in chains in the dockyard of Alexandria or at the forts of Aboutkir. It is no uncommon thing to see a whole train of these marched through the streets of Alexandria. Some have even worked at the galleys for years, and have then regained their office, upon handing over the necessary bonus to the pasha. They are sometimes paraded in public places on donkeys, with their faces turned towards the tail—which is esteemed a great disgrace.

The nazirs are themselves liable to similar treatment at the hands of the officers above them, or of the pasha. A curious story is told of the way in which Ahmet Pasha treated a nazir. The nazir was a respectable old gentleman, who had no reason to think he had given cause of displeasure. One day, however, he received a visit from an amiable, soft-spoken personage from Cairo, armed with full powers to represent his highness. The nazir welcomed his guest with politeness and hospitality—not unmixed, of course, with apprehension; and a splendid supper was provided, to refresh him after his journey. When supper was over and hands were washed, the guest, as he delicately parted his well-trimmed moustache with the amber mouth-piece of his pipe, said: "Now to business. With infinite regret I inform thee that I have come the bearer of orders to give thee 500 blows. It will be better for both parties to dispatch this unpleasant affair as quickly as possible. You will allow me, then, to issue the necessary orders." The astounded nazir roared for mercy, but in vain; and while the visitor coolly sat and smoked his first pipe, the operation was performed.

THE OCEAN.

WE speak of the ocean as a surface; and to the first passing glance it appears like a motionless, calm expanse. But an attentive ear detects the soft murmur of the waves rolling in to the foot of the cliffs, and an observant eye at length discovers that the whole infinite surface rises and sinks, as if with a gentle respiration. The sailors call this a "ground swell."

It is but apparent calm that here deceives us. It is no lifeless, motionless mass, but ever moving, restlessly changing, living water, which, like Oceanus of old, winds its embracing arms around the solid land. It is true, the degree of the movement and its phenomena vary in storm and calm; but no peace is granted to the fluid, unstable element. Not to speak of the weight with which the moving atmosphere presses on the surface of the ocean, and disturbs its equilibrium, there are three regular movements of the water, produced by the invisible and imperceptible, but, for all that, irresistible power of the sun and moon, going on almost silently in their appointed course, and yet infinitely grander and more mighty than the most terrible tumult of the stirred elements in the West Indian tornado, or in the Chinese typhoon.

The sun, which sparkles so pleasantly on the crystal surface, is constantly driving the evaporating water upwards by its heat: this ascends as an invisible gas, to fall to earth again as rain and snow. The heaviest rain-drops scarcely make a visible impression on the softest ground where they fall. The falling water exerts a force scarcely worth naming in the mere act of falling. But it then collects into springs, brooks, and streams; and as it again glides gradually down the inclined plains of the land into its mother's bosom, it carries vessels, drives mills, and performs other services in the artificial contrivances of man. The total amount of flowing water in Europe has a power equal to 300,000,000 horses, according to the ordinary mode of calculating for steam-engines. This does indeed seem a great force; but we readily reconcile the idea to our minds, if we think of the bubbling of springs, the rushing of brooks, the roar of large rivers, and the thunder of falls, like those of the Rhine, or the Trollhatta. The human mind only too easily falls into the error of regarding that as mighty which makes a powerful impression upon the senses, and readily yields itself to the mistake of imagining that to be unimportant which works in stillness—unobserved and noiselessly, but unceasingly. Thus it is here also. The ocean, assumed to have an average depth of 1000 feet, would contain some twenty-nine millions of cubic miles of water; and if it were emptied, it would require all the streams of the earth to pour their waters in for 40,000 years before the empty basin was filled up again. The whole force of the flowing waters of the earth is not so much as 1-800th of the force which raises this water to the clouds in the form of vapour. The heat used in this to evaporate this water amounts to a full third part of all the heat which is imparted by the sun to our earth. This amount of heat, during only one year, would suffice to melt a crust of ice thirty-two feet thick, enveloping the whole earth, while all the fuel consumed in France in one year would not be capable of freeing this planet from a crust of ice one-twelfth of an inch thick. According to the technical reckoning, that amount of heat which annually raises the sea-water in the form of vapour, corresponds to the enormous sum of sixteen billions of horse-power! Consequently, a force of more than thirty horse-power acts upon every acre of land; while in the most active of the manufacturing counties of England—Lancashire—the average power employed is only 1-49th of a horse-power per acre, or 1-1470th part of this force.

[CHOLTRY OF 999 COLUMNS, AT MADURA.]

TALES OF THE BRAHMINS.

High shone the sun, and cloudless was the sky, above the ruins of Madura—a very ancient place at the extremity of Southern India; but all this natural glory was profaned by the rites of fiendish superstition. As the hackery containing our friend, the English traveller, and the Brahmin who had been his guide and interpreter during his Indian peregrinations, drove into the village—for the habitable portion was nothing more—they were informed that a widow, in the full bloom of youth and beauty, would that day offer herself up as a sacrifice on the body of her departed husband.

"Who is she?" asked the Brahmin, as he calmly surveyed the crowd, that seemed to have been gathered from every village, farm, and hut in the neighbourhood of Madura.

"The late partner of Ramoa Sand, the merchant," was the reply.

"Does—can the English government permit of such a monstrous thing?" exclaimed the Englishman, indignantly.

The Brahmin smiled. He knew well that the English power would never have risen to such eminence in India, if the government had interfered, to any great extent, with the religious dogmas and practices of the natives. They were too well aware that the barbarous usages of ages could neither be destroyed by a proclamation of the Governor-General, nor abated by the sermon of a missionary, for them to risk anything by experimental experience. They had tried persuasion, but only with local success. If they had attempted to abolish the suttee by any compulsory means, they would have exasperated all the Brahmins throughout the empire, and so have paved the way for the total annihilation of the prestige which surrounded the English name among the bulk of the Indian population. Their authority was too recent, too political, for them to risk its safety by any interference, however philanthropical, with customs which, through the course of centuries of observance, had almost become vital portions of the Brahminical doctrine.

The Brahmin was well aware of this; but, having contracted a warm feeling of friendship for the English traveller, he did not wish to offend him by any remarks derogatory to the English character, and merely said, in reply to his warm remonstrances:

"You English are a very great people; but you are not invincible! You cannot, in a few years, change or improve features which are the growth of three thousand years. These sacrifices are voluntary—purely so; for among the higher castes, it is not infamous for a widow to refuse the suttee. On the contrary, she may do so with impunity; and, in some cases, is even entreated to live. I remember a case of the kind that occurred at Cossimbuzar, not long ago. It was that of a young widow, about eighteen years of age, having, at so early a period, three children. This heroine was eagerly importuned to live, for the sake of the future care of her infants; but, notwithstanding this representation, and though the agonies of death were depicted to her in the strongest terms, she, with a calm and resolved countenance, put her finger into the fire, and held it there until it was nearly half consumed. She then with one hand placed fire in the palm of the other, sprinkled incense on it, and scattered it over the Brahmins! Her friends then interfered, and positively interdicted the sacrifice; but she declared that, if she was not allowed to burn herself, she would starve herself to death! After that, no further opposition was offered, and the sacrifice was consummated."

At this moment the crowd began to run to the bank of a rivulet that encircled the village, huzzaing and energetically gesticulating. The Englishman, impelled by a powerful curiosity, followed them, and found the body of the defunct husband on a bier, covered with linen, and laid at the edge of the water. The crowd evinced such cruel joy, that the Englishman would have warmly expostulated with them; but his companion, the Brahmin, earnestly begged him not to do so.

"It will cost you your life, without saving that of the woman's! Don't interfere—the government would not thank you!"

The Englishman, seeing that neither his single voice nor arm could prevent the brutal spectacle, was fain obliged to acknowledge that discretion was the better part of valour, and remained, passively looking on. At about ten o'clock the wife appeared, attended by priests and music, and some few relatives. The procession was a solemn one, and a dead silence prevailed; but the victim walked with a firm and steady step. Her features were pale, but composed; and the Englishman, as he gazed mournfully at her, saw, with surprise, that she was still young and handsome. Her figure was small, but finely formed; and her hands, arms, and feet were models of beauty. She wore a loose robe of white, flowing drapery, that extended to the feet, and really looked more like a bride than a victim. The procession halted near the body of the husband, and the widow addressed those who were near her in terms of endearment and farewell. She held in her left hand a cocoa-nut shell, in which was a red liquid. Into this she dipped the fore-finger of her right hand, and marked those near her on the forehead. Some of the crowd pressed forward to receive this last mark of attention. After some delay, the body of the man was taken up, and the sacrificial procession moved on some hundred yards to the spot where the pile was raised. The widow followed the bier with a composed—almost stern countenance, occasionally praying with the Brahmins by her side, or conversing with her relatives.

The pile was composed of dried branches, leaves, and rushes, with a door on one side, and arched and covered on the top; by the side of the door stood a man with a lighted brand. The dreadful moment drew rapidly near, and the heart of the Englishman beat violently, as he saw the body of the man placed on the pile, and observed the widow standing before the door, speaking to those near her, and bowing to the crowd.

"What astonishing nerve!" he exclaimed, half aloud, "why her eyes are as clear as stars, and her lips as red as they were on her bridal morn! Ah! she has vanished!"

The Englishman turned away, heart-sick, as he saw the widow slowly enter the pile, and close the door after her. As he did so, the crowd around him began to shout and dance like demons, and he felt rather than saw a column of flame shooting and quivering in the air. The sacrifice was over, and he hurried away, disgusted with the whole exhibition, and dangerously inclined to rush into the crowd like a knight of old, and disperse them with a lance, sword, or any weapon he could lay hold of.*

* "In other parts of India—as the Carnatic—this dreadful custom is accompanied, in the execution of it, with still greater horror. It is asserted that they dig a pit, in which is deposited

His object in visiting Madura had been to inspect the remains of Hindoo and Moorish architecture for which the place is celebrated; and, as he ardently desired to be conducted out of hearing of the horrors being enacted outside the village, his guide, the Brahmin, led him to a choultry that stood at a little distance from the high road by which pilgrims travelled, when on their way to the sacred island of Ramisseram.

The choultry had been a magnificent edifice. It was then, even in ruin, a splendid memorial of the benevolence of the ancient Hindoo character. The various emblems and images of Brahma dispersed about sufficiently attested its origin; and further corroboration was afforded by several white bulls, marching about with the freedom of domestic pets. The Englishman and the Brahmin, having secured a separate apartment, partook of some refreshment; and as all the rooms in the choultry opened to the centre of the area within, they could observe what was passing outside, and at the same time indulge in conversation uninterrupted.

The Englishman could not shut out from his mental vision the pale but beautiful face of the widow, as he last saw it at the door of her funeral pile.

After anathematizing the East India government for their connivance at these brutalising scenes, he began, as his friend the Brahmin said, to talk more rationally.

"What was the origin of the suttee?" inquired he "who first invented such a horror?"

The Brahmin gravely replied:

"At the demise of the mortal part of the great Hindoo lawgiver and prophet, Brahma, his wives, inconsolable for his loss, resolved not to survive him, and offered themselves voluntary victims on his funeral pile. The wives of the chief rajahs, the first officers of the state, being unwilling to have it thought that they were deficient in fidelity and affection, followed the heroic example set them by the wives of Brahma. The Brahmins, a caste then but lately established by the great legislator, pronounced and declared—as no doubt they were authorised by inspiration—that the souls of those heroines immediately cease from their transmigrations, and had entered the first boboon of purification. It followed that the wives of the Brahmins claimed a right of making a sacrifice of their mortal forms to the divinity and the manes of their deceased husbands. The wives of every Hindoo caught the pious flame, and thus the heroic acts of a few women brought about a general custom."

"Say rather the madness!" interrupted the Englishman; "for if the priesthood had not given the custom the countenance of religion, and instituted the forms and ceremonies that were to accompany the sacrifice, it would never have obtained a permanent hold on the Hindoo mind."

"Very likely," assented the Brahmin; "but you must, at all events, give the early exposition of the law of Brahma the benefit of the admission, that they studiously sought to make it a voluntary act of glory, piety, and fortitude?"

a large quantity of combustible matter, which is set on fire, and, the body being let down, the victim throws herself into the flaming mass. In other places a pile is raised extremely high, and the body, with the wife, is placed upon it, and then the whole is set on fire."—Hodgson's Travels in India. So that there are three modes of conducting the sacrifice of the Suttee. 1. The funeral pile—the same in form as that in use among the ancient Romans. 2. The chamber, or hut; and, 3. the pit—the most revolting of all.

The Englishman could not demur to this, but he immediately added:

"Your explanation may be the true historical one, but I cannot think it the actual one."

"Why, O pundit of a great and valiant race?" said the Brahmin, evincing some curiosity.

"Because I think the custom had its origin in the selfishness of the stronger sex. No man cherishes the idea of his wife passing into the possession of another after his death. In his last hours he clings to her in wild agony, and I have no doubt the example of Brahma's wives was eagerly caught at by the men, and an act of devotion to the memory of a man of extraordinary genius in time cultivated into a sentiment, a madness, among the women, which the men encouraged, because it gratified one of the dominant passions of their hearts. Nothing, my friend, is so fierce and selfish as the love between the sexes—it survives beyond the tomb; and you Hindoos gratify the indomitable desire, by coaxing your wives to accompany you into eternity. But you are not singular in that respect. In my own land I have heard a dying husband implore his wife not to marry again. The very idea embitters his expiring moments. One case I remember distinctly. It came under my notice in the character of medical attendant. The man was a rude, untutored labourer, young, and a very giant in strength. He had met with an accident, and could not possibly recover. His wife was a pretty peasant girl, somewhat of a coquette, but quite as illiterate as himself. She sat by his bed-side in all the agony of unaffected grief, and as she hung over him, her hot tears fell on his pallid face.

"Poll!" said he, as his large, brown hand tremblingly played with her curls, "I ain't afeard to die! I've never done nothing to make me, unless it may be giving the blow before the word now and then; but there's one thing on my mind which distresses me."

"What is it, Bill?" sobbed his wife.

"The man, by a desperate effort, raised himself on his elbow, and, fixing a loving and imploring glance on her face, said:

"Promise me you won't marry anybody else when I'm gone, but stick to me like a brick!"

"Oh, Bill, what puts such a thing into your head now?"

"Promise!—promise, Poll! Do, there's a dear! If I thought you were for to go to buckle to with any one else, I—"

"What else trembled on his tongue never was uttered—for he fell back and expired, with an expression on his convulsed features of such intense fear—I might say jealousy—that I shall never forget it. It was selfishness in its most violent, its most passionate and exacting form."

"Is it not better the wife should die on her husband's bier than make a promise she can never keep?" suggested the Brahmin.

"It is. But why ask her to make the promise at all?" replied the Englishman. "Why attempt to continue an engagement broken off by the grave? Should not the wife in that event be as free as the husband?"

"No!" said the Brahmin, with some animation; "for the wife belongs to the husband—not the husband to the wife. She becomes his property, or part of himself."

"And does not the husband equally become a part of the wife, her property, her possession?" retorted the Englishman. "If she is bone of his bone, is not he also bone of her bone? And, above all, does not the spiritual relationship created by marriage subsist entirely on mutuality of interest and affection? You cannot, my friend, make one party to the union different from the other; if you do, there is no union—no marriage!"

"Answer me this question," said the Brahmin, with some warmth. "Can a woman have more than one living husband?"

"No! Both the Divine and human law prohibit such a custom; even among the most barbarous tribes in the world, the practice does not, and never did prevail."

"Very well. Now as a woman can only have one husband, it follows that a wife can only be the property of one man. With the man the case is reversed. He may have many wives, and all of them belong to him as much as the one does."

"Oh no—no!" interrupted the Englishman; "the woman is the equal of the man—his equal in the eye of heaven—in the eye of human policy, expediency, and natural justice."

The Brahmin at this declaration instantly recovered his taciturnity of demeanour, and coldly answered:

"The customs of the east and the west disagree. In the lands where the human race had its beginning, man is lord of the soil, and all that is upon it. Woman is his vassal, and although he elevates her to the dignity of his companion, he does not part with one atom of his authority. What was ordained at the beginning, must endure to the end. Circumstances may modify many conditions, but they cannot change the ordinations of Providence. Woman belongs to man—not man to woman; and while that is the law, the selfishness of man in respect to woman, of which you complained just now, is her safeguard and his birthright. Without it there would be no love, no homes, no cities, no organisations, no society. However, as you are a Nazarene and I am a humble disciple of Brahma, we should never agree, if we were to sit here disputing for a century: so I recommend, as the sun is now at its height, that we sleep—so as to be better able a few hours hence to resume our journey—or talk, just as it will please you."

The Englishman laughingly concurred, and, following the Brahmin's example, stretched himself on the low couch on which he had been sitting, and in a few minutes was as sound asleep as any of the hundred Hindoos and Mussulmen whom the choultry sheltered from the fierce rays of the mid-day sun. When he awoke it was evening, and he was enveloped in partial darkness. On calling out, the Brahmin promptly answered, and together they strolled into the area in the centre of the choultry. The scene was solemn—almost grand. At the entrance, the atmosphere could be seen illuminated by the soft but brilliant silver light of the eastern moon. Some palm-trees in the distance could be observed gently waving.

The sweet wind did gently kiss the trees
And they did make no noise.

Within the choultry a sort of twilight reigned. The massive roof and the innumerable columns, grotesquely wreathed here and there with the enormous head of a carved bull, and on the ground the recumbent figure of a sleeping living representation of the Indian lawgiver, presented a dim, shadowy aspect. The interior looked more like a huge tomb than a hospitable place of shelter; and as the Englishman glanced around, he could not resist subscribing to the opinion, that caverns and grottoes were the original models of all the great masses of architecture in the world, the palaces of the laity, the temples of the various orders of priesthood. In ancient times a good cavern was a superb palace; it is so still, under certain circumstances. And if, as is very probable, the strongest, fiercest, and craftiest—the lions and tigers of the human race—were the first to take violent possession of these natural habitations, and consequently became afterwards objects of superstitious adoration; or if they themselves were the original fountains of systems of superstition, we shall no longer be at a loss to account for the almost universal tradition which characterises rocks and caverns as the haunts and sacred dwellings of the heathen gods, or of the form and gloom of such caverns having been universally imitated in the oldest temples. The ancient architecture of India essentially embodies this idea, and is of itself a convincing proof of the remote antiquity of the remains of the past scattered all over the country, if not of the Hindoo race.

The Englishman, at length, as if wearied with speculation, said to his guide:

"This choultry seems of very ancient date. I should imagine it to be one of the specimens of the earliest style of Hindoo architecture."

"It is older than the Christianity which your English missionaries are so sedulously attempting to introduce into India: tradition assigns its erection to Bickermajit, the eighth and greatest of the solar kings of India."

"I have read a good deal about that celebrated monarch. We are told that in the fifty-sixth year before the Christian era, he, by a series of bold exploits, attained the supreme sovereignty in India. I presume the building has been named after him?"

"No; it is called the '999 Columns Choultry.'"

"How? are there so many? I should not have thought it!"

"Very likely. Frequent spoliation by the Malay pirates, the Cingalese, the Moors, and native robbers, have shorn it of somewhat of its ancient grandeur; but it is still an hotel—if you choose to term it one—larger than any you can boast of in Europe."

"You are about right, there; but in Europe, my friend, in our economical arrangements we prefer comfort to grandeur. However, not to institute comparisons which can scarcely be maintained, can you inform me whether tradition has preserved a memoir of any of the circumstances that attended the erection of this certainly stupendous building?"

The Brahmin answered in the affirmative, and then proceeded to detail the following narrative:

The lord of India, the representative of the sun and moon, the emperor of the Universe, now known to posterity by the unepic title of Bickermajit—in one of his progresses through his empire, came to Madura, then the capital of a powerful principality that bordered on the sea, and protected the extremities of Southern India from invasion. The rajah received him with all due honours, and, during his stay, resigned the administration of justice and the laws into his sovereign hands. The emperor was happy. He had just made a satisfactory tour through his vast dominions, and found peace everywhere prevailing; his tributaries loyal, his subjects industrious and prosperous. But, Sir Englishman, before I relate to you the particulars of the tradition, I must tell you that the accounts given by all, concur in stating that this emperor was one of the most magnificent that ever occupied the throne of India. He is recorded to have been unequalled by any former emperor in the science of jurisprudence, in governing, in fortitude, in justice, and in wisdom. Peter the Great, in modern times, must have had his example in his eye—for Bickermajit travelled, in the habit of a mendicant, over the greater part of the East, so as to acquire the arts, learning, and policy of foreign nations, and transplant them into his own. He was even thought to have taken up arms by the divine command, as Rama did of old, to purge the empire of vice and tyranny. Most certain it is that he exalted aloft, in the centre of the land, the standard of equity and the banners of religion. Both poets and historians are uniform in their praise of this great and just man. The former, to impress us with an idea of his inflexible justice, affirm that the magnet, without his permission, dared not exert its power upon iron, nor amber upon the chaff of the field; and the latter add, such was his temperance and contempt of grandeur, that he slept upon a mat, and reduced the furniture of his apartment to an earthenware pot, filled with water from the spring. He was also a munificent patron of learning, and the poet and philosopher, Calidas, who flourished in his reign, was particularly protected by him. The latter was considered the chief of fourteen learned Brahmins, whom the emperor had invited to his court from different parts of Hindostan, and who were denominated the fourteen jewels of his crown. To animate the religious zeal of the inferior classes, he set up the great image of Mahi Cali, or Time, in the city of Oojein, which he built while he himself worshipped only the infinite and invisible God.

Such, O Englishman! was Bickermajit, when, towards the end of his long and brilliant reign, he visited Madura, and, seated on a throne radiant in diamonds and precious stones, he could lay his hand on his heart, and say, "I have done my duty." Some few days before his departure, he gave public audience to all the great men in the principality, and as he showered favours around him with a prodigal hand, he was continually entreating to be informed what better return he could make for the splendid hospitality he had received at the court of the rajah. All present, save one—a churlish old man who had lived apart from his fellow-creatures, and was in great repute for wisdom and sanctity—loudly declared that his munificence was unbounded, and more than they had deserved.

"Nay," interposed the monarch, "you must allow me to be the best judge of what is due from myself in return for favours received! Kings should be generous as well as just. They should be beneficent for many generations—not one; therefore, if you will give me leave, I will tell you what I have resolved. Having considered that your honoured and valiant city of Madura, on account of its holiness, and contiguity to the holy places where the great works of Brahma, as well as other illustrious avatars of the deity, were studied and perfected, is much frequented by pilgrims from all nations—by the poor, the halt, the lame, and the blind—I have bethought me that I should best express my gratitude to you and posterity, by erecting a resting-place in which the poor will find bread, the afflicted consolation, and the pious shelter."

This announcement was received with deafening applause, in the midst of which Calidas, the great poet and philosopher, rose, and, after obtaining silence, said:

"O emperor! I should wish that this lasting memorial of your magnificence should also be a lasting monument of your goodness! And would wish that the columns that shall support its mighty roof should be in number the same as that of the good deeds by which you have covered your name and reign with eternal glory!"

Several of the nobles and Brahmins exclaimed against the impracticability of the proposition. "Count the stars, or the shells of the shore!" cried some, while others boldly asserted that it would be impossible to enumerate the good deeds of his majesty. The emperor alone was silent, although inwardly pleased with such homage. The discussion was conducted in a very lively tone for some time, and the Rajah of Madura was on the point of rising to declare emphatically that he could not think of having his humble territory made the cause of putting his majesty to such enormous expense, when the churlish old man before-mentioned hastily averred that he could himself build such a choultry as that suggested by the learned Calidas.

Amazement seized upon the brilliant throng, and, in the midst of a profound silence, Phoon, the ascetic, repeated his assertion.

"Old, feeble, and poor as I am," he said, "I will myself undertake to build a temple of charity, supported by as many pillars as the emperor's good deeds will number!"

"The man is mad!" chorused the fourteen Brahmins—the jewels of the imperial crown.

The rajah was indignant, and was about to expel the daring ascetic from the presence-chamber, when the emperor interposed, and desired Phoon to speak freely.

"I will, O king!" answered the seer—for in his day Phoon had vaticinated among the sacred piles at Mavalipuram. "I am no flatterer. I have breathed the free air of heaven too long, to feed even monarchs with the poisoned honey of false praise! Give me but until to-morrow, and I will make good my word!"

The emperor cheerfully assented, and the court broke up in considerable agitation. On the morrow Phoon appeared at the foot of the throne with a long roll of parchment in his hands. The emperor was in a gracious mood, and smilingly commanded him to redeem his promise. Phoon obeyed the royal order, by presenting to the emperor the roll of parchment. As the latter perused its contents his brow darkened, and, after a long and oppressive pause, he exclaimed:

"What, all this straw, and not one grain of rice! Calidas, this holy man has read us a lesson—a bitter one; and not the less bitter for being true! Read, so that the world may know the true character of him who has been styled the greatest of the illustrious—Surya-Varsha!"

The court philosopher, as he ran his eye down the Sanscrit characters, hesitated, and, it is reported, turned saffron in visage; but the emperor was peremptory, and he tremblingly read aloud the contents of this remarkable document, than which a stranger or more audacious one had never been presented to an insignificant, much less a powerful sovereign. It contained an analytical summary of the most distinguished incidents in the life of the reigning monarch; described all his great battles, his patronage of literature and science, his temperate habits, his wisdom and benevolence, his self-denial, his zeal—everything that is generally imagined to elevate the character of a great potentate, and concluded with these remarkable words: "I find that his Majesty the Light of the World has performed 999 great deeds; but among them all, I cannot discover a good one. He has laboured for himself—not for mankind. His people are as wretched as when he ascended the throne—the tyranny of princes as insolent—the bigotry of priests as furious—the advent of the truth as remote. His grandeur is his own grandeur—his greatness his own greatness—his glory his own glory. He has failed in everything, but in gaining the applauses of all time. He is a great king; his memory will survive through untold ages; but, as his labours have only gathered splendours round himself and throne, he has not performed one of the good deeds that heaven expects from a king; and therefore do I say, that with these aged hands will I erect every pillar in the contemplated house of charity."

Shouts of laughter and derision hailed this singular denunciation of one of the most popular monarchs that ever sat on the throne of India; and the cynic would have been sacrificed on the spot, had not the emperor mercifully extended to him his protection, and dismissed him, with a safe escort. The princes and nobles present then unanimously resolved that, in refutation of the slander, they, at their own cost, would erect a choultry, supported by 999 columns, in commemoration of the manifold virtues of their beloved emperor, and as a solid memorial of the appreciation and unchanging affection of the millions who had lived and flourished under his beneficent rule.

The tradition at this point becomes obscure. It refers to an interview which the emperor had with the cynic, wherein they elaborately discussed the 999 points of excellence in his majesty's character; and concludes with the following passages.

"Is not my adoration of the infinite and invisible God a work of goodness?" demanded the emperor.

"No!" was the emphatic reply; "it is a mark of selfishness. You erect idols for your subjects—while you fall down before the truth for your individual advantage. Besides, O king, you have not worshipped the Invisible for His glory, but for your own safety. You have wished God to care everything for you, while all the while you have done nothing to show that you cared about Him! Where is the Church to Him on earth? O king, you are wise and great, but you are not good! Self is the only God before whom you have sincerely prostrated yourself!"

"Such, Sir Englishman!" concluded the Brahmin, "is the legend connected with this imposing Hindoo edifice; and I have only to add, from historical records, that the great Bickermajit, towards the close of his reign, made some serious endeavours to be regarded as a good as well as great emperor. He attempted to ameliorate the condition of the lower castes, to put a curb on the wantonly exercised authority of his rajahs, to reform the church—but he failed in them all; and was slain, in his old age, about the commencement of the Christian era, in a battle against a confederacy of the princes of the Deccan. From which melancholy termination to a life of brilliancy, I derive this reflection—that kings should never attempt to be good if they would be great, and continue to be great. Goodness consists as much in negative as active qualities. Therefore, kings who wish to be celebrated for their achievements, must only aim at greatness. When they do more, they inevitably topple down from their high places, and, coming to the ordinary level of their subjects, are either sacrificed to their rage, or consigned to an inglorious desuetude by their contempt. SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

NOVEL MODE OF HATCHING CHICKENS.—The Stamford Mercury mentions that a novel mode of hatching chickens has been put into operation in Lincoln, on the premises of a fellmonger. The eggs are placed in water, which is kept up to the requisite warmth by means of a solar lamp, and many fine chickens thus hatched are running about the premises.

HOROLOGICAL CRADLE.—An American has obtained a patent for a new cradle, which moves between two upright columns placed upon a moveable base, upon the principle of the pendulum of a clock. It runs by means of a weight in one of the columns, and when wound up will run 24 hours, or as much shorter time as the nurse may desire.

TRIANGULAR WATER MILLS.—This invention, patented by Mr. G. F. Goble, is admirably adapted to shallow running streams, trifling falls of water, or in tidal actions. For tidal power it is very applicable, as it matters not what rise or fall of water; the machinery can always remain a permanent fixture where the bottom will admit of such stability. For deep gullies, or ravines, it is also admirably adapted, as the mill-house can be erected on the top, however high, or at the sides, as a few rods' distance creates no material objection to its working. Respecting the greatest power with the least supply of water, we question if Mr. Goble's invention does not obtain such, by reversing the order of his water lever-ages, &c.

MR. CYRUS BALDWIN, of Manchester, N.H., the inventor of the bag-loom now used in the Stark Mills, manufacturer, has invented two looms of wonderful construction, which get greater speed with less power. They have entirely a new shuttle motion, so that the shuttle can be stopped without stopping the loom. They do away with the use of cams, levers, treadles, pickers, and race-rods—thereby saving 75 per cent. of oil used about the looms. What is not less important, they can be used for weaving all kinds of fancy goods, with from one to twenty harnesses.

TEA AT HOME.—It will surprise many to know that we need no longer rely on China for tea, but drink our home-grown English, and so be independent of the foreigner—if such independence is worth caring about. Mr. Alexander Forsyth has addressed a communication to the Horticultural Society, in which he says that, having considered that the tea of Paraguay is a species of holly, he tried our common holly, and finds the tea, when washed, equal to ordinary five shilling tea.

THE REFRACTION OF SOUND.—For some years C. Sondhauss has entertained the belief that sonorous waves expanding in the air must undergo a change, similar to that suffered by rays of light on passing into another medium, and be deflected in a manner similar to the light-rays. To determine the truth of his idea, this observer constructed a lens-shaped vessel, capable of absorbing the motion produced by the sound-waves, and of concentrating them by refraction in a point where the sound might be plainly heard, as in the focus of a concave mirror. Such a vessel was first made of a balloon of goldbeater's skin, the medium with which it was filled being carbonic acid gas; this was suspended in the air, and a weak-ticking watch fixed at the distance of about a foot from it: when, on listening at the opposite side of the balloon, in the direction of its axis, the listener seemed to hear the ticking in that direction more distinctly than at an equal or even less distance in any other than this axial one; but, however convincing this result to his own mind, it was scarcely definite enough to furnish conclusive proof of the refraction of sound. The discovery of collodion placed a material at M. Sondhauss's command, with which he was enabled to procure a lenticular-shaped membranous apparatus of considerable size. This was filled, like the former one, with carbonic acid gas, and a watch placed on a level with the centre of one side of this lens—so that the waves of sound produced by the watch, were transmitted through the heavy medium, carbonic acid gas, to the air on the other side. The unanimous testimony of several qualified observers who tested these experiments is, that the ticking of the watch was distinctly audible at a given point in the axis of the lens, whilst out of the axis, at an equal or even less distance, the sound was either weaker or inaudible. A screen held before the watch interrupted the waves, and prevented the ticking being heard; on its removal, the ticking was again perceived. Various experiments with the voice, a small organ-pipe, &c., in lieu of the watch, were made, and all tended to the same conclusion—viz., that the sound was the greatest in the axial line of the collodion lens, by which the sonorous waves are refracted and made to converge to a focus, just as the waves of light are caused to converge by a glass lens.

ON DRYING GOODS IN WARM ROOMS.

ALTHOUGH water possesses a specific gravity eight hundred and fifteen times greater than that of air, yet it can rise into the air as into a vacuum, and mingle amongst it by the same law that gases diffuse through each other. It is this property of water which enables us to have clean and dry linen; for if it were otherwise—if water was the same as oil—our wet clothes would have to be converted into fuel, and burned in the fire before we could expel the moisture from them. Were it not for this property of water, the calico-printers and woollen-dyers could never dry their pieces in shade, sunshine, or stove-room. When wet goods of any kind are submitted to heat in a room, they soon become dry, because the air receives the moisture, and retains it in its soft embrace—thus enabling us to obtain dry goods and dry clothing by the property of evaporation which belongs to water, and the law of gaseous absorption which reigns among the gases. A curious property of the evaporation of water, discovered by Dr. Dalton, is, that the quantity which will rise in a confined space is the same, whether that space be a vacuum or be already filled with air: hence it is only necessary to know what quantity of vapour rises into a vacuum at any particular temperature, to know what quantity will rise into the air. Thus the vapour of water which rises into a vacuum at the temperature of eighty degrees, depresses the mercurial column one inch; its tension is one-thirtieth of the usual tension of air. If water at eighty degrees be admitted into dry air, it will increase the tension of that air one-thirtieth if the air is confined, or increase its bulk one-thirtieth if the air is allowed to expand. A certain fixed quantity of the vapour of water, therefore, can only rise into a certain fixed quantity of air; hence the air of rooms employed for drying goods may become so saturated with moisture, that the fuel may be expended foolishly, in trying to expel the moisture from the goods when it is impossible for the air to take it up—and hence the evaporation of water is greatly facilitated by a current of air. This is the philosophic principle of evaporation embraced by Bessemer, and that mentioned under the head of Recent Foreign Inventions for evaporating sugar syrups.

In evaporating by means of hot air—as in drying goods in the stove-rooms of calico print and bleaching-works—when the rooms are heated by flues running along the floors, it should not be forgotten, by those who have charge of such drying establishments, that a certain time must elapse after the goods are placed in the rooms, before the air is saturated with humidity: due discretion must therefore be exercised, not to let any of the hot air escape until it is saturated with moisture.

It has been proposed, more than once, to employ hot air in raising steam, under the mistaken idea that more steam could be generated with less fuel by the passing of such a rarefied hot body through the water. But in evaporating water by heated air—the way wet goods are dried—the vapour itself carries off exactly the same quantity of heat as if it were produced by boiling the water at 212 degrees; while the air associated with it requires also to have its temperature raised—thus requiring more fuel: hence water can never be evaporated in a drying-room, with so small an expenditure of fuel, as steam can be generated in a close boiler. These facts are well worthy of attention, inasmuch as they relate to different branches of business, in which very many of our people are interested.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CAVITIES AND THEIR CONTENTS IN DIAMONDS AND OTHER GEMS.

SIR DAVID BREWSTER has had his attention re-directed to this subject, from the examination of the Koh-i-noor diamond, made by the order of Prince Albert, before it was submitted to the somewhat hazardous operation of re-cutting and rendering it an ornamental gem, previously to which operation it was far inferior in play of colour to its glass model. Whilst in its former state, it was submitted to polarised light, when, instead of exerting no influence on this kind of light, which would have been the case had it been perfectly homogeneous in structure, it exhibited coloured streaks of light generally parallel to one another—these tinted streaks being precisely similar to those observed in many other diamonds described many years since. By microscopic examination, the Koh-i-noor, as well as the two smaller accompanying stones, exhibited several minute and irregular cavities, surrounded with sectors of polarised light, only producible by the expansive action of a compressed gas or liquid, which had existed in the cavities of the diamond before it had finally hardened. In an external cavity there appeared to exist a yellow solid substance—an observation which led to an examination of several specimens of diamond, in order, if possible, to elucidate the source and nature of this yellow solid. A tabular, colourless specimen was found in the British Museum, on which lay a small yellow crystalline diamond, which Sir David believes, from careful examination, to have emerged in a liquid state from a cavity observable in the colourless table, with which one extremity of the yellow crystal is connected, and which crystallised instantly on its emersion.

To add weight to this opinion, this physicist alludes to some of his previous observations on the liquid contents of some cavities in quartz, one portion of which crystallised on the surface, another portion being dissipated in the gaseous state; and also to some analogous phenomena observable in topazes containing cavities. These cavities are far more frequent in diamonds than has heretofore been suspected, and in one or two cases they are so numerous as to render the stones actually black. Tavernier has described a black diamond which for a long time was unsaleable, until a Dutchman speculated in it and cut it in two—by which he obtained two very fine stones, having divided a large cavity, containing eight or nine carats of what this author terms "black vegetable mud." Dr. Clarke rendered an amber-coloured diamond colourless and transparent by heating it before the blow-pipe. New sources of this gem will probably soon be opened up, since diamonds have been reported to exist among the other mineral treasures of California, and are certainly to be met with in Australia—Sir Thomas Mitchell having brought a beautiful crystallised specimen home with him, which he has placed in the Museum of Practical Geology. When neglect, clamour, and irresolution at home, no longer paralyse the exertions of Sir J. Brooke in his attempt to introduce civilisation into the richest island in the world, the diamond fields of Borneo may well be anticipated to become far more productive than they have been hitherto. This island is generally believed to have yielded the largest diamond on record: it is described as being of an egg shape, indented at one end, of the finest water, and to weigh 367 carats. It appears still to be in the possession of one of the Malay rajahs. Before quitting the subject of the diamond, it may interest the reader to know that the cutting of the Koh-i-noor has been most successfully completed—a success which will, I trust, transplant the art of diamond cutting to this country; and that this gem now forms the centre of a diadem to be worn by her Majesty. Mr. Sebastian Garrard—to whose firm the perilous honour of cutting this trophy was intrusted—regards this stone as being a portion of a large cube, and in no way connected with the famous Mogul diamond described by Tavernier.

Like the diamond, its congener amber—for they are both of organic origin—is very liable to inclose similar cavities containing both gases and liquids; and these have again attracted the attention of Brewster. The cavities in amber are for the most part perfectly spherical, and the surrounding polarising structure is extremely perfect and beautiful; minute microscopic cavities, resembling those of the diamond in their irregular forms, are also frequent. The larger and spherical cavities often contain a liquid. One of these, in a specimen of amber including no less than eight of these cavities, was opened; the liquid exuded was of a dark yellow-brown tint, sooty smell, and of the consistence of white of egg: on exposure to air it gradually dried, leaving a transparent substance resembling amber, turning orange-red under the blow-pipe, then black, and disappeared, but without igniting, as true amber would have done.

The liquid contained in another specimen was very viscid at low temperatures, became more mobile by warmth, and, although not very expansible by heat, readily assumed the vapour state.

Sir David has also described a very singular cavity in a specimen of topaz, containing a viscid and slightly opalescent liquid, of low refractive power, in which some dark flocculi are disseminated; several perfectly formed transparent and brilliant crystals, all loose and moveable in the liquid by inverting the specimen of topaz, occur in the cavity: circumstances which distinguish this from other specimens hitherto noticed—these cavities being of frequent occurrence in topaz, and indeed in many other crystallised minerals, although rock-crystal, the diamond, amber, and the topaz present the most frequent instances of these cavities.

[THE MACHINERY HALL, IN THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION.]

SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION
IN DUBLIN.

In despite of the ungenerous—we should be justified in terming it the shabby conduct of the City of London Corporation, who refused to attend the opening of the Great Industrial Exhibition in Dublin, the undertaking has so far proved eminently successful. It has prospered, although the votaries of turtle did not deign to smile on its inauguration.

This is extremely gratifying, and we hail it as a heart-offering cheerfully indicative of the future of Ireland. We are convinced, after the unequivocal success of this magnificent display of the products of art and industry, that the eyes of the Irish nation will be opened to the material grandeur of material industry, to the glory of labour, and that, agreeing better among themselves, they will turn their earnest attention to the undeveloped resources of their native land.

Already, we are assured, this wholesome sentiment has taken a firm hold of the national mind, and a conviction has become general, that the regeneration of Ireland depends on a mere diffused and skilful cultivation of the soil, the development of her vast mineral wealth, the promotion of trade and commerce, and the establishment of manufactures. Irishmen of all creeds thus having met on neutral ground, have also become deeply impressed with the value and splendour of education, and the consequent folly of indulging in acrimonious feelings on mere differences of opinion. Ireland, in fact, has shaken hands with and bade farewell to the past, and there is every prospect that in their future they will rather cultivate self-reliance, resolution, tenacity, and genuine independence of character, than those chimeras of the imagination which for centuries have bewitched and maddened her naturally warm-hearted people. Her Great Exhibition has progressed under the happiest auspices. The fine building in Merrion Square has daily been visited by thousands; and now that we are more familiarised with its appearance and rich contents, we have more opportunity and leisure to describe them, and more circumstantially comment on the most prominent features.

The building, as we have before stated, is on an entirely different construction from the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. The open area of the interior, supported on columns, is one point of resemblance, and there are others that might be pointed out; but the whole body of light is admitted from above—there being none obtained from the sides—and it is only a portion of the actual roof that is glazed. Thus, the peculiar fairy-like effect of a transparent building is lost; while, on the other hand, and as a counterpoise, there is abundance of light well toned down, and admitted so as to display objects to great advantage. Again—instead of rectangular outlines, broken by an arched transept, Mr. Benson's design, following the light, Oriental style, is distributed in a series of long, parallel halls, with semicircular roofs, and of oval form; the central one being the loftiest, and having an exceedingly striking and novel effect. It is 425 feet long, 100 feet wide, and 105 feet high; but to those who cannot realise these proportions, some conception of them may be given by stating, that it is about twice the size of Westminster Hall. Here, of course, are collected the ornamental attractions of the exhibition—statues, fountains, and trophies of manufacturing skill; while, crowning immense tiers of benches, raised at either end, stand two large and powerful organs, for which the shape and character of the hall seem well adapted. The other halls have their special attractions; for in these, and the galleries adjoining them, the various collections of manufactured articles are arranged in classified order.

THE MACHINERY HALL,

however, must claim precedence over all the others. If not to the eye the gem, it is at all events the most massive portion of the exhibition. Its proportions and meaning are Titanic. It comprises all the great features in the wide realm of art, science, and industry. It shows what makes man the ruler of insensate matter, and what renders nations pre-eminent—not the exercise of the tyrant force of demoralising warfare, but the power of increased intelligence and enterprise, and that agency which, in proportion to its extension amongst us, will not only increase our natural wealth and capital, but will also bring moral blessings in its train more desirable than “much fine gold.” He who contemplates, even superficially, the progress of man, must see that every step is supported by the aid of machinery. When Tubal Cain first worked in metals, he must have had recourse to simple machines to fashion his cunning workmanship. The Homeric age used machinery, and the war-chariot of Hector and the shield of Achilles required machinery to fashion them. In the loom of Penelope was contained an element as purely mechanical as that of Jacquard, the principle being gradually developed with advancing knowledge. The spade and the plough, the first implements of the warfare of man against stubborn nature, were as essentially machines, as the winnowing, threshing, or reaping machines of our own day; and we might as well expect to return to the times when men fought for acorns, or dug roots with their hands from the earth, as to expect that machines should not be contrived, not alone to supplant, but to aid and further human labour.

We may freely admit that temporary evils have followed the use of machinery; but how small the evil, compared with the amount of good. Doubtless the first introduction of power-looms, threshing-machines, stocking-frames, winnowing-machines, by substituting machine-power for human agency, effected a temporary loss upon a small class; but when we consider the enormously productive powers at small cost, the diminution of human toil, the certainty of effect, the comfort and happiness distributed, we must feel strongly the blessings conferred upon mankind by these applications of human knowledge; and when we consider what machinery has done—and which could not be done without it—the working of mines, the propulsion of ships against wind and tide—the powers of locomotion it affords us on land—the methods of measuring time, and many other things which machinery alone can effect,—we feel that if the curse of labour was an infliction on man as a punishment, the accompanying blessing was the intellectual power which enabled him to invent machinery to mitigate the infliction.

In considering the subject of machinery, there are different points of view in which it may be regarded.

We may consider a machine as anything which alters the direction of a force: as when we alter a direct motion, or force, such as that of gravity, the wind, or steam, into a circular one; or which apparently increases a power, by making it act through a longer time or space. No machine actually increases or creates power. The force of the wind on the sails of a wind-mill, or of steam urging the piston of an engine, cannot be increased by any mechanical contrivance. It must be diminished; but the intervention of machinery, by altering the direction of the force, and converting a direct into a circular motion, applies the force, as we require it, to grind our corn or twist our thread—and in this way proves serviceable; or by the intervention of levers, by making a small power act through a great space, we produce effects otherwise unattainable.

The Machinery Hall in this great Dublin Exhibition, grandly illustrates all these laws; and, from the immense variety of machines exhibited, also affords a clear and intelligent idea of every known application of natural, and what, through development, may be termed created power. It contains, what is really the bone, sinew, and muscle of this great empire. Man gives the blood, the nerves, and the brain; but here are collected the agencies by which he works out his greatest purposes, and diffuses through the world the divinest philosophy.

Therefore our selections from this second great exposition of the industry of all nations, most appropriately commences with this magnificent hall. We present our readers with a view of the hall as seen on entering.

Our engraving shows in front machines for planing metal, forming cornices, and drilling—a description of which we must postpone. The hall itself on this occasion demands our undivided attention. The spectator, entering from Merrion Square, finds this hall on his right, and, after but a cursory inspection, plainly perceives that the display of machinery in motion is really splendid. A new feature is introduced—the motive power which works all the machinery is given from a spindle or bar running the entire length of the hall, and surmounting a series of pillars. There is economy of room as well as power in this arrangement, and the contrivance is not only an interesting point in itself, but has a pleasing appearance.

And now, as on the present occasion we cannot dwell on details, let it be imagined that a tour of the hall has been made, and the visitor, in a philosophic vein, stands amid these wonders of human industry and genius. What does he behold? Why, industry in its very highest aspect—industry ennobled and sanctified by the highest invention—the purest purposes. Here he beholds the means and instruments of the national greatness, and the tributaries to the civilisation of the world. Here are the tools by which, to quote the nervous language of Sir Humphry Davy, man assumes the highest state of civilisation—“creates out of the dust of the earth instruments of use and ornament—extracts metals from the rude ore, and gives to them a hundred different shapes, for a thousand different purposes—makes the winds carry him on every part of the immense ocean, and compels the elements of air, water, and fire, as it were, to labour for him—concentrates in small space materials which act as the thunderbolt—blasts the rock—removes the mountain—carries water from the valley to the hill, and perpetuates thought in imperishable words—rendering immortal the exertions of genius, and presenting them as common property to the world." This hall does, indeed, present a noble spectacle to the contemplative mind. It is not a cathedral, rendered solemn by a "dim, religious light"—but a temple in which the powers created by human heads and hands have been assembled to vindicate, as well as do homage to, the might and majesty of industry. It shows us how grand and colossal are the efforts of human energy, when rightly directed—how rich both Britain and Ireland is in real wealth—and, what is overlooked in these days of an unnecessary exodus, how truthfully we might exclaim of either land:

Though thy hills blush not with the purple vine,
And softer climes excel thee in the hue
And fragrance of thy summer fruits and flowers
Nor flow thy rivers over golden beds—
Thou in the soul of man—thy better wealth—
Art richest; Nature's noblest produce, thou
Bearest with an opulence prodigal: this thy right,
Thy privilege of climate and of soil.

A survey of this hall ought to convince the most sceptical of the prodigious power machinery has conferred on the civilised world. By indefinitely multiplying the means of production, it has afforded mankind an additional guarantee against a return to barbarism; by opening up new sources of enterprise, it has not only promoted peace, but lifted the pursuits which flourish under peace to the elevation formerly occupied by the atrocities of war; and, above all, by increasing the facilities for the creation and circulation of thought, has largely contributed to the formation of that public opinion which rules this empire, and in time will rule the world. Look at that printing machine. See with what precision and speed it throws off sheet after sheet of paper teeming with information. Its history is a marvel of talent, industry, and enterprise. Previous to the year 1814, newspapers were printed at the common hand-press, at the rate of about three hundred sheets per hour. In that year, König, having had the benefit of the suggestions made by previous mechanists, constructed a machine which produced eighteen hundred impressions per hour. In 1816, Cowper made a machine to print from curved stereotype plates; and in 1818, one to print books and newspapers from ordinary type. These machines are now in general use, and throw off from two thousand to two thousand four hundred impressions per hour. In 1827, Cowper and Applegath conjointly invented the four-cylinder machine, which gave from four thousand to five thousand impressions per hour. In 1848, Mr. Applegath crowned all his previous efforts by inventing and constructing a vertical machine, which throws off the enormous number of ten thousand impressions per hour. All these accumulations of science and mechanical improvements are the produce of less than forty years; and when we know that still greater progress has been made in those departments of machinery which belong to the national manufactures, it must be acknowledged that the realms of science, art, and industry have been more enriched during that period, than in hundreds of the others which have not unworthily distinguished the various phases of civilisation.

But here we must pause for the present. The subject, however rich and attractive, must not carry us away on the wings of enthusiasm. There are other departments which demand not an inconsiderable share of our admiration. Among them it will be our duty to notice articles of beauty and utility in the halls and galleries devoted to the fine arts, native and foreign manufactures, and those productions of British, Irish, and foreign artists which are comprised under the general head of articles of taste and adornment. And here we should mention that the geographical division has not been followed; for though there is a very fine and interesting display from abroad, it is not so extensive as to require that it should be thus distributed. Our artist, during his inspection of this department, observed a

PAPIER MACHE BIRD-CAGE AND TABLE STAND,

Of which we give an engraved representation. It is a contribution of L. E. and A. Misson, of Brussels, whose names were honourably mentioned in connection with the great display in Hyde Park. The design and execution are very beautiful, and show how very tastefully inventive talent may be employed. The cage and stand are coloured, and ornamented in the Chinese style. On the top, with outstretched wings, is the dragon—the favourite Chinese emblem of majesty and power. This fabulous animal is several times repeated; sometimes holding lanterns—at others, bells. There are four Chinese figures in the claws of the table. Altogether, it is a very pretty production, and strikingly serves to convince us how illimitable are the resources of art, and how valuable, substances apparently worthless, become under skilful manipulation.

As most of our readers are probably aware, papier maché is made of the cuttings of white or brown paper—the refuse and waste of paper mills—indeed, we think anything of which paper can be made, can be converted into papier maché; for the Chinese, to whom the world is indebted for the invention of paper, manufacture it out of the bark of a tree (morus papyrifera), hemp, nettles, straw, the cocoons of the silk-worm, cotton, rags, and the fibres of the bamboo. The inner bark of the bamboo, after maceration in water, is reduced to a paste by boiling and bruising in a mortar; precisely the operation in making papier maché—for the cuttings are boiled in water, and then beaten in a mortar till they are reduced to a kind of paste. They are afterwards boiled in a solution of gum arabic, or of size, to give consistency to the paste, which is afterwards formed into the shapes required by pressing it into oiled moulds. The colouring and varnishing are subsequent processes.

This manufacture, only within the past few years extensively introduced into Europe, may still be said to be in its infancy in this country; for although the directory informs us that there are fourteen papier maché factories in the British metropolis—and we know that there are several in Ireland, also in other parts of England and Scotland—when we come to consider the numberless useful purposes to which it might be, but is not applied, we must adopt the conclusion that it has not assumed the position it ought to occupy. It is not sufficiently appreciated or developed, when it is only to a trifling extent made subservient to the purposes of decoration. It should comprise articles of utility as well as ornament; and the material, owing to the varnish, so favourable to cleanliness, ought to be cheapened so as to be extensively employed in the adornment of the interiors of the cottages of the United Kingdom. Happy homes make a happy people; and, as the more attractive a home is made, the more promise is there of its being a happy one, we are sure our suggestion, to popularise the use of papier maché, will not fail to be appreciated by all who are aware to what numerous and useful, as well as elegant purposes it may be applied. But it is useless to expect this while there is an excise duty on paper. That old man of the mountain must first be shaken off. The moment that burthen is removed, papier maché will become a very important manufacture, both in Britain and Ireland. Our illustration exhibits what may be done in it, in the way of design and tasteful application.

THE FAITHFUL SLAVE.

BY ROBERT MORRIS,

Author of "Sketches by a Travelling Naturalist," "Lectures to a Normal Class," "Lights and Shadows of Freemasonry," &c.

(Concluded from our last.)

WHATEVER the errand that has brought this man to the very heart of the cane-brake, Gabriel feels that he is now in their power. How shall they exercise that power? Shall they rush upon him, examine his person for Gabriel's money, and, if found, throw him, without mercy, into the bayou? Or shall they let him wander about, following him at a short distance, until he starves to death?

The former plan, approved by Tom, is adopted. Deliberately as they would go to work to butcher an ox, they agree to overpower him, and, if guilty, drown him, like any other villain.

They go down to the ford, where the water is shallow, both well armed, one with the hatchet, the other with a strong cudgel, in case of serious defence from the traveller, or offence from the reptiles. They cross over to the opposite site, a short distance from the spot where the horse is yet standing, too weary to move away. He whinnies to them with a voice almost human, and comes forward, as rapidly as his great fatigue will permit, to meet them.

They see that it is Pompey, but with little of that elasticity or fire for which he has been noted all his days.

His rider, who lies in the sand where he has flung himself, after taking a deep draught of the slimy bayou water, is Mr. Colston.

The negroes have brought a coal of fire from the island, and it is but short work for them to light up a torch, made upon the spot, from the loose strips of hickory bark.

They approach the traveller cautiously—for his stillness and silence may be only a blind to betray them into his power; but their torch-light gleams upon no metal. They start back, but it is only with surprise.

Mr. Colston has scarcely a rag of clothing upon him—for the briars and the sharp cane-leaves and rough hickory-trunks have uncovered him piece by piece. They have not only uncovered him, but have carried away so many patches of his skin that he is both naked and flayed. And, more horrible still, the mosquitoes—those pests of the cane-brake—have so poisoned him with their darts, that his shape is scarcely human. Oh, it is horrible!

For even now, as he lies there in that solemn glare of the torch-light, looked upon by men and brute, his fine chestnut hair almost buried in the soft sand, the insects cover him with a black cloud, and pierce his flesh, and fill themselves with his blood, though it be so thin withal as scarcely to satisfy their ravening.

What a contrast between this loathsome object, helpless before the runaways, and the fashionable young man who had so long led the social circle of his county!

After the first silence, broken only by the anxious whinneying of the poor, bewildered horse, Gabriel muttered to himself a few words expressive of the opinion to which Tom had already arrived:

"'Tis a judgment of old marser in heaven! you'll see it!"

Pity springs up in their hearts. The man whom they came prepared to put to death, they are now anxious to save. Strange contradiction of human nature!

They unite their strength to lift him upon the horse, though he is altogether unconscious of their kindness, and, walking through the bayou, one upon each side of him, they soon get him upon the island and before the fire.

They lay him tenderly down upon a pallet made of their clothing, where the green wood smoke drives away the mosquitoes. They bathe him in the cool water which they bring in turtle-shells from the bayou. Then they rub his whole body with grease. A kind of stew, or thick soup, made of the remains of the turkey, is speedily prepared, and by the time he is sufficiently revived to sit up, it is placed before him. He eats it ravenously, as may well be supposed, and, again falling back, goes into a sound sleep, from which he does not awake until after noon on the next day.

Pompey has been divested of his saddle, and turned loose to satisfy his appetite upon the cane-leaves, still untroubled in that dense forest. Having done this, he approaches the fire and stands half smothered in the smoke, for the relief he can get from the mosquitoes.

This is the scene that meets Mr. Colston's eyes upon awaking.

A short explanation suffices to convey it all to his mind from the moment of his dismounting.

Gabriel, satisfied that he cannot recognise him, boldly avows that they are runaways, and he expresses his hope that the gentleman will not betray them.

The traveller, grateful for the preservation of his life, pledges his honour not to reveal the place of their concealment, or even the fact of his having met them—then promises them a reward if they will lend him a suit of their clothes, and escort him through the cane-brake. He tells them of a certain cabin in a deserted clearing, at the edge of the bottom, at which cabin he must positively be before midnight.

Gabriel recognises the place by his description, and gives it the name of Dead Man's House.

After consulting with Tom, he agrees to escort the gentleman into the little path which he had left two days before, and which leads directly past that place.

By a liberal division from the wardrobe of the runaways, a full suit of clothing is made out for him; and before three o'clock, the party had crossed the ford and set out.

The easy means which Gabriel had discovered to pass in and out from the island, were, to follow the edge of the bayou, leaving it on the right hand, until it headed in a deep quagmire of "cypress-knees." There a small stream of water entered, which, being pursued to its head spring, brought the party into the bridge-path they were seeking. And here ended the escort of the negroes.

CHAPTER VII.

DEAD MAN'S HOUSE.—THE MIDNIGHT RENDEZVOUS.

COLSTON and the two runaways we left in the bridge-path, at the spring. After a most refreshing draught from its pure waters, he bade adieu to his escort, first promising them a bundle of tobacco, the only thing they greatly desired, to be shortly delivered and placed in a certain hollow tree, designated for that purpose.

With many a thankful acknowledgment for life saved and hospitality rendered—why should we not believe them to have been honestly meant?—he grasped their hands and departed, leaving them still seated at the spring.

As he rode off, old Gabriel looked doubtfully after him, shook his head, and muttered, in his indistinct way:

"Wicked rascal! He'll bring the dogs here, sure's shootin'! You'll see it!"

Tom looked uneasy, but said nothing.

The conclusion to which the old ostler had come some time before, respecting Mr. Colston, had not been in the least shaken. It is true, that the bags of money which Gabriel had looked for could not be found upon his person, but there was the same uneasy expression in his swollen face which has been so often adverted to. And there was something in the few dreamy words of his slumber which spoke of a great crime committed, of what character Gabriel could only surmise.

Upon the whole, Gabriel could only shake his grey head, and repeat, in his characteristic way—"You'll see it!" Which implied that the speaker himself was in the profoundest caves of obscurity.

But fortune, tired of persecuting the old man, sent him an adviser just at the time when he so greatly needed one.

Mr. Blote, who had completed his examination of the plant with the unpronounceable name, and sketched it, root, stem, branches, leaves, and fruit (it was a Lemnosia-gautha epiborallingerii), who had also collected a stack or two of other plants, besides stones and shells for ballast, was returning, in his slow way, across the hills, one eye fixed on his pocket compass, the other searching for curiosities, and came into the bridge-path at the very point where sat the puzzled negroes.

Great was his astonishment to see a couple of wild-looking men, grasping hatchet and cudgel, seemingly on the look-out for booty. He did not recognise them, but commenced fumbling in his pocket, as if there might, by some mistake, be a dime there. But they shouted his name simultaneously, and quite pulled him off his horse—a slow one—in the joy of their recognition. It is but right to add that the joy was mutual.

Mr. Blote has greatly regretted the absence of Gabriel ever since his departure. There is more than an ordinary friendship existing between the two old men, different as they are in pursuits and mental condition; and the former has frequently hinted to such of the negroes as would be likely to communicate with the runaways, that if Gabriel would return, all should be forgiven, he himself acting as mediator for that purpose.

Now that such an unexpected meeting has occurred, he begins forthwith to speak of their return.

But that subject is soon forgotten when the negro, interrupting him without ceremony, informs him of the events of last night; and how Colston had been wounded in the neck with a charge of shot; and how he is riding the horse Pompey; and how anxious he is to reach Dead Man's House before midnight.

Mr. Blote agrees with him that the subject demands explanation.

Then Gabriel tells him how much reason he has to suspect Colston of stealing his hard-earned money from the ravine, because Loogy had seen him hanging round the place for days before. The mysterious visit to Dead Man's House may explain this.

Then the negro goes further, and broaches the astounding idea that Colston is the real robber of the twenty thousand dollars, and that his daughter, poor Loogy, who, the schoolmaster informs him, is far away on the sugar plantation, is innocent.

It startles Mr. Blote to think of it. But if true, how could Loogy have known that the money was stolen, and why would she suffer so much rather than confess it?

Gabriel admits that, with his present light, this circumstance is inexplicable, but suggests that this midnight visit to Dead Man's House may clear it up.

So every other thought becomes merged into this meeting at Dead Man's House.

At a hint from the sharp-eared Tom, who imagines that he hears some person approaching, the party left the spring and went a little way into the thicket.

It was well they did; for they had scarcely concealed themselves there when a couple of horsemen rode up the path in the direction of the solitary cabin, aiming, no doubt, at the same rendezvous.

This was strong confirmation of their suspicions, and they set themselves to making preparations to follow the horsemen, regardless of other matters.

While these portentous preparations are on the tapis, night comes on, and offers them that shelter for which they have tarried.

They promptly enter the little path, and move forward towards Dead Man's House.

Presently a hasty step is heard behind them, at which they again withdraw into the thicket.

Then comes along a white horse, bearing a large, savage-looking person, with immense whiskers. The horse snorts, in recognition of their proximity, whereat the rider, with a cocked pistol in each hand—they can hear the click of the locks as they are drawn back—stops, looks around, and seems anxious to shoot something. But he makes no discovery, and passes on.

The party follow him at a safe distance, keeping their attention awake to front and rear, and presently come in sight of the old cabin.

It is that of a family who had moved in from one of the Carolinas, and made a clearing, five years before, with the intention of settling. While camped out, under their waggon-shelter, they had built this cabin and covered it in, and got it nearly ready for use, when the whole family, parents, children, and three slaves, were taken down by that mysterious disease, "Milk-sickness." Having no neighbours for several miles, their situation did not become known until every member of the household, except the infant, was dead.

This circumstance had given the place such a character that no one would occupy it, although the heaviest labour of a new settlement was accomplished. It therefore grew up with the thick underbrush which always springs up upon the girdling of the forest trees, and received the familiar title of Dead Man's House.

There is a good deal of superstition on the frontiers, and somehow the story got into circulation, especially amongst the negroes, that the place was haunted, and that whoever passed by there in the night would see ghosts.

As a reasonable consequence, these charges were ruinous to the character of the place, even though the danger of that awful and mysterious affliction, "Milk-sickness," were not in the way.

Here, then, is the rendezvous of the party whose character and profession are shortly to be exposed. Now we shall be able to trace out some of the mystery which has kept our minds upon the rack so long. It is odds yet if I do not prove the title of my sketch a just one.

From the moment the party set out, Mr. Blote has taken the lead. How true it is, that whenever the head-work is proposed, the lighter-hued of the two races instinctively go forward!

He directs Gabriel to watch, lest any other persons approach; orders Tom to stand by his back, cudgel in hand, to defend him if attacked; and all the preliminaries being thus laid, he boldly approaches that side of the house originally intended for the window. I say originally, basing my judgment upon the appearance of an opening, two feet square, cut out of the logs for the admission of light.

To this opening Mr. Blote directs himself, feeling confident that the deep gloom surrounding the cabin, contrasted with the bright light inside, will prevent him from being discovered.

The sight of the party that so strangely occupies Dead Man's House, in spite of its unpromising reputation, is a curious one.

A pile of saddles is heaped up in the middle of the room, and a blanket spread over the top, forming something like a table; at least, it is used for a table, and, as such, contains several bottles of spirits of different colours, a quantity of cold provisions, and a pack of cards. A rousing fire is blazing up in the wooden chimney, and around that—for the night-wind is raw and frosty—four men are sitting upon blocks of wood.

Leaning against the chimney-corner, on the side next the door, sits Mr. Colston.

The raw flesh-wound, opened by the insects, and now festering and feverish, seems like a large blood-stain upon his neck. It occupies the most of his attention, and forms the subject of many an anathema at everything which passes through his mind.

With all his experience of humanity, Mr. Blote is astounded at the facility with which a fashionable gentleman may be transformed into a blasphemous clown.

On the opposite side of the fire is the large man who was riding on the white horse. His ferocious appearance, however, has been laid aside, with the mountain of artificial whiskers, which he has placed on the table, and we see that he is nothing but a stupid, half-witted fellow, after all, who might possibly pick the pockets of an unresisting traveller, but would hardly venture upon such an experiment without foreknowledge.

The other two have all the appearance of desperate men. They show scars in various places—many more than would suffice to make them heroes, had they been gained in honourable strife. Their forms are muscular, and if they can strike with the same determination they speak, they will be ugly customers to meet on the highway of a lonely place.

There are a couple of candles burning upon the table, and various pieces of meat, skewered on sticks, frying over the blaze of the fire.

The conversation, as Mr. Blote approached the window, is too guarded for him to follow its thread. There is much rejoicing to see Colston, whom they call by the slang name of Simpson, and a great many questions are asked him as to the cause of his absence for the two previous nights.

These questions and their rejoicings are frequently interrupted by attacks upon the provisions, which prove the party to be hard riders, and upon the bottles, which give evidence of their intemperate habits.

As Colston is in great pain, much sympathy is tendered him, regardless of his rude manner of receiving it; and while he takes a short nap before the fire, one of the party bathes his wounds with warm brandy, while the other two take a game of cards.

The meeting seems to be a council of some sort, the result of a previous appointment; and its object, so far as the listener can discover, is to lay out plans for the future.

What profession is to be honoured by the operation of these plans, is perhaps as well explained by the large display of arms offensive, as in any other way.

Business advances slowly at Dead Man's House. The condition of Colston—Simpson, as they style him—throws them out of their ordinary line of thought.

More than once the different members of the conference leave the house to procure wood, and were it not for the intense darkness of the surrounding thicket, which renders it difficult to distinguish a man from a stump, at three paces, the spies would be discovered, to their own imminent hazard and the failure of their plans.

Several hours and a quarter of a cord of wood were all consumed in this unsatisfactory manner; but now, towards midnight, the free use of stimulants seems to arouse the party. They begin to draw their boots, and some of them throw off their upper garments.

Seeing this, Mr. Blote judges it safe to bring up Gabriel from his post, and then all three gather under the window, to see and to hear.

Colston awakes, the better of his pains, and joins the revelry, like one who needs that relief which nothing but the bottle can give.

His gloomy look, his blasphemous expressions of anger, are cast aside, and he takes a position so as to bear back against the pile of saddles. This brings the top of his head in front of the little window, not more than six feet from where Mr. Blote is standing.

Delighted at the change in his manner—for he begins to talk and jest, and lay plans with the liveliest of the party—his comrades shake hands with him cheerfully, and demand his whole history from the time of their last conference in Dead Man's House.

Colston, taking a large draught of brandy, replies:

"When we parted, three months back, comrades, I told you that I had a love affair on hand, which promised some pleasure to myself, and profit to this honourable company of free-traders. When I became clearly satisfied that none of the Murrell developments had involved me, and that none of the printed descriptions had me down, I came forward and laid siege regularly to my pretty mistress—she was a pretty creature, such another you won't find in the country—and I conquered her in good time!"

Here Mr. Blote breathes hard with anxiety, while a general roar of approbation goes round the circle.

The free-traders understand his remark in a very different sense, however, from what he intended. One of them—the big, sensual ruffian in the corner—delightfully suggests:

"Simpson can conquer the pretty girls, bless my organs if he can't!"

Colston acknowledges this homage with a grin, but puts in a disclaimer:

"No, no, boys—not half so far as that! 'Twas all chips and whetstones as far as that went! She wasn't of that sort. No—no—far enough from that! All I could get for my labour was kisses, and a scanty pattern at that! No, no; but my plan was, so soon as I married her—"

The evil-hearted man here held up the ring of betrothal, still upon his finger—why did not its sparkling light strike him dumb with remorse?—while the circle broke into a second, uncontrollable roar. The idea of his marrying—of his wearing a ring of engagement!

"Yes, just as I said. So soon as the marriage was over—for I was determined to do that or worse—I felt certain that I should be able to handle some of the old gentleman's loose cash, and then I intended to go to head-quarters and take a new start. To tell the truth, my own county is getting too hot for me. That pedlar affair is the topic of the whole population, and came very near compromising me before the coroner. Well, I didn't consummate the marriage—fool that I was for my haste—but I did what you'll all think is better—I fingered the cash."

And here the ruffian—for I cannot now appropriate a milder name to him—threw upon the table a roll of bills, which, on being counted aloud, is found to contain twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. Blote feels as though he was dreaming. Can this be the man to whom his favourite pupil—his darling Caroline—had been so nearly married? This licentious, dishonest, murdering villain, who speaks of his own depravity in such an airy strain?

He looks around upon his companions, but behind the sable mask they wear he can distinguish no expression.

A tremendous cheer breaks from the group as the completion of the count showed them what an immense booty was before them—a cheer that startles the horses grouped under the trees before the door, and makes the solitary cabin ring again.

Colston goes on.

"There were a few hundred dollars more, that an old negro had buried under a rock, and I should have had that here with the rest, but that I got lost, endeavouring to come through the cane-brake, two days ago. I lost the money, and came miserably near forfeiting my life with it!"

The hand of old Gabriel presses down upon Mr. Blote's shoulder with crushing force, as he hears this confirmation of his suspicions. He leans forward, as though he would speak, but the schoolmaster restrains him.

Colston pursues his history:

"It was important for my plans with my mistress, to make the impression upon the old negro's mind that his daughter had stolen this money. So I got a handkerchief, belonging to the black wench, and dropped it near the spot where the money was hid. And I made some moulds, as near to the size of her foot and hand as I could guess, and marked the place in such a way as would be certain to fasten suspicion in that quarter!"

Again that crushing weight upon Mr. Blote's shoulder—and now it requires all the strength of his two companions to restrain old Gabriel. His countenance works as in an epilepsy. His mouth foams, his sunken eyes flash with rage. All the ill-treatment he has received is brought forward by this man in such a mocking strain, that while the party within is convulsed with laughter, the injured black is wild for vengeance. Woe to the seducer if he touch upon that subject again!

"But you haven't told us where you got that ugly gash in your neck, Simpson?"

"While I was with the young lady in the wood, her brother, a bold little pup, not a dozen years old, broke in upon us, and shot me at ten paces, as coolly as you'd drop a squirrel!"

This announcement is received in the same spirit of badinage with which it is made.

The uproar having subsided, that individual, who by this time is more than half drunk, takes the roll of money in his hand, and continues:

"But I haven't told you where this money came from. You see my good daddy-in-law that was to be is a political man, and had been intrusted by government to collect a large sum of money, and hand it over to the county treasurer the next day. I helped him collect it, and then saved him the rest of the trouble. For I got it out of his wallet while he was asleep, by that sleight of hand you have all praised so frequently, and put a roll of blank paper in its place. I left him so little cause for suspicion that he went clear to town, next morning, before he discovered the trick. The joke alone was worth twenty thousand dollars to any man, and I intend he shall be informed yet how nicely I took him in. But there's something better yet. I contrived to have the whole blame thrown upon one of the horse girls. Ha! ha! ha! The young trollope got a good lashing, and was sent off to the sugar plantation and sold. Ha! ha! ha!"

This monstrous speech is the last that Oliver Colston ever utters. For now the heart-injured and defrauded father, dashing Mr. Blote and Tom from his side as though they were stubble, and uttering one sound, such as peals from the very thickest of an Indian battle, poises his heavy hatchet over his head, and throws it right into the villain's brain! The blade strikes flush on the exposed portion of his head, and sinks itself, quivering half its breadth into the mark. The unfortunate man, without a prayer, without a word, without a groan, falls heavily upon one side, and rolls upon the floor, dead.

The uproar that follows is tremendous. In the first wild rush for shelter the candles are upset, leaving the party with no other light than the wood-fire, now burning low. A general snatching of pistols follows, and their ominous click is heard by the party outside.

Mr. Blote, horror-struck as he is by Gabriel's rash act, recovers his coolness at once—for he sees the necessity of taking immediate steps for his own safety. An aggressive act now is real prudence. He therefore sends Gabriel with orders to remove all the horses a considerable distance into the cane-brake, and, if he should give a signal, to turn them loose. Then he raises his voice in a tone of command, and gives loud orders as to a party of twenty. Some are to guard the door, and suffer none to pass alive; some to stand by the window, and shoot all who resist; some are to set fire to the cabin, and burn up the Murrell gang, if they do not surrender.

All this has its effect within. The tumult immediately ceases. The three robbers crouch in the dark, behind and under the saddles, and wait with levelled pistols for the attack. Not one of them will risk the hand of justice: they are determined to fight it out like tigers.

Mr. Blote had originated his hasty plan merely with a view to gain time. He wished to terrify the ruffians and confine them to the cabin for awhile, until himself and companions could mount and escape. But now accident comes to his aid, and throws the victory into his hands.

One of the robbers—the large one of the white horse—whose hiding-place is directly in front of the chimney, opens his flask of powder to take out a load. In reply to an inquiry as to the amount on hand, the half-drunken fellow takes a brand of fire from the chimney to exhibit its contents. A coal falls into the inflammable substance, and at once the whole defence is at an end. Two of the robbers are killed instantaneously; the third, blown heavily against the side of the cabin, is so severely stunned by the shock, that by the time the besieging party reach him, he is too weak to offer resistance.

Thus the midnight rendezvous is broken up.

The hands of Oliver Colston still grasp the roll of money, his finger still sparkles with Caroline's ring: both are secured, to be returned to their owners. The three corpses are next laid decently out upon the floor, and left to the solitude of the woods. The prisoner is tied firmly to a tree, and then the party, whose good fortune has been equal to the justice of their cause, mount the horses and seek the nearest dwelling.

Guided by the old ostler, they are not long in reaching it, and, procuring assistance, they return before sunrise.

The bodies are still there, to add a deeper shade to the superstitious cloud that overshadows Dead Man's House—but the prisoner has escaped. His cords have been cut, and a knife which lay close by, being one that Gabriel has long owned, explains clearly, to Mr. Blote's mind, the mystery of his release.

CHAPTER VIII.

A SUGAR PLANTATION.—DENOUEMENT.

In this wise had the mystery of the robbery been mainly cleared up, and the money recovered.

Mr. Blote found no further difficulty in persuading the two runaways to return home.

The reader has seen that there had been a growing inclination in the minds of both to abandon the woods, evidence of which was visible in Gabriel's willingness to escort Mr. Colston through the thicket, even at the danger of exposing the secret entrance to his hiding-place. That inclination was now merged into a burning desire to restore his poor injured daughter to her home and friends; and upon the pledge offered by the schoolmaster, that neither of them should be punished for their desertion, they returned with him to their masters.

The coming of the party created an excitement throughout the country unequalled by anything that had occurred since the Murrell developments.

Company came in from all quarters, and upon every possible errand.

The sheriff, and the other securities, together with the district attorney, received the intelligence by a messenger from Mr. Blote; and although it was late at night, and the night was stormy, they immediately mounted their horses, one and all, and rode at full speed to Mr. Enloe's dwelling.

The scene, as I witnessed it that night, was full of life and incident.

The parlour was crowded with the negro women of the plantation, wild with joy that they were not to be sold and sent away. All discipline for the time seemed to be abandoned.

The overseer, Mr. Allansby, who had somehow forgotten where he laid his whip, and, what is more remarkable, had dropped all his sternness somewhere, had timidly attempted to keep a little order at first—but the influence of such happiness is contagious: he fell headlong into the current, and when old Mammy Betty, an octogenarian, very ugly and offensive, threw her withered arms around his neck and convulsively kissed him, Mr. Allansby submitted to the salute with as good a grace as though it had been Caroline herself. That young lady was well-nigh smothered in the tumult.

I could get an occasional glimpse of her as the centre of a mêlée to which the battle of Ivry was child's play. At one instant a stout wench would embrace her as though she were compressing a cotton-bale; at the next, a group of the same would toss her violently towards the ceiling, as the sweet girl had often done with her doll, twelve years before; and then, for variety's sake, they would permit her to sit awhile, that they might kiss her, and chat over the good news.

Mr. Enloe himself was in a woful predicament. If he approached the window, ten stalwart arms were waving there, like the long feelers of the polypi, to engulf him. To go out into the passage was to be waylaid and devoured; and Mammy Betty followed him about like a shadow, with eager eyes and mouth.

Thus pursued and besieged, he could only feign a headache to give himself an excuse to lie down until the sheriff came; though, sooth to say, his own happiness was not less than that of the others.

But, though more seriousness came in with the town party, there was not less real happiness; and when the sheriff, taking a salute from each of our dear Caroline's cheeks, whispered in her ear:

"A narrow escape, my precious girl! Thank God, he discovered his real character in due season!"

When I say the rough old boy touched upon this sensitive topic, and I watched, lest an allusion to it might mar the general happiness, I was delighted to see that no additional paleness came over her countenance, and to hear her hastily respond:

"Amen!"

Stout heart! The loss of such a lover is a gain. The wound shall yet heal. That pure breast shall yet find one worthy of its pilloving. Months may roll away, and years, before the admiring deity aims his arrows at that bright target again; but you shall not be overlooked in his future work—depend on that.

Daylight broke in upon us before the excitement subsided sufficiently to enable us to snatch an hour's sleep.

Then we met again, and the district attorney opened his portfolio of papers, and ventured to promise us that all the assignments and sales made on behalf of this great treasury debt should be nullified, and that Mr. Enloe's property should be restored to him, as nearly as possible in its original state.

I will add here that the higher authorities, and afterwards the Legislature, ratified his conditional engagement, and so my old friend stood erect as before.

My appointment as general agent came to an ignominious end. Its emoluments went into the general release, without discount to Mr. Enloe. I only trust that, when called upon by the great Creditor of humanity to resign this body to the grave, I shall as cheerfully accede as in the case I have mentioned.

Before night all the visitors had departed, save a few of us, who felt domesticated by the last month's afflictions; and the more delicate portions of the history were then brought forward.

Caroline's ring was returned to her, with many a sigh from the whole circle, that one so capable of usefulness and honour had pressed the early grave of his own vices.

That was the last time I ever heard his name mentioned in the family.

It was decided before our separation, that on the second day such of us as would volunteer for that purpose should commence our journey to Louisiana, to re-purchase poor Loogy; for it had been resolved upon, without a dissenting voice, that there should be no stint in our offered prices, "even to the half of the kingdom."

The morning found three of us—to wit, Mr. Blote, Mr. Enloe, and myself—prepared to start.

There is yet one grand point in the mysterious robbery to be solved, and our anxiety, relieved upon every other topic, has concentrated upon this—we have not yet learned from what source Loogy derived her knowledge of the robbery.

Before night, we find ourselves upon one of the monstrous steamers of the Mississippi, downward bound, forming part of a great family that counts by hundreds. A local habitation and a name are given us amongst the rest, and we retire, wearied, to our berths.

The night before we arrived at the end of our journey, one of the stewards brought a message from a sick gentleman, who requested that Mr. Blote would call upon him in his state-room.

He did so, and afterwards imparted the result of the communication to us.

The invalid was no other than the identical man whom the old schoolmaster had tied to the tree, to be released by the knife of Gabriel. His sickness was but feigned: his confinement to the room being merely to avoid recognition from some chance passenger.

How the robber discovered the fact, I cannot say; but he and Mr. Blote belonged to the same secret society, and he was not afraid to trust him.

From him we learned that Colston, alias Simpson, had been an active leader in the Murrell affair, and was intrusted by the heads of the band with some of the most confidential business. That, upon the developments which led to the disorganisation of that company, Colston, whose name, real or assumed, had not come out in the printed expositions, had engaged to close off the affairs of the company in his own section, with the determination, after that event, of removing to a considerable distance. That he could have no other motive for his engagement with Caroline save her dishonour. That the attack upon her, in which he came forward as a rescuer, was all a pretence, arranged through one of his comrades. That a spy had been put upon Mr. Enloe's steps from the hour he received the government money, and even had Mr. Colston failed in extracting it from his pocket-book, Mr. Enloe would have been waylaid and robbed, the next morning, on his way to town.

The small village at which we landed could not furnish us with a conveyance to the plantation of Loogy's new master, and, impatient as we were, we determined to walk.

We got directions along the road as we could, and arrived a little before night at the plantation.

It was the property of an enterprising gentleman, who, having spent twenty years in the business of sugar-making, as overseer, had been enabled to purchase the greater part of the property of his employer—a fact that, as clearly as any other, illustrates the distinction between an active and a passive verb—and was now carrying on the business, on his own account.

He was at the mill, where we joined him. Informing him of our errand, he looked at us with as much surprise as the law serjeant evinced when Mr. Pickwick insisted on calling on him, and laughed heartily at the idea of our coming all the way, for humanity's sake, to restore an ill-treated negro. He candidly acknowledged that he owned such a slave, and admitted that he would sell her to us at the market price, under the circumstances; but he was not at all sure that she would live a week, for the "nigger" had been "no account" to him since a short time after he purchased her, and he rather thought she was past curing.

Startled at this intelligence, we asked permission to go to her immediately: and Mr. Beemus, the sugar planter, politely offered his escort, but still with a droll sort of look at the idea.

There were more than three hundred slaves on the estate, and "the quarters" necessarily covered a considerable space of ground.

Getting directions from an old woman, who was attending to more than a score of infants, Mr. Beemus led us through the maze of huts, and, still calling upon those he saw for guidance, took us at last to one pointed out as the habitation of Loogy.

It was like the rest, a low pen made of small logs, without a chimney or door, and surrounded by a company of naked, noisy children.

We looked in, and saw an object stretched upon a dirty blanket at the further side of the room. It was Loogy, but so emaciated that I should not have known her. She was asleep as we entered, and did not awake, although we stood over her, and conversed aloud concerning her pitiful appearance.

There was no need to apologise to one another for the weakness, for all three of us wept. The gentlemanly planter turned aside, too gentlemanly to smile at such weakness, and we felt relieved when we heard him walking off.

Yes, there was the poor girl, still alive, but very sick; how sick, that sallow hue, so unfavourable in the diagnosis of a negro patient, and the hasty manner of her breathing, indicated but too plainly.

Her loose coat was not the neat, homespun dress worn under the eye of her former mistress, but coarse and unshapely.

Still we stood and gazed upon her. On the floor by her side was a small rag of calico—it was but a rag, doled out by some hard charity, which she had partly sewed up in the form of a baby's dress, the needle and thread being still in it. She had gone to sleep, it appeared, even while labouring at it. There was something red protruding from one of her hands—and as Mr. Enloe stooped to examine it, how were we touched to discover the same string of coral beads which had formed such a link in the fatal chain of evidence against her.

It seems that Caroline, with some parting tokens of affection, had returned this to her, and in that feverish slumber she was clasping it tightly to her bosom.

Mr. Blote kneeled by her side, and whispered Caroline's name in her ear.

She opened her eyes, looked at us delightedly, as we look at the objects of a dream, and smiled.

He again addressed her with words of home, of her father, of her husband, of Caroline.

It was but a vision—she saw that plainly enough; it was only a dream, from which she would presently awake to the solitude of that low hut, or the discord of those howling youths; but, determined to enjoy it as long as she could, she resolutely fixed her attention upon us, and whispered:

"Oh, Miss Caroline, 'deed I love you! I wouldn't take your husband from you—'deed I wouldn't, Miss Caroline!"

And we could only convince her of the reality of our presence by endeavouring to draw the necklace from her hand—at which she arose, and recognised us.

The shock which our sudden appearance made upon her mind was not so great as we had feared. There was, indeed, but little mind remaining. Her resolution, after the first few days' experience of the cheerless plantation labour, had given way, and she had become sick-sullen, as her gentlemanly owner called it; home-sick, heart-sick, as I should say. Then her loneliness had turned her head, and by the time we discovered her she was nearly deranged.

mixed with a fondness for the comic, had her brought to the house, while we waited upon her, and placed in the house servants' apartments, under the care of the physician. It was rather too good a thing, he admitted, and he shouldn't like for the other planters to hear of it—but he frequently went with us to see her, and his wife, a clever lady, fond of a joke like himself, presented her with a suit of clothes.

Loogy remained here for several weeks before we felt it safe to remove her.

By this time Mr. Beemus had become so much attached to Mr. Blote—that secret society again, I presume—that he insisted on accompanying us up the river. Such a joke as his going so far with a sick negro! and his wife went with him.

When Loogy had sufficiently recovered, we asked her for a full explanation of her mysterious conduct, and as we assured her that Mr. Colston was really dead, and his engagement with her young mistress broken off, she consented to give it.

The night of the robbery, Caroline, who was sitting up late with her lover in the parlour, had retired to rest with her chamber windows opened. Loogy, ever anxious on her account, had discovered this, and as the morning air blew cold, she left her cabin at "the quarters," and crept softly to the house to close them.

Here she became a witness to Mr. Colston's movements: how he walked from his bed-room, spoke gently to the dogs, and fed them with some morsels of meat that he had reserved for that purpose; how he went into Mr. Enloe's apartment, and drew his pocket-book from under his head; and how he returned stealthily to his own room; while Loogy flew, horror-stricken, and wild with emotion, back through the orchard to her cabin. There she had wept until daylight, and until summoned to appear before the family, and answer to the charges made against her. How could she expose Mr. Colston, and break her young mistress's heart?

Here was the clue to the whole after-conduct of the faithful slave: she could not deprive "Miss Carline" of one whom she loved so well! She could bear to be whipped; she could bear to be sold; she could bear to be sent away; but she could not break up the future happiness of one whom she loved so well!

Hear it, O ye to whom affection is but a name, and love has never opened his dearest mysteries!

And now I will wind up the drama. Yet let the audience remain seated for a moment, while I dispose of the principals and some of the subordinates.

My friend Mr. Enloe until the day of his death had no further strife with fortune. By rigid economy he contrived to close the large breaches that speculation had made in his affairs, and within six years was free of debt. In due season he was restored to church-membership, and at the very next political caucus he was unanimously proposed for the office of governor. But, to the surprise of his party and the joy of his opponents, he declined the nomination.

As a neighbour, a Christian, and a gentleman of charity and sympathy, his name stood high—and it stood upon a rock. Few who pass his monument, near the road-side, in the grave-yard at C—, and read the eulogistic inscription written by Mr. Blote, but will admit its truth.

The hero of the following-piece is now a man of twenty-four. Few in the sunny south better deserve the name. Few have a happier home than he, or a worthier wife, or lovelier babes. The promise of his youth is verified by his virtue, his charity, his sympathy with distress, his regard for truth. The little shot-gun which effected so much at that trying moment, is still suspended over the mantel-piece in his best apartment.

His little brother Alf has not followed him up into manhood. Worn out with the race of life, the child retired early from the scene, and went to sleep, to commence a higher, holier career in the spirit-land.

Uncle Gabriel took his first holidays to search for his money. By the aid of some good dogs, he traced Colston's path through the cane-brake, until he found all the bags except one, and that one was made up by his master. Though the amount was slightly deficient, Mr. Enloe consented to receive it (yet with pretended reluctance—for nothing would have insulted the old ostler so much as to rank him with "the five-hundred-dollar niggers"), with the understanding, however, that the remainder was to be paid over as fast as possible.

And so, about every other day, for six months, Mr. Enloe was compelled to write a receipt for some additional dime or picayune that had been gathered up somehow towards the debt.

As for Loogy, she utterly refused to leave "Miss Carline" on any terms: so she is a slave yet, and her small people (there are ten or fifteen of them) are in a like condition.

Mr. Blote is still teaching school and still collecting specimens.

So falls the curtain over this true tale of southern life. As it slowly sinks, and scene after scene fades away from the beholders' eyes, let me hastily add—'tis my last opportunity—that although there are some things in it I might, perhaps, have concealed, there are none that I could have altered without a disregard of truth.

[END OF "THE FAITHFUL SLAVE"]

THE NEGLECTED DAUGHTER.

I WAS sitting alone, one winter evening, in my little room, the temperature of which was rendered genial by the glowing anthracite that filled the grate, and imparted a bright, cheery aspect to all around. I had taken a book from the table, but I did not open it. Thoughts of the past came thronging to the "heart's silent chambers." Companions of my early days rose up before me, like the shadowy forms seen in the waning twilight, and glided quickly back into oblivion, to give place to others. At last there was one whom I knew well formerly, who came back to my mind so vividly as to exclude all others. We had not met for many years, during which time the condition of both had been much changed. She had long been married to a gentleman of wealth and respectability; while I was still single, in the enjoyment of an "elegant sufficiency," such as is described by the poet of "The Seasons."

My parents were both dead, and although I had uncles, aunts, and cousins, they all lived in the "Far West." I had certainly arrived at what might be called years of discretion—for I was full thirty-five; yet, although in my youthful days I had been termed good-looking, and by some even handsome, I had never had a single offer. It had, however, never caused me any serious uneasiness. This might be owing, in part, to an easy and rather sunny temper, though probably more to my having never met with a gentleman who had inspired me with any more lively sentiments than those of friendship and esteem.

Why Jane Bascom—now Mrs. Alford—should, for the time being, banish all others from my memory, I could not tell. Among those who had been the associates of my early days, she had never been a favourite. There had even existed between us a degree of antagonism, which, on certain occasions, as far as she was concerned, was too demonstrative to be consistent with the rules of good breeding; yet which, owing to a way I had of passing lightly over things of that kind, never caused any serious disruption of those ties that bound us together in a kind of lukewarm friendship.

It had been a nine-days' wonder, with those who were acquainted with Philip Alford, why he should have discovered anything attractive in Jane Bascom, as her features were plain, and the expression of her countenance such as to indicate, even at that early period, that there was no slight tincture of verjuice in her disposition. Had she been an heiress, he would doubtless have been accused of mercenary motives in selecting her for a wife; but as her father was only in comfortable circumstances, and she was one of eleven children, he escaped the imputation.

I had never seen Mr. Alford, as, a few months previous to his becoming acquainted with Jane Bascom, I had removed to the pleasant house, some thirty or forty miles distant, which I had received as a bequest from a rich bachelor uncle. A few letters had at first passed between us—but for the last six years all epistolary correspondence had ceased; and I only knew by indirect intelligence, occasionally received, that she and her husband still lived, and that one of their two children, both of whom were daughters, was thought to be intellectually deficient.

All the more important incidents connected with our early acquaintance had passed in review before me, when I was aroused from my reverie by the sound of sleigh-bells, which rang so loud a peal through the frosty air, that I knew the stage-coach was passing. The post-office was only a quarter of a mile distant, and though I could think of no one from whom I was likely to receive a letter, I could not get rid of the impression that there would be one for me. I therefore summoned Simon Martin—who had, many years before my uncle's decease, managed the farm for him—while his wife superintended the affairs of the household. He had, since my uncle's death, performed the same service for me. I asked him if he was too tired to walk as far as the post-office.

"I should be sorry if I was," said he; "for the days are so short, I hardly have time to turn round before it is night!"

He therefore—as soon as he had time to defend himself against the cold, by putting on his great coat and a pair of mittens, ingeniously knitted by his wife, of various coloured worsteds—started on his errand.

I made allowance for his being gone some time, knowing that he would be likely to meet with some of his old acquaintances; and as he was a great politician, he would be likely to stay and chat with them a little on his favourite topic. My fit of musing being over, I opened the book, which I had continued to hold in my hand, and soon became absorbed in its pages. I had scarcely thought of Simon Martin—though, when he opened the door, I found, by glancing at the time-piece on the mantel, that he had been gone more than an hour.

"Here is a letter for you!" said he; "and I've got my newspaper, too, though I didn't expect it till the next mail."

I looked at the superscription of my letter, but did not recognise the writing. The chirography was like that of one not accustomed to using a pen, and the post-mark was so indistinct that I could not decipher it: so the only way to settle the question as to whom it was from, was to open the letter, which I found was signed "Jane Alford." The contents were brief. After making some slight allusion to our early friendship, she proceeded to invite me to come and spend a few weeks with the family.

The gentlemanly planter, in a spirit of hospitality

There was not much warmth or affection in her manner of giving the invitation, yet I could see that she was in earnest. After considerable hesitation, I made up my mind to go; and as I had little preparation to make, the next day but one I was ready to start.

It was near evening when I arrived at the mansion of Mr. Alford. He and his wife, and Alicia, their youngest child, were in the parlour. Mrs. Alford, as is sometimes the case when the youthful face is rather coarse, did not make a better looking matron than she did a girl. Traces of her hard, unbending will, combined with a singularly eager, prying look, had gradually wrought themselves into the lineaments of her countenance in a manner which by no means improved its beauty; while her voice, never remarkably sweet or well modulated, had become, in some of its tones, decidedly harsh. She gave me a civil welcome, and introduced me to her husband.

I was much struck with his appearance, and I thought to myself that it was no marvel that it was a nine days' wonder when he married Jane Bascom. He was one of the finest-looking men I had ever seen, yet he by no means possessed one of those delicately-handsome faces which would, even in his more youthful days, cause him, Narcissus-like, to fall in love with his own shadow. His was that higher style of beauty which derives its greatest charm from the illumination of the mind. A short time sufficed to show me that there was little community of feeling between himself and wife. Without attempting an analysis of the mind of either, it will be enough to say that his tastes were eminently intellectual; while she was one of those women belonging to the class denominated first-rate managers. The spirit of thrift pervaded every corner and cranny of the domestic establishment. No danger of rust there: all the machinery was kept bright, every wheel and crank being in active motion from early dawn till late at night—she herself being the mainspring that kept up the circumvolution. She was indeed so constantly on the alert, that one might have imagined that her feet and her hands were in danger of being worn to points equally tenuous as—owing to his constant blowing—was the phiz of the indefatigable flute-player, made immortal in the annals of facetious biography by a pen that is inimitable. Her features, however, rather than her extremities, had become sharpened by this unceasing vigilance; and I one day heard the housemaid muttering to herself, that "if Mrs. Alford's favourite child was dying, she would come on tiptoe peeping into the dairy to see, when she strained the milk, if the last drop was drained from the pails."

Alicia, the younger and favourite child of Mrs. Alford, though she was called a beauty, did not strike me agreeably. It appeared to me that the delicately-moulded features bore the stamp of the mother's disposition.

It was not till near night, the day succeeding my arrival, that I saw Bertha, the elder daughter, who, as I afterwards found, had been shamefully neglected by her mother, on account of either her real or supposed stupidity. She was six years of age—being two years older than Alicia—and to me she appeared melancholy rather than stupid. There was, in a particular manner, in her large and dark, though not brilliant eyes, a look of inexpressible sadness; while lines such as sorrow traces round the mouth, as it seemed to me, were already perceptible. This might have been fancy, but I could not persuade myself that it was, any more than I could make myself believe that she was intellectually deficient.

My first attempts at making her acquaintance were received with a kind of passive sullenness, which did not give the promise of much success. Mrs. Alford was greatly exasperated with her, and threatened to send her to the dark closet for the rest of the day—a threat which, to a careless observer, might have appeared to make no impression on its object, but which, I could see, made the poor child's lips quiver, though it brought no moisture to her eyes.

Bertha, from some reason, evidently regarded me as an enemy—a truth which I was not long in ascertaining. I then better knew what ground to take.

Though the days were at the shortest, she was sent to bed before it was fairly dark—yet Alicia was allowed to sit up till seven or eight o'clock. After she was gone, Mrs. Alford said to me:

"You see, Eleanor, what a trial I have with that child—Bertha, I mean!"

"Do you think that she is really so dull that she cannot be taught anything?" said Mr. Alford, addressing me with great earnestness.

"I have had little opportunity to judge, as yet," I returned; "but I certainly don't think that her countenance lacks intelligence."

"For those words of encouragement I thank you from my heart," said he. "The child has been neglected, and I take shame to myself for it. I was told that she was an imbecile, and I never attempted to disprove it, till within a few weeks, when I undertook to teach her the alphabet—and she is now perfectly familiar with the easy reading lessons."

"A parrot can be taught to repeat words by rote!" said Mrs. Alford. "No longer ago than yesterday morning, I told her to read one of the easy lessons you speak of, and she didn't know a word of it."

"I am afraid that it was the want of will, not ability," said Mr. Alford, "which prevented her from reading it."

"So much the worse, then," replied Mrs. Alford.

"It may be," I ventured to remark, "that she is one of those who can be persuaded better than driven."

"I have too much to attend to," said Mrs. Alford, "to be able to waste my time in trying to coax an obstinate, stupid child like her. When I order her to do a thing, it is her part to obey."

"I have been thinking of late," said Mr. Alford, "that if you had always had as much patience with Bertha as with Alicia, she would have been very different from what she is now."

"And I think," said Mrs. Alford, "that it is the mother's province to manage girls. If Bertha had been a boy, you might have done with her as you choose."

"What if I should undertake the management of her or a few days?" said I. "I don't know how it is, but children, as well as dumb animals, generally speaking, soon learn to have confidence in me."

"It will be different with Bertha, you will find," remarked Mrs. Alford. "She never yet liked anything, except a little white kitten—a species of animal I always hated—and that she would have been glad to have in her arms from morning till night. But I soon put a stop to it—for I had the kitten killed. However, if you will take the trouble of trying to beat something into her stupid head, I shall certainly make no objection."

"And I shall be under the greatest obligations to you," said Mr. Alford.

I subsequently found that although Mrs. Alford appeared so indifferent about the matter, her sole object in sending for me was to see if I could be induced to take the child under my charge for a few weeks, by way of trial: when, if I succeeded in winning her affection, she thought, judging from what she recollected of my character and disposition, I should be unwilling to give her up. In this, I am sorry to say, she was influenced less for the child's good, than to relieve herself of what she considered a burthen.

The only condition I made with her mother, was to have her given up entirely to my own management. I was to be the judge whether she needed reproof or punishment. I made up my mind for a difficult, not to say onerous task; but I understood my own strength and resources. I was sensible that I had the requisite patience, energy, and perseverance—and my pity was already enlisted in the child's behalf.

I took her in charge the following day. She refused to read to me—the same as she had refused reading to her mother—and had evidently made up her mind for the infliction of the usual penalty of disobedience—a blow on the head; for though, when she uttered the refusal, she did not move from the spot where she stood, she covered a little, and half closed her eyes. Finding that the blow did not come, she looked me keenly and wonderingly in the face. She then said:

"Ma says she hates me—don't you?"

"No, indeed," I answered; "nor would your mother, if you were good and obedient."

"She loves Alicia, and she isn't good!" she replied.

Instead of appearing to notice this remark, I tried to divert her thoughts to a different and more pleasant subject. I could hardly have believed it possible that there could have been so sudden a transition from suspicion to confidence. After she had gone through with her lessons, she came to me, and, taking one of my hands in both of hers, she said, while there was a beautiful lighting up of her countenance:

"I had something last summer that loved me!"

"What was it?" I asked.

"A little brown bird. I used to throw crumbs to it, and at last it grew so tame that it would eat out of my hand. It went away when the snow came, but I guess it will come back again next summer, and see me—don't you?"

"Perhaps it will," I replied.

"I didn't let ma know anything about it," said she, "because I was afraid she would have it killed if I had, as she did my kitten."

I did all I could to soften Bertha's feelings towards her mother and sister—an effort which, as might be supposed, was not remarkably successful. With her father, in some measure, it was different. She had, before I came, begun to trust in him; but it was a timid, wavering trust, which the many calls on his time gave him now, as formerly, little leisure to strengthen and confirm.

In young minds, intuition has been said to supply the place of reason. Bertha, however, young as she was, and dull as she was said to be, had, in a certain degree, acquired the art of arriving at logical conclusions; and, as far, at least, as her parents and sister were concerned, she was unwilling to take anything entirely upon trust. She, therefore, for some time, though she had unbounded confidence in my own good-will and affection for her, was inclined to weigh more carefully than was altogether pleasing to me, every demonstration of regard or love on the part of her father. She had been taught to believe that he, in common with every one else, disliked her—and the belief was hard to conquer. But it was conquered at last, and her faith in him was to them a well-spring of peace and joy. The long-repressed affections of her heart began more fully to warm and expand themselves, and I believe that she would have loved her mother and sister, if they had not turned coldly away from her.

It is surprising what a sparkling freshness and beauty happiness will impart to the youthful countenance. It is indeed one of the best cosmetics for any face, whether young or old. Bertha now, at least to me, was far more lovely than Alicia.

When spring came, she often watched by the window or the return of the little brown bird, and when it was pleasant, she would steal out to the old apple-tree, beneath whose spreading boughs she used to feed it. I had little faith in its return, but she would often say, "I am sure it will come again."

And it did. One sunny day, in April, it flew down close to her feet. She threw it some crumbs—she always carried some with her when she went to watch for it beneath the apple-tree—and then she saw that it had found a mate. It was shy at first, but it soon grew fearless as the other, and in a short time they would both eat from her hand.

I think that both Bertha and myself were a trouble to Mrs. Alford, and I had for some time wished to go home and take the child with me though I had, at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Alford, consented to remain till the first of October.

Bertha was henceforth to be my own. I was to educate her as I pleased. Very different from what I had at first imagined, I found that her temperament was highly poetic. From time to time many beautiful traits of character developed themselves.

At first there was an earnest yearning to have everything love her. I remember that soon after I took her to my own home, one warm, summer-like evening, she stood at a window where the moonbeams, broken by the quivering foliage of a birch, threw over her a shower of silvery light. For some minutes she gazed up wistfully through the branches of the tree to the fair orb that was so tranquilly pursuing its blue pathway in the heavens. A smile, just perceptible, parted her lips. After awhile she spoke.

"Do you not think," she asked, "that the moon loves me?"

"If it is like me, it does, I have no doubt," I answered, not knowing exactly what to say.

"I am certain it does," she said, "or it would not look down upon me so softly!"

Mr. Alford often came to see his daughter, but his wife always had so much to do that it was impossible for her to leave home. Had she expressed the slightest wish to that effect, I would have taken the child to see her. She never did, and it was many years before the mother and daughter met. I rather liked Mrs. Alford for not pretending to an interest in Bertha which she did not feel. It at least showed that she was not hypocritical.

Her father soon began to grow proud of her—and with good reason. I was proud of her, too—not because that her progress in her studies was uncommonly rapid—I had seen children that went before her in that respect—it was more on account of a thoughtfulness and a consistency that exhibited themselves in a manner much more marked than is usually seen in one so young.

I occasionally heard from Alicia, through some person besides her father, and was not surprised at being told that she was peevish, petulant, and self-willed. It was what was to be expected from the example and training of her mother.

Many little incidents might be related, did space permit, illustrative of the gradual unfolding of Bertha's character. They did not show her to be faultless, by any means. A perverseness of temper, which, but for her mother's injudicious, or rather cruel treatment, might have remained latent, occasionally gave me some trouble, and cost her many tears, and many earnest and vigorous efforts to subdue.

At the age of seventeen, Alicia Alford had the reputation of being a beauty. She had many admirers and several others—one of which she accepted. The one thus distinguished was a gentleman of wealth, and well known in the fashionable circles of the city where he resided.

The idea of being mistress of a splendid establishment, had chiefly influenced her in her choice.

Bertha, at the time her sister was married, though two years older, had never had an offer. This, as I heard from several sources, was a matter of triumph on the part of Mrs. Alford and Alicia. As for Bertha, I am certain that she never thought of such a thing as being beloved by any one, except her father, myself, Simon Martin and his wife, and her pet birds; for though her spirits were light and buoyant as I could desire, the idea of her personal ugliness, which, in early childhood, had been deeply impressed upon her mind, never left her. Aside from the exceptions named, she did not deem herself attractive enough to excite emotions more ardent than friendship and esteem in the breast of any one. As, instead of detracting from her enjoyment, it only made her more intent on the improvement of her mind, it was an illusion I made no attempt to dispel.

But the time was near at hand when a change was to "come o'er the spirit of her dream." A young gentleman, by the name of James Arlington, about the time of her sister's marriage, opened a lawyer's office about half a mile distant from our place of residence. I used to see him at church, and was pleased with his appearance.

What Bertha thought of him I had no means of knowing, unless her total silence on the subject could be considered an indication that she, too, liked his appearance; and so well, that, actuated by a reserve natural in such cases, she abstained from making any allusion to him. After this idea occurred to me, without appearing to do so, I observed her narrowly: the result of which surmise as regarded her entertaining a favourable opinion of him, was exchanged for certainty.

I was careful not to let her suspect that I had detected her secret, and it was not long before I was convinced that she had excited in him a more than common interest. They had as yet never met, except at church; but I noticed that, invariably before the commencement of the religious services, his eyes wandered in the direction of our pew, much more frequently than it was natural to suppose they would have done, had there been no particular attraction.

It was three or four months before he and Bertha chanced to meet elsewhere than at church. This was at a small social party given by our nearest neighbour. I found him to be modest, unassuming, and very intelligent. He paid no more attention to Bertha than to any other lady present; but what little he did pay her was marked by a peculiar delicacy, such as could not fail to be gratifying to one so modest and sensitive as herself.

I saw no reason for discouraging this mutual preference; for I had taken pains to satisfy myself that his moral character was irreproachable, while he already gave the promise of attaining to a high rank in his profession. He was poor, however—if any person with youth, first-rate talent, energy, and perseverance, can be so considered. In my mind they constituted a heritage more to be desired than silver or gold; and Bertha's father, as I was well assured, would be of the same mind.

Mrs. Alford would, without doubt, think differently. With her everything would sink into insignificance, compared with wealth. But as she had, with her own hand, sundered the ties which bound her and her daughter together, it seemed to me that she had also forfeited the right to be consulted on the present occasion. Even to Mr. Alford there was no necessity of mentioning the subject at present. It was possible I had been mistaken—had been indulging in a dream of romance. Single ladies, who have ceased to indulge in them on their own account, may still do so as respects those younger and more beautiful than themselves.

After the party alluded to, I had no doubt but that Arlington would call in a few days. I think Bertha also entertained a similar expectation. If she did, she, as well as myself, was doomed to be disappointed; and in my own mind I reproached him not a little. I even, in the heat of my displeasure, called him dishonourable—forgetting that, on the evening of the party, he paid no more attention to Bertha than to me. No matter—it was of a different kind: of that he himself must have been sensible. There were times when I imagined Bertha less cheerful than formerly, and then I was more bitter against him than ever.

Things were in this state when Mrs. Wetmore, a lady of our acquaintance, came to spend with us a social afternoon, and take tea. I soon made some allusion to Arlington, as I was desirous to hear what she would say about him. After having spoken warmly in his praise, she said:

"I suppose you have heard that he is soon to be married?"

"No, I have not," I returned; and I rather think my colour changed a little.

As I spoke, I glanced my eyes towards Bertha, who sat by a window, sewing; but I could not see her face, as that very moment she turned to look at something out of doors which had caught her attention.

"Do you think it is anything more than an idle rumour?" I asked, as soon as I had a little recovered from the shock occasioned to my feelings by what Mrs. Wetmore had said.

"Most certainly I do. Ever since he came here, he has corresponded regularly with a lady by the name of Mary Lewisham."

"The lady may be his aunt?" I suggested. "It appears to me that I have heard that he had an aunt by the name you mention."

"That is what I told Rachel Beers, when she told me that he was going to be married. Rachel, you know, is a niece to Mrs. Lee, where Arlington boards. She is often there a week or more at a time, and one day she offered to sweep Mr. Arlington's chamber. Well, lying on the table there was an open letter—and she concluded, of course, that there was no privacy in it, or it would not have been left in that manner; so she took the liberty to read it, or rather a part of it—as she could do nothing more than run over it quickly; for, happening to cast her eye out of the window, she saw Arlington coming towards the house. She, however, found out that there was a marriage on the tapis; also enough to satisfy herself that James Arlington and Mary Lewisham, the writer of the letter, were the couple who were going to be married."

"Was the day mentioned?" I inquired.

"Oh, yes, the fifth of next month—which will be just three weeks from to-day. All I wish is, that Miss Lewisham may be worthy of him—for he is one of the finest and most talented young men I ever met with."

As I did not feel in a mood for praising him just then, I remained silent. I could not divest myself of the idea that Arlington had, by his looks, if not by his words, showed quite too lively an interest in Bertha for one who was already as good as married.

After what Mrs. Wetmore had told us, I was not a little surprised when Mrs. Martin, the housekeeper, the next morning, while I was attending to some favourite flowers in the garden, sent to let me know that Squire Arlington had called.

I meant to appear very cold and distant; but somehow, when he shook hands with me, and mentioned how desirous he had long been to cultivate our acquaintance (meaning Bertha and me), my reserve all vanished.

Bertha, who happened to be in the parlour at the time of his arrival, looked better than I had ever seen her in my life. A call from him was entirely unexpected, and the excitement which it occasioned had deepened the colour of her cheeks, and caused her eyes to beam with uncommon brilliancy.

After awhile, he remarked that he expected to leave the place soon—probably in a week or ten days.

"I have so understood," I replied.

He looked surprised, I thought; and in a minute he said that he was not aware he had informed any one of his intention.

"I hope your journey will prove a pleasant one," said I.

"Thank you!" he replied; "and I have not much doubt but it will, as the event which is to be celebrated when I arrive at my place of destination promises to be productive of much happiness to the parties concerned!"

Up to this time I had cherished a faint hope that Mrs. Wetmore's informant, by the hasty manner in which she perused the letter, might have misapprehended its true import; but now that Arlington had himself made allusion to the anticipated marriage, all doubt on the subject was terminated.

When Arlington rose to take leave, he remarked, that when he returned he hoped to be able to call on us often. I said something complimentary in reply, and added, that when he did come back, I supposed it would not be alone.

"I don't expect any one to accompany me," he answered.

"Why, I imagined that you would bring your wife with you!" I said.

"Wife!" he repeated. "I supposed that you knew I was a bachelor."

"Certainly. But I inferred from what you said that you expected to be married while absent."

"I was not aware that I expressed myself so obscurely. The object of my journey is to be present at the wedding of Mary Lewisham, who, though only a cousin, has ever been dear to me as a sister."

I felt somewhat embarrassed; but this unpleasant state of feeling was more than counterbalanced by the joy I felt at beholding the brightened countenance of Bertha.

Arlington at the appointed time departed on his journey, and returned at the time he had intended. Soon afterwards, he made formal proposals for the hand of Bertha, and was accepted.

As I had anticipated, her father avowed Arlington's suit; and as soon as a lucrative practice of his profession rendered it expedient, the young couple were married.

In ten or twelve years Arlington had accumulated a handsome fortune: it being precisely the same time which it had taken the husband of Alicia to spend a much larger one.

FACETIÆ.

A Western editor, in answer to a complaint of a patron that he did not give news enough, advised him, when news was scarce, to read the Bible, which he had no doubt would be new to him.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.—"Did your fall hurt you?" said one Patlander to another, who had fallen from the top of a two-storey house. "Not in the least, honey! 'Twas stoppin' so quick that hurt me!"

"Would you be willing to undertake the management of my business, for your victuals and clothes?" said a wealthy merchant to a gentleman who was congratulating him on his vast property. "No," was the reply. "Well, that's all I get!" said the millionaire.

WISDOM.—If thou hast a loitering servant, send him on thine errand just before his dinner.

CIVILISATION.—Cortez, in a letter to Charles V., in illustration of the advanced state of society among the Indians of Mexico, says, that "they begged in the streets like civilised people."

A GOOD JOKE.—A person once sent a note to a waggish friend for the loan of his noosepaper, and received in return his marriage certificate!

REVERSING A PROVERB.—"Figgers won't lie, will they?" muttered a seedy gentleman, holding on to a lamp-post. "Vell, perhaps they won't; but I sees a figger as won't stand, anyhow."

THE man in gaol who looked out of the window of his cell, and exclaimed: "This is a grate country!" is now generally admitted to have spoken within bounds.

SEEING THE ECLIPSE.—"You didn't go to Cork to-day, Paddy?" "Och, no!" said Paddy; "I heard a gentleman say there would be an eclipse on the moon here to-night, and I staid to see it."

SEVERE.—"You've destroyed my peace of mind, Betsey," said a despairing lover to a truant lass. "It can't do you much harm, John, for it was an amazing small piece you had, any way."

AN Irish story, by Burke, is as follows: "A squire, with hardly any means, used to entertain the militia and others in his neighbourhood; and when a friend expostulated with him on the extravagance of giving claret to these fellows when whisky punch would do just as well, he answered, 'You're right, my dear friend; but I have the claret on tick, and where the devil would I get credit for the lemons?'"

A medicine case and contents, valued at three or four pounds, was recently stolen from Dr. Pillsbury, of Finchley, and the doctor says if the thief will return the case, he may take the medicine, and have "advice gratis." Very generous, considering that he would probably be beyond the reach of advice after taking the medicine.

"How very seldom it happens," said one friend to another, "that we find gardeners who are bred to their business." "Very well," replied the other, "and have you not remarked how seldom the business is bred to the gardeners?"

In one of our courts, the other day, the Attorney-General proposed to call a witness named Lemon, who, he thought, would tell a plainer story than had a previous witness. "Well," said the judge, "call up Lemon, and let us try to squeeze some information out of him."

A POOL'S DECISION.—A poor beggar in Paris, being very hungry, staved so long in a cook's shop that his stomach was satisfied with only the smell thereof. The choleric, covetous cook demanded of him to pay for his breakfast. The poor man denied it, and it was referred to the decision of the next man that should pass by, who chanced to be a most notorious idiot. He determined that the poor man's money should be put betwixt empty dishes, and the cook be recompensed by its jingling, as he was satisfied with only the smell of the cook's meat.—Fuller

ONE of Richter's proverbs says, a full purse breeds vanity. We opine there are a good many who would risk the experiment, and not grumble at the consequences.

A SMALL EATER.—Nurse: What's the matter with little Willie? Is my darling sick? "Little Dear (speaking rapidly and without stop): O! 'ah! hoo-ooo! Nurse, I only ate seven apples and a tart and two pies and those cakes ma left in the cupboard and a plateful of pickles, and I'm so bad—Ooo-ooo! Nurse, I'm so bad!"

"BILL," said one apprentice to another, "my master is a better man to work for than your old man. My master ain't always round his shop interfering with his own business!"

A lady, given to tattle, says she never tells anything only to two classes of people—those who ask her, and those who don't.

THE OBSTRE BOY.—"I say, boy, stop that ox!" "I haven't got no stopper, sir." "Well, head him, then." "He's already headed, sir." "Confound your impertinence, turn him!" "He's right side out already, sir." "Speak to him, you rascal, you!" "Good morning, Mr. Ox!"

MARRIED.—At Salem, Mr. Joseph Tremble to Miss Anne Jane Watson.

How symptoms oft their opposites resemble!

Not fear, but joy, could so have made her Tremble.

A PRECOCIOUS YOUTH.—"We were rusticated a few days since at a farm-house," says a Western editor, "and invited a young lady to favour us with a tune on the piano. Her music-book being in the adjoining room, her brother, a young gen. of some fourteen summers, was requested to go for it. After the lapse of a few moments, he returned, and placed an egg on the music-stand. On being asked what that was for, he replied, that it was the 'lay of the last minstrel,' and that the composer was singing in honour of her production in the fowl-house."

Upon coming into the office, the other day, we asked an ancient "P.D." his rule of punctuation. Said he—"I set up as long as I can hold my breath, then put in a comma; when I gape I insert a semicolon; when I sneeze a colon; and when I want to take another chew of tobacco, I insert a period." We cannot withhold these rules, so admirable in their simplicity, from the public.

SMILES.—Oh! what a sight there is in that word—smile—for it changes colour like a chameleon. There's a vacant smile, a cold smile, a satiric smile, a smile of bate, an affected smile, a smile of approbation, a friendly smile; but, above all, a smile of love. A woman has two smiles that an angel might envy—the smile that accepts the lover before words are uttered, and the smile that lights on the first-born baby, and assures him of a mother's love.—Sam Slick's Wise Saws.

SOME youth who had stolen a kiss, was seized with sudden penitence. His is a very touching confession:

I feel my fault—denial now were vain;

I do "repent me of my foul design!"

The kiss I stole I'll give thee back again,

If you'll give back the kiss you've got of mine.

VERY CURIOUS LADIES.—A tradesman at Luton, Bedfordshire, has the following notice stuck up in his window: Good ladies, 1s.; lasting ditto, 1s. 6d. per pair.

FONTENELLE, when describing the difference in the mental constitution of the sexes, says—woman has a cell less in the brain, but a fibre more in the heart than man.

MATIMONY AND FRIENDSHIP.—The nature of matrimony is one thing, and the nature of friendship is another. A tall man likes a short wife; a great talker likes a silent woman—for both can't talk at once. A gay man likes a domestic gal—for he can leave her to home to nuss children and make pap, while he is enjoyin' of himself to parties. A man that aint any music in him, likes it in his spouse, and so on. It chimes beautiful, for they aint in each other's way. Now, friendship is the other way; you must like the same things, to like each other and be friends. A similarity of tastes, studies, pursuits, and recreations (what they call congenial souls); a toper for a toper, a smoker for a smoker, a horse-racer for a horse-racer, a prize-fighter for a prize-fighter—and so on. Matrimony likes contrasts; friendship seeks its own counterparts.—Sam Slick's Wise Saws.

A SHARP THIEF OF THE OLDEN TIME.—The following audacious robbery was committed at an apothecary's in Princes Street: A fellow went in at the private door, which happened to be open, walked up stairs, packed up the bed, mattress, and all the bedding and furniture of the bed, and came softly down stairs with it; by some accident his foot slipped in the passage, as he was going out, and the load fell from his head. The noise brought out the apothecary: "Heyday, friend!" says he, "what are you doing there?" "Sir," replied the man, without the least hesitation, "I have brought home the bed and bedding you purchased to-day at the auction." "I purchased a bed at an auction!" was the answer: "I was at no auction, nor have I bought a bed." "I am sure," returned the fellow, "my master told me it was an apothecary's—or perhaps he might say it was near an apothecary's—I am sorry for the mistake, sir, and I beg you will be so good as to help me up again with my load, that I may carry it to the right place." The apothecary very civilly did as he was desired, and the man marched off with his prize. But lo! when the apothecary and his wife withdrew to bed at night, all that presented itself to their view was a naked four-post bedstead, and the person robbed discovered that he had literally assisted in the robbing of himself.

A CROWS' COURT-MARTIAL.—Well, I have heard the crows talk to each other, and seen them plant sentries out when they seed me a watchin' of them, and once I actilly saw them hold a court-martial. The old veterans came from all the ports about here, and from all the islands, and bluffs, and shores, up and down; and the culprit hung his head down, and looked foolish enough, you may depend. What he had done I don't know. Whether he had run off with another crow's wife, or stole a piece of meat, or went to sleep when he was on guard, or what, I don't know; but arter consultin' together, they turned to and fell on him, and killed him, and then adjourned the court and dispersed: that's a natural fact.—Sam Slick's Wise Saws.

SOLD AT HALF PRICE.—A shopkeeper marked some handkerchiefs in his window with the tempting words, "Selling at half price!" Shortly after, a lady, who had dealt with him before, entered his establishment, and, having examined the handkerchiefs, inquired the price. "Two shillings each," replied the shopkeeper. "Very well," said the lady, "you may do me up a dozen." The handkerchiefs were cut off and delivered to the lady, who gave the shopkeeper twelve shillings. "Beg pardon, madam; but I—ah—told you they were two shillings each—that is twenty-four shillings a dozen." "To be sure!" replied the lady, archly; "I understand as much arithmetic as that. Twenty-four shillings is the price; half of twenty-four is surely twelve; that is half price. I think them very cheap. Good morning, sir!" The lady shut the door. The shopkeeper opened his eyes. For five minutes he stood still as a stump, gazing vacantly at the window; then, biting his lips, and colouring very red, he gently removed the card pinned to the handkerchiefs, and resolved to announce no more goods as "selling at half price."

A HIGH PRICE FOR A KISS.—A very good story is told of an acquaintance of ours—a commercial traveller, who was passing through the county Monaghan some short time since. He took up his quarters, it seems, at a certain hotel; and having comforted his inner man with a good dinner, a steaming "full-flowing bowl," and some of those other good things a hotel can always afford, he was becoming right merry; and a young lady connected with the establishment happening to come into the room in which he was, nothing would satisfy our gentleman but a kiss. As he was rather a well-faced young fellow, and respectable, the fair one was not very loth; modesty, however, would not permit her to give it without a slight struggle. In this struggle a drawer, containing a number of china articles, was pulled out to the floor, and the contents shattered to fragments. The accident elicited an "Oh, dear! see what I've done!" from the gallant, and a response of "No harm done," from the lady; and so the matter dropped at that time. We cannot state positively that he received the kiss; however, judging of others by oneself, and considering there was no serious disinclination on her part, we may take it for granted that he did obtain it. On glancing his eyes along the several items of the bill presented next morning, how must he have stared on discovering—"For china broken—five pounds!" He demurred; but in the end paid. Just at that instant, the mischievous fair one thrust in her head, and asked him if he would have a kiss? Bowing low and politely, he declined it at the price.

A PARLIAMENTARY MOVE.—Sibthorp is vastly indignant at the fuss that is being made about "moving the table," which, he says, any broker's man can do; but what is it, he asks, compared to the fact of his being able, any night he chooses, to "move the entire House?"—Punch.

A FINANCIAL ACHIEVEMENT.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer has a right to expect that his repeal of the duty on eggs will be illustrated in his hatchment.—Ibid.

FINE ARTS.—They are busy embellishing Buckingham Palace again. We wonder what architectural enormity it will be like when it is completely beautified?—Ibid.

MOTTO OF THE NORTH-EAST WIND.—"Cut, and come again!"—Ibid.

A DEFINITION TO A HAIR.—The greatest failure of the crops—having one's hair very wretchedly cut.—Ibid.

A SUM FOR SOMEBODY.—If wheat is 44 shillings a quarter, how much is it a year, and what will be a fair average price for chaff?—Ibid.

A ROGUE OUTWITTED.

A curious instance occurred in London, not long ago, in which a rascal was outwitted. A bachelor gentleman, who was a very superior draughtsman and caricaturist, was laid up in his apartments, with gout in both feet. He could not move, but was wheeled in his chair in and out of his sitting-room. A well-known vagabond, ascertaining the fact, watched till his servant was sent upon a message. The area door communicated with the kitchen, through which the vagabond entered, and walked up stairs, where, as he expected, he found the gentleman quite alone and helpless.

"I am sorry to see you in such a situation," said the rogue; "you cannot move, and the servant is out!" The gentleman started.

"It is excessively careless to leave yourself so exposed; for, behold the consequences! I take the liberty of removing this watch and seals of the table, and putting them in my own pocket; and as I perceive your keys are here, I shall unlock these drawers, and see what suits my purpose."

"Pray help yourself," replied the gentleman, who was aware that he could do nothing to prevent it.

The rogue did so, accordingly. He found the plate in the sideboard, and many other things that suited him; and in ten minutes, having made up his bundle, he made the gentleman a low bow, and decamped. But the gentleman had the use of his hands, and had not been idle: he had taken an exact likeness of the thief with the pencil; and, on the servant's returning soon after, he dispatched him immediately to the police-station, with the drawing, and an account of what had happened. The likeness was so good that the man was immediately identified by the runners, and was captured before he had time to dispose of a single article. He was brought to the gentleman two hours afterwards, identified, and the property on him sworn to, and in six weeks was on his way to Botany Bay.

THE MARRIAGE ALTAR.

JUDGE CHARLTON, in a recent eloquent address before the Young Men's Library Association, thus sketches the marriage scene:

"I have drawn for you many pictures of death; let me sketch for you a brief but bright scene of beautiful life. It is the marriage altar. A lovely female, clothed in all the freshness of youth and surpassing beauty, leans upon the arm of him to whom she has just pledged her faith—to whom she has just given herself up for ever! Look in her eyes, ye gloomy philosophers, and tell me, if you dare, that there is no happiness on earth!

"See the trusting, the heroic devotion which impels her to leave country, parents, for a comparative stranger! She has launched her frail barque upon a wide and stormy sea; she has handed over her happiness and doom for this world to another's keeping; but she has done it fearlessly—for love whispers to her, that her chosen guardian and protector bears a manly and a noble heart. Oh, woe to him that forgets his oath and his manhood!

Her dark wing shall the raven flap,
O'er the false-hearted;
His warm blood the wolf shall lap,
Ere life be parted.
Shame and dishonour sit
On his grave ever;
Blessing shall hallow it.—
Never! oh, never!

"We have all read the story of the husband who, in a moment of hasty wrath, said to her who had but a few months before united her fate to his: 'If you are not satisfied with my conduct, go—return to your friends, and to your happiness!' And will you give me back that which I brought to you? asked the despairing wife. 'Yes,' he replied; 'all your wealth shall go with you! I covet it not.' 'Alas!' she answered; 'I thought not of my wealth—I spoke of my devoted love! Can you give this back to me?' 'No!' said the man, as he flung himself at her feet. 'No, I cannot restore this! But I will do more. I will keep it unsullied and untainted! I will cherish it through my life, and in my death; and never again will I forget that I have sworn to protect and cherish her who gave up to me all she held most dear!

"Did I not tell you there was poetry in a woman's look—a woman's word? See it here! the mild, the gentle reproof of love winning back from its harshness and rudeness the stern and unyielding temper of an angry man! Ah! if creation's fairer sex only knew their strongest weapons, how many of wedlock's fiercest battles would be unfought! how much of unhappiness and coldness would be avoided!"

MISCELLANEOUS.

It should always be the study of a young man to avoid idleness and intemperance, for they are the forerunners of recklessness and vice.

ENGLISH BEAUTY.—Talk of its fading! it never fades. It is but transferred from face to face. The bud comes forth as the blossom is perfected; and the bud bursts into blossom but to hide the falling leaves, fragrant amid the decay of the parent flower. Then the beauties of our country are so varied! The peasant-girl, gifted with pearl-like modesty, and the courtly maiden, set, as her birthright, in a golden circle—the intellectual face beaming intelligence—and the English matron, proud as Cornelia of her living jewels. Nor is the perfection of English beauty confined to any class. In summer-time you meet it everywhere: by the hedge-rows, in the streets, in the markets, in the parks, at watering-places; at home and abroad. At every turn, one meets some fair specimen of living beauty.

AN INGENUOUS REBUKE.—A general officer, who was in early life much addicted to profane oaths, dated his reformation from the memorable check he received from a Scotch clergyman. When he was a lieutenant, and settled at Newcastle, he got involved in a brawl with some of the lowest class in the public street, and the altercation was carried on by both parties with abundance of impious language. The clergyman passed by, shocked with the profanity, and, stepping into the crowd with his cane uplifted, addressed one of the leaders of the rabble: "Oh, John, John, what is this I hear? You, only a poor collier boy, and swearing like any lord in the land? Oh, John, have you no fear what will become of you? It may do very well for the gallant gentleman (pointing to the lieutenant), to bang and swear as he pleases; but you—you John—it is not for you, or the like of you, to take in vain the name of Him in whom you live and have your being!" Then turning to the lieutenant: "You'll excuse the poor man, sir, for he is an ignorant body, and knows nae better! The young officer shrank away in confusion, unable to make any reply. Next day he waited upon the minister, and thanked him sincerely for his well-timed reproof, and was ever afterwards an example of correctness of language.

AN ITALIAN PHILOSOPHER.—A communication was lately made to the Academy of Sciences at Paris, of a collection of valuable papers which had been discovered in the mattress of an old Italian who had died in the Hotel Dien, and who had been a servant to a celebrated Italian philosopher, named Segato. During the life-time of the late Pope, Segato, who was a native of Bologna, went to Rome, for the purpose of pursuing certain scientific experiments. While thus engaged he formed the acquaintanceship of an English gentleman, and the greatest friendship sprang up between them. The discoveries of the Italian so delighted the Englishman, that for a long time he assisted in their prosecution at his own expense. It was the theory of the blood that the Italian had studied, and the results at which he had arrived are described as being most wonderful. Among other things he had accomplished the petrification of the human blood to such a degree as to resemble the richest porphyry for hardness and variety of shade and colour. A table, formed of squares of blood, human and animal, is still to be seen in the museum at Bologna, having been presented to the institution by the learned savant himself. Cardinal Bergami used to take great pride in exhibiting a walking-stick, having at the top the yolk of an egg, hard and transparent, and resembling a piece of cornelian of fabulous size. He had received the gem from Segato, and used to plague and puzzle the scientific of all nations who came to Rome with this wonderful egg. Segato was imprisoned by the Papal government for no other cause than that his retirement excited the suspicion of the ruling authorities.

THE NILE is a remarkable river. Nor is the land through which it flows, or the people who dwell upon its banks, less worthy of remark than itself. In length the river may justly be ranked amongst the mightiest of earth. In importance it is second to none. For 1500 miles—or half its length—its current rolls along in solitary majesty, without receiving a single tributary stream deserving of notice. It flows through a district that would be a wilderness but for its fertilising waters—a district that is thus rescued from the edge of a desert of more than 3000 miles across. The valley of the Nile, and therefore the land of Egypt, has an average breadth of only 15 miles. Towards the mouth of the river, the fertile land extends to a much greater breadth: because the stream, dividing into two branches, incloses an extensive tract of country. This portion is called the Delta; and upon it nearly half the population of Egypt dwell. From time immemorial this river has annually overflowed its banks, and converted the dry and parched country into one vast lake. Just as regularly has the water subsided, and left the land covered with a stratum of rich, soft mud, which has caused this otherwise arid desert—without the aid of manure and without the rains of heaven—to become the most fertile spot on the face of the earth. Hence the Egyptians have ever been an agricultural people, and the culture of their land has always been effected with comparatively little trouble to themselves. They have been, as it were, the favourites of heaven; and, as a natural consequence, have failed to learn that reliance on themselves which the inhabitants of less highly-favoured lands acquire.

ANECDOTES FROM MOORE'S "DIARY," &c.—John Lamb (brother of Charles) once knocked down Hazlitt, and on those present interfering, and asking the latter to forgive his assailant, H. said: "Well, I don't care if I do: I am a metaphysician, and don't mind a blow; nothing but ideas hurt me." Mr. Fielding tells him a story of a person who, meeting a friend running through the rain with an umbrella over him, said: "Where are you running to in such a hurry, like a mad mushroom?" Here is an entry about Canning: "17th, Met —, walking with a gentleman and two ladies. After I had passed I observed the party stop, and the gentleman make signs to — as if to call me back, which — accordingly did, saying: 'Moore, here's Mr. Canning wishes very much to be introduced to you.' It was no other than the right honourable orator himself, who put out his hand to shake mine in the most cordial manner. A singular circumstance this, and as creditable to him as it is certainly flattering to me. His daughter is a very pretty girl. I remember, when I saw and walked in company with this girl at Rome, I made a resolution (on observing not only her beauty, but feeling all those associations of an elegant and happy home which her manner called up) that I would never write another line against her father. His cordial reception of me has now clinched this determination."

AUTHORSHIP OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.—The writer of this article spent a few days, some years ago, with a highly respectable lady, who was an intimate friend and a member of the church of a Scottish clergyman near the border. She informed him that she had been repeatedly assured by this clergyman—a man of the highest character and of indisputable veracity—that all the earlier works known as the 'Waverley Novels,' were written under his roof. A certain degree of mystery attached to his personage, owing to the known residence there of a gentleman who never appeared abroad. This gentleman, whose name has been already mentioned, owing to certain grave suspicions against him, was compelled to a life of the strictest seclusion, and took refuge in the house of the said clergyman, from which he was twice driven away in female attire, in consequence of suspicions entertained by his host that the place of his retreat had become known. His incognito was, however, preserved to the last. One of the conditions with the clergyman was, that his private room should never be entered; and for a long time this was strictly observed. At length an accidental circumstance obliged his host to violate his privacy. He found him with a considerable quantity of manuscripts before him, and this opportunity was taken by the recluse to disclose the fact that he was occupying himself with a series of historical romances, one of which was already complete. This was 'Waverley.' The author read it to his entertainer, and from this time admitted him to his confidence. A method of publication was agreed upon, and the manuscript was taken by the clergyman to Sir Walter Scott, under the seal of the most sacred secrecy. Others followed in rapid succession, and were similarly and personally delivered to Sir Walter. The author died at the house of his host about the time of the publication of 'Quentin Durward,' leaving behind him a quantity of manuscripts more or less complete, as material for future works of a similar description—which, at his request, were placed in Sir Walter's hands. We offer this singular narrative to the public for what it is worth. We commit ourselves to no opinion on the subject, except only to the respectability of the party from whom we received the statement.—Eclectic Review.

READY-MADE SHIRTS.—"We saw on the slope of the Cerra Dnida," says M. Humboldt, "shirt-trees fifty feet high. The Indians cut off cylindrical pieces two feet in diameter, from which they peel the red and fibrous bark, without making any longitudinal incision. This bark affords them a sort of garment which resembles sacks of a very coarse texture, and without a seam. The upper opening serves for the head, and two lateral holes are cut to serve for the arms. The natives wear these shirts of Marina in the rainy season; they have the form of the ponchos and manos of cotton which are so common in New Granada, at Quito, and in Peru. As in this climate riches and beneficence of nature are regarded as the primary causes of the indolence of the inhabitants, the missionaries do not fail to say, in showing the shirts of the Marina, 'In the forests of Oronoko, garments are found ready made upon the trees.'"

TIME.—As in money, so in time, we are to look chiefly to the smallest portions. Take care of the minutes and the hours, and years will take care of themselves. Gold is not found in California for the most part in great masses, but in little grains. It is sifted out of the sand in minute particles, which, melted together, produce the rich ingots that excite the world's cupidity. So the spare pieces of time, the shreds, the odds and ends of time put together, may form a great and beautiful work. Hale wrote his contemplations when on his circuits. Dr. Mason Good translated "Lucretius" in his carriage, while, as a physician, he rode from door to door. One of the chancellors of France penned a bulky volume in the successive intervals of daily waiting for dinner. Doddridge wrote his "Expositor" chiefly before breakfast. Kirke White studied Greek, went over the nouns and verbs, as he was going to and from a lawyer's office. Burney learned French and Italian while riding on horseback. Franklin laid the foundations of his wonderful stock of knowledge in his dinner hours and evenings, while working as a printer's boy. In the Palace of Industry there were several curious specimens of art, wrought by humble individuals, out of such fragments of time as they could secure from their regular occupations. Oh, the preciousness of moments! No gold nor gems can be compared to them.—Rev. J. Stoughton.

COMPOSITION OF THE ATMOSPHERE.

THE average composition of our atmosphere has long since been determined; and its uniformity, excepting as to accidental gases and vapours, under every zone and at every attainable elevation, is another fact we are accustomed to regard as constant and unvarying. When any discrepancy has been observed, this aberration was usually traceable to some foreign and accidental influence. There are two questions, however, connected with this subject hitherto undetermined, and to which M. Regnault has addressed himself. These are: Is the composition of the atmosphere uniform and unvarying during the change of seasons, and throughout the year? And is this composition uniform all over the world? These questions require so much delicacy in the requisite experiments, that it is fortunate they have excited the interest of a chemist well qualified to undertake this investigation. M. Regnault has contrived an apparatus for analysing atmospheric air, which admits of the determination of its constituents with greater exactness than former edimeters. He has also dispersed over sea and land, by captains of ships, scientific friends, and government officials, large glass tubes terminating in two points, which admit of being hermetically sealed with the flame of a spirit-lamp, when the air of the wished-for locality has been made to pass slowly through it for a few minutes by means of bellows, the meteorological data at the time and place being noted and accompanying its tube—the dates chosen being the 1st and 15th of each month, at noon—as a means for collecting specimens of air from various spots on the earth's surface. Several analyses of these specimens have been made, and compared with air taken at Paris at the times above noticed, as the standard; and these results averaged with some late analyses of Lewy and of Bunsen of atmospheric air in different localities. From these data, M. Regnault concludes that the composition of the atmosphere does vary sensibly, though slightly—the per-centage of oxygen oscillating between 20.90 and 21; but that, under certain circumstances, which occur more frequently within the tropics than in the other zones, the amount of oxygen falls to 20.30 per cent. In Paris, during 1848, the average of oxygen was 20.96 per cent. From this we gather, that not only is the quantity of air respired in hot countries less than in cold from atmospheric expansion, the number of respirations remaining the same; but that even this diminished quantity is of inferior quality—containing a smaller amount of what our fathers aptly denominated "vital air," than exists in the atmosphere of temperate and cold countries.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Sea-water may be softened for washing. The following method has been practised with success. Take a strong solution of soda or potash, with an equal quantity of Chinaclay: mix them into a thick paste, one pound of which is sufficient to soften four gallons of sea-water.

UNAPPRECIATED has fallen in love with a gentleman who must be an extraordinary being if the description she gives be correct. He is an Apollo in the shape of a fast young man, driving four-in-hand. But our correspondent is decidedly deranged. Such passion is not natural. It is improper, indelicate, and dangerous.

ROMEO.—The pictorial Shakespeare is as good as any. But if you do not require the notes, any other popular edition will be found to contain all his authenticated dramas. You ask us to criticise these immortal works. You might as well ask us to praise the sun.

W. N.—Invest your £200 in the purchase of houses, so that the rents may accumulate. Suppose you were to purchase property worth £600, producing a rental of £50. On that you borrow £400 at five per cent.—£20 per annum, leaving £30 per annum, minus repairs, &c.; at all events, yielding you eight per cent. on the £200.

G. B. Y.—The dome of St. Pauls, with the lantern, crowned by a gilt copper ball and cross, rise altogether to thrice the height of the roofs—or 365 feet from the ground—356 from the floor of the church, and 375 from that of the crypts.

HORTSPUR.—Gratitude is a more heavenly feeling than love—because it is at once not only the one solitary, unsophisticated exposition of human nature, but the highest manifestation of human sentiment. It comprises all the others, because it is superior to all the others. As Milton says, "a grateful mind never pays—it is always owing." A kindness received has fastened itself in the memory, just as an island is fastened amid the ocean; and although the waves and winds of fortune beat and war against it, the firm-set earth itself is not firmer. Love requires sustenance. It must be returned, or like a fire unsupplied with fuel, it burns itself out. Gratitude never dies—if it ever did, there would be little celestial light in the universe. But it is not every person who can be grateful. It is only the finest organisations that are susceptible of the feeling. The chord is too delicate for the sordid soul of the sordid man or woman. It is the last flower of Eden left on earth, and it only blooms in the sunny atmosphere of kindly desires, pure emotions, and generous aspirations. Giving everything and taking nothing but the sweet thrill of satisfaction at having done right, it turns all it touches to gold—the gold of the everlasting life.

M. Y.—There is a turning point in the life every human being. We do not mean there is a tidal current which must ebb and flow, and flow and ebb; but something less definite—something more dependent on circumstances. Man is less a creature of destiny than is generally imagined. Destiny is something inevitable, like the tides; but as every sentient being has the power to make his or her destiny, neither he nor she can be considered as any other than a free agent, as regards the complexion of his or her future. It is the care taken at the turning point that determines the destiny—especially whether for good or evil. When this turning point can be recognised constitutes the whole of the difficulty. When it does come, the character of the future is fixed. It is only allowed to beings with the souls of giants, to sail in the wind's eye. Therefore the critical period in every man's and woman's spiritual life should be closely watched. Generally in man it occurs within five or six years after attaining manhood—in woman it is always earlier. Eighteen would be a reasonable limit for all female temperaments. But whenever it does occur, it is invariably preceded by bodily lassitude, mental lassitude, and a longing for something not present to the imagination, and to which, of course, a name cannot be given. This fact has not hitherto been considered by moral physiologists.

MARY.—Jealousy is the soul of love. The passion without jealousy would be a coarse materiality. Love is selfish—fiercely selfish. And if it were not covetous, guarded, and watchful, it would soon expire. Therefore it is that jealousy is to love what daily bread is to the body—it keeps the lamp burning. But this conservative feeling is liable to be perverted—to become coarse and vulgar. Suspicion is jealousy in its lowest sense. It is the fiend that torments the married imagination. Pure jealousy is akin to the sentiment by which lovers are animated. It is a faithful sentinel, doing its duty, and no more. And the difference may be perceived, when we know that a lover will fight for his mistress—risk body and soul in her behalf; a husband is not so chivalric. When he gets into a passion, it is not to defend or avenge the honour of his wife, but his own. He is the injured party. That is jealousy degraded to the lowest form of selfishness. Pure jealousy is a guardian, a protector, a friend, a champion. In the man it manifests itself in a generous watchfulness—no doubt enters into its composition; in the woman it is unlimited devotion.

D. W. B. complains that some acquaintances are inordinately proud. Like Diomed, they seem to spurn the earth they tread. Our correspondent must learn to discriminate between pride and vanity. Pride in man or woman is an ennobling, a saving quality. It is the basis of virtue—it is the spur which, when applied to the sides of a good intention, enables the noble steed to go safely and swiftly over broken ground. Vanity rather debases than elevates the character—for it is essentially a sordid feeling. It places SELF above every other consideration. Pride scorns meanness—vanity hugs it. We never had much confidence in a vain person, whether man or woman. And we would observe, that the disposition to be vain is as common in men as women. The latter, in some respects, are privileged; but when their vanity becomes too apparent, they are sure to create a dislike of themselves in others, and so are severely punished. Vanity in a man, however, is insufferable. When so afflicted, he is a kind of cross between an ape and a peacock. You may always tell a proud person from a vain one. A really proud man is never ashamed of a poor friend or acquaintance; a vain one "cuts" him with affected superciliousness. But reserve is not pride. If you see a diffident person—one who cannot chatter like a parrot—do not jump to the conclusion that he or she is proud. Pride has a deeper and more solid foundation.

ROBERT HALLIDAY.—We have patriotism enough to be indignant when our country is abused by strangers. Foreigners do not understand us. And when they tell us that England is the abode of every vice—of every form of suffering incident to the lowest conditions of humanity—we reply, that they exaggerate; but as we have provoked such strictures, by the "Uncle Tom's furore," we have no right to complain. Retaliation is as natural as love. But the accusations brought against England are over-coloured. The vice prevailing is very shocking, but it is transcended in horror by the vices that reign unchecked in the American sea-board cities. Lands of freedom are too often lands of licence. And as regards English poverty, it is awfully lamentable, we must admit—but it has decreased, and is daily decreasing; and the sentimentalists in England and America have not assumed an impregnable position on this question; for they have omitted to explain, that all this vice and poverty is due to bad institutions, to poor-laws, to false charity, to ignorance, and every species of agent that weakens the self-reliance and independence of the masses, BROMPTON.—Having from an honourable motive delayed attempting to obtain the young lady's affection until she had engaged herself to another gentleman, you are not precluded from now declaring your attachment. Love, like war, is a game at which the most cunning as well as the strongest win. But the same circumstances continuing, it would be for your own conscience to justify attempting to break off a match, when you had not an equivalent position to offer the lady.

E. P. J.—We are perfectly aware that the success or failure of the Crystal Palace scheme depends on its being opened or closed on Sunday. If opened on a Sunday, it must be a failure; and we are only astonished that the directors are so short-sighted. But that is not the question which we entertained. What we contended for was a proper definition of Sunday. At present there are two Sundays in this country, and yet no Sunday at all. There is a church Sunday and an Act of Parliament Sunday—and five-sixths of the population snap their fingers at both. So that the mass of the people entirely ignore Sunday, except as a holiday, to which they have been accustomed by habit. What, then, is Sunday? Have we really a Sunday in this country? or is the definition we should accept, to be a Sunday for those who like to attend to religious ordinances, and a Sunday for those who ramble in the fields, doze and sit at home, or seek relaxation in the pestiferous atmosphere of a tavern? This question must be settled one way or the other before the Crystal Palace can be consistently opened on the Sunday. The legislature must either tell us what Sunday is, or order us to observe something which we shall regard as Sunday. The church, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, has failed to convince the majority that they ought to observe the Sunday.

THE H. S.—The question of the Holy Shrines, per se, is only interesting to the Roman and Greek churches—but it may be made the pretext for the dismemberment of the Ottoman empire. In a political point of view, the possession of Jerusalem is of no moment to any people; but the rival churches would rather see the Holy City in the lake of brimstone than in the exclusive possession of either of them. On the festival days the most scandalous scenes occur. The year that Dr. Richardson was at Jerusalem, he witnessed the mummery of finding the cross in the chapel of St. Helena, by the Latins, on the 3rd of May, which happened to be the same day on which the Greeks go through the same ridiculous ceremony. There was quite a battle royal between the ecclesiastical combatants, who, with brick-bats and clubs, teeth and nails, fought for their chapel, like kites and crows for their nests. The Romans were routed. "The devil aids the Greeks!" exclaimed the superior of the Latin convent, panting from the effects of a blow; "they are schismatics, and you Englishmen who live in our convent see us beaten and do not assist us!" "How can you expect it," was the rejoinder, "when, if we fell in your cause you would not allow us Christian burial?" The Greeks spent the night in firing pistols and rejoicing, and were fined by the cadí next morning for disturbing his repose. But investigation has proved that all the monuments and remains are apocryphal, dating no further back than the sixteenth century. The marble sarcophagus, shown as the sepulchre, is unquestionably a deception—for the evangelists inform us distinctly that the body was laid in a chamber hewn out of the rock—which is not marble, but compact limestone.

HORATIUS.—Your "Address to the Women of England," on behalf of the neglected at home, is telling and truthful. We give a quotation:

Sisters—a supplicating band
Stretch forth for help the feeble hand,
And plead, by all the links that run
Through all the race, and bind as one,
All men who suffer 'neath the sun.

They plead—"that born like you to bear
All human woes—their slender share
Of this world's rill of bliss lies dry—
That no green halting-places lie
In deserts where they toil and die."

They plead—"the virtues that adorn
The nobly as the lowliest born
In them have place—but cannot throw
One branch above or root below,
In hearts made hard by selfish woe.

"That they are savages—as wild
And rude as Africa's rudest child.
But placed by that barbarian's side,
Even he would lift his head with pride,
And boast his gifts to them denied."

They plead—"alas! I weakly plead
Lost sons of God! One plea ye need,
That England's Christians ne'er sent back.
Ye dwell amongst us, and ye lack
A foreign tongue, and visage black.

ALICE.—Your friend views death lightly, does she? Do not believe her. In her heart she fears it terribly, but assumes a flippancy to hide her terrors. The feeling is a morbid one, and should be discouraged. Death in any form is appalling. It is a complete severance of every tie—the annihilation of the fondest and most thrilling associations. It is the black cloud that swathes up the heart and brain for ever. Views it lightly, does she? Poor girl! Does she think it no loss—no calamity—to be shut out from the glorious sunlight—to see the sweet stars and moon no more—to never again drink in pure draughts of affection from the eyes of love, or feel the hand of kindness, or hear the human voice divine? No loss, no calamity, these she imagines! She will not think so always, if she does now—which we scarcely believe. The period of indifference is always a brief one.

PATTY.—Zoroaster was a great teacher of religion and morals. He lived about five centuries before the commencement of the present era. Like Mahomet, his origin was humble. His doctrines may be briefly enumerated. "God," he said, "had existed from all eternity, and was the infinity of time and space." There were, he averred, two principles in the universe—good and evil: the one was termed Hormudy—which denotes the presiding agent of all that is good; and the other Ahriman, the lord of evil. Each of these had the power of creation, but that power was exercised with opposite designs; and it was from their coaction that an admixture of good and evil was found in every created thing. The angels of Hormudy, or the good principle, sought to preserve the elements, the seasons, and the human race—which the infernal agents of Ahriman desired to destroy; but the source of good, the great Hormudy, was alone eternal, and must, therefore, ultimately prevail. Light was the type of the good—darkness of the evil spirit. Hence, the disciple of that prophet, when he performs his devotions in a temple, turns towards the sacred fire that burns upon its altar; and, when in the open air, towards the sun, as the noblest of all lights, and that by which God sheds his Divine influence over the whole earth, and perpetuates the works of his creation. Zoroaster was not a fire-worshipper—he only adopted it as an emblem of the Divinity; and we may state, that the general maxims taught in his great work, the "Zend-A-Vesta," were moral and excellent, and well calculated to promote industry and virtue.

A SOLICITOR.—Imprisonment for debt, when the judgment has been obtained by default, is highly objectionable. The execution, whether right or wrong, offers no alternative. The debtor is at the mercy of his creditor. He is a prisoner on an ex parte statement. No evidence has been taken as to the lawfulness of his arrest. Now, in the case of a felon, or misdemeanant, the prisoner has not been many hours in custody before he is placed before a magistrate, who promptly inquires into the cause of his arrest: if there is nothing against him, he is forthwith discharged; if the alleged charge is supported by valid testimony, he is committed for trial. The debtor has no such privilege allowed him. He must either pay or go to gaol, without any previous examination to justify his detention—without any question as to the justice or legality of the proceedings. In the eye of the English law, he is below the felon in caste—for there is prompt protection afforded him to guard against mistakes, harshness, or cruelty. There is only the shelter of a prison. Surely such a law as this requires amendment, and our strictures were no stronger than the circumstance demands.

BLANDFORD.—To reduce the duties on tea is to improve a multitude of interests—not the least of them being temperance; for the more tea there is consumed, the less quantity of ales and spirits will be drunk. A reduction of the duty would also benefit trade and commerce. The money expended for tea in the United Kingdom is about £12,000,000 per annum; reduce the price one half, and the public are either gainers of £6,000,000 sterling—the amount of the property and income tax—or, what answers the same purpose, they can purchase a better article and more of it. The magnitude of the traffic in this simple shrub will be understood, when we mention, that it now gives employment to upwards of 60,000 tons of British shipping, and about £10,000,000 sterling of English capital, and produces a revenue to this country of £5,000,000 sterling. We may add, that tea is not exclusively imported from China—for there is scarcely any country in the world in which a dietetic beverage like tea is not prepared, and in general use, from some exotic or indigenous shrub. The two chief plants, however, laid under contribution, are the Chinese tea-plant, and a species of holly peculiar to South America, producing the Paraguay tea (Astoria theiformis), is used at Santa Fé as tea. The leaves of Ceanothus Americanus, an astringent herb, have been used as a substitute, under the name of New Jersey tea.

B. S.—What are called the Celtic races of mankind have been the most illustrious that ever flourished. Three thousand years ago they were the nobility of the earth. The Phenicians were Celts, so were the ancient Irish, with whom they carried on a valuable commerce. Both worshipped the Phenician Hercules, or the sun—the form of deity invoked by the Hyperboreans in their circular temples—of which Stonehenge is so remarkable an example. The Cyclops were Celts: they were the architects of the age in which they lived, and bound together by a species of freemasonry, they travelled from country to country in search of employment. This accounts for the Cyclopean labours presenting, as it were, a series of family resemblances, equally conspicuous in the caverns of Elephanta, the ruins of Persepolis, the sepulchres of Syria and Asia Minor, the remains of the most ancient cities in Greece and Italy, and the more northern monuments of the Celts—as in the temples called Druidical. Many of these architects, no doubt, came from Ireland, and there can scarcely be a question that, in ancient times, Ireland had attained to a very high degree of civilisation. We incline to the opinion, that the Gammadim, who, with the men of Arvad, are mentioned in Ezekiel xxxii, v. 11, as fortifying the towers of Tyre, were Irish.

BLUE BELL, being in her twenty-second year, thinks it time she thought of procuring a partner to travel through this world with. He must be good-looking, with an income sufficient to keep the wolf from the door. She is highly connected, thoroughly domesticated, genteel and lady-like in manners and appearance.

[DEATH OF MEERAN HAFAZ, IN THE BELFRY CHAMBER OF CARROW CHURCH.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER CXII.

For not in vain the helpless maid,
In sorrow's hour—misfortune's need—
To heaven and every saint hath pray'd,
To mar their most unholy deed.

OLD BORDER BALLAD.

THE library at Carrow Abbey had been hastily arranged for the ceremony of Ellen's marriage with Meeran Hafaz. The large oaken table—a relic from the ruined chapter-house—covered with books and papers, had been moved from its usual position in the centre of the room, and a smaller one placed in its stead.

To give it something of an altar-like appearance, Colonel Mowbray had directed it to be covered with a rich drapery of Utrecht velvet and a fine Holland cloth. Two massive silver candelsticks with tapers had been added, and the old black-letter Book of Common Prayer, with its rich binding and curiously wrought clasps—which, since the days of James I., had been used in the family chapel—was lying open at the marriage ceremony, upon a cushion between them.

The apartment had a gloomy, cheerless air. The portraits of the former possessors of Carrow—many of them from the matchless pencil of Vandyke—seemed to frown disapprovingly from the walls upon the preparations for the sacrifice of their beautiful and innocent descendant.

Even the reckless spirit of Meeran felt the chilling influence of that sombre room; an ill-boding presentiment sat like a spell upon him—he tried in vain to shake it off. The silence was oppressive—he could not detect the sound of his own footfall, as he paced, with impatient strides, the richly carpeted floor. More than once he fancied that the portrait of Sir William, which hung at the end of the library, facing the temporary altar, regarded him with an angry, mocking expression.

"This is folly!" he murmured; "bred of sick fancies and unhealthy dreams! In a few moments my triumph over my detested rival will be assured, and Ellen mine—won by a thousand sufferings and crimes! Crimes!" he slowly repeated, as he fixed his eyes upon the likeness of the murdered baronet. "Pshaw! there are no such things as crimes! I have mixed with the pale sons of Europe, till I share their superstitions! We are the creatures of destiny—atoms which fall into their allotted space—endure their appointed pains—move and act but at its sovereign will: the iron law which governs us must answer for its instruments!"

As the proud fatalist uttered his unholy creed, there was a something at his heart—a still, small voice—which gave the lie to the sophistry of his brain—told him that when the Deity bestowed on man the noble gift of reason, it rendered him responsible here and hereafter for his acts.

"By heavens, Meeran!" exclaimed Colonel Mowbray, who had entered the library during the reverie of the young Indian, "but you have a sorry air for a bridegroom! I have seen a mute at a funeral with a more joyous countenance! Marriage, after all, is not such a very serious affair: it is something like a cold bath—one plunge and it is over!"

The young man turned towards him with a faint smile—for at that moment even his presence was a relief to him.

"Ellen," added her unworthy relative, "will soon be here."

"And the priest?"

"Has arrived—so make yourself easy on that point!" answered the colonel. "By-the-bye, he seems to have met with rough treatment in the park, from some mischievous urchin who pushed him into the moat!"

"An agent of our enemies?" observed Meeran.

"I do not think so," continued his confederate; "from all I can gather from him, it was some ancient grudge between them. But it matters little either way," he continued; "Ellen once wedded, we may throw wide the gates of Carrow to all comers: you will know how to defend your rights."

"Against the world!" exclaimed the young Indian, passionately; "against heaven itself!"

The Rev. Mr. Twintext now joined the party. Colonel Mowbray had supplied him with a change of dress. He was arrayed in his surplice and scarf, the insignia of the sacred profession which his conduct and character polluted. Although the purpose to which he was about to prostitute his ministry was an unlawful one, he entered the library with the set, smirking smile deemed the correct thing for such occasions.

"The bridegroom?" he said, bowing to Meeran, who could not restrain an involuntary expression of disgust it was the first time he had seen him—the arrangements and terms having been made by the uncle of the victim. "Permit me to offer my congratulations," added the unworthy clergyman.

"When you have performed your office, reverend sir," observed the colonel, "they will be doubly welcome!"

There was no further attempt at conversation till the appearance of the unwilling bride, whom Lady Mowbray had gone to summon from her chamber.

The young Indian was too deeply abstracted in the contemplation of his approaching happiness, to observe the courtesies of life towards one whom he despised. He had agreed to pay the wretch the price of his services—and that, he considered, was sufficient.

To conceal his embarrassment, the Rev. Mr. Twintext began to examine the curious black-letter volume upon the temporary altar, turning it over, leaf after leaf, with the air of a bibliomast. Whilst he was thus occupied, the two gentlemen from time to time cast impatient glances towards the door of the apartment.

It opened at last, and Ellen, followed by Lady Mowbray, made her appearance. The persecuted girl was arrayed in deepest mourning; the only addition to her toilette being a thick black veil of Venetian lace, which hung like a sable cloud over her neck and features. The contrast was most striking: the victim resembled a marble statue of new-born day, emerging from the dusky arms of morning.

Although the countenance of the orphan was pale, it was not with terror, but resolution and strong purpose. There was neither timidity nor embarrassment in her air and manner; on the contrary, both her uncle and Meeran observed that they had never seen her more calm and self-possessed. She reminded them of one of those Christian virgins condemned for their faith to the arena, armed with a constancy which death could not appal—sophistry or persuasion shake.

"Ellen—dear Ellen!" exclaimed the young man, advancing to clasp her hand; "a life of love, devotion, and happiness shall repay you for the fulfilment of your promise!"

The poor girl shrank from his touch as from that of a basilisk.

He looked both mortified and surprised.

"Meeran," she answered, in a low, firm tone, "I have kept my promise! I never broke one yet, made copy in a recess known only to himself and his faithful servant Martin, who had instructions under what circumstances he was to produce it.

There was silence in the library. Even Meeran listened anxiously for the contents of the last will of the man he had so ruthlessly caused to be murdered.

After assigning his estates in trust, the deceased proceeded to make a provision for his adopted son Henry Ashton, to whose marriage with his niece, Ellen De Vere, he gave his formal assent and blessing; and further bequeathed the guardianship of the orphan heiress to his long-tried and valued friend, the rector of Carrow.

A moderate sum was to be paid annually to Colonel Mowbray—who was prohibited from all interference with the management of the property—and a still larger income to his son Walter.

During the reading of the will, both the colonel and his lady with the utmost difficulty suppressed their rage and mortification: the former had yielded to a marriage which the artful woman had forced upon him as the only means of suppressing the original document in her possession; and she had linked her destiny with his from the anticipation of sharing in his ill-acquired fortune. Both were baffled in their calculations—both were disappointed.

"The will," exclaimed the gentleman, "is an impudent forgery! I shall dispute it!"

"You can do so!" answered the rector, mildly; "but in the meantime I assert my rights as guardian! Miss De Vere will remain with me, unless," he added, with a smile, "she prefers the home of her affectionate uncle!"

Ellen clung yet closer to his arm, and, with the grateful affection of a child, kissed his aged cheek.

It was finally arranged that Meeran Hafaz should remain a prisoner for the night in the strong chamber of the belfry, where his accomplice had been previously confined, and in the morning be carried to Norwich Castle, to await his trial. Joe Beans and the constable, who were to sit up with him, were strictly charged by the magistrates not to lose sight of him for an instant.

"Never fear!" said the honest rustic; "I and Ralph will keep an eye upon him!"

As Ellen, leaning on the arm of her lover and the rector, left the library, the young Indian cast a look of such intense agony and despair upon her, that, despite her wrongs and sufferings, her heart was moved.

"Meeran," she said, "may heaven touch your stubborn nature till it turns in penitence, and forgive you as I forgive you!"

As her sylph-like form vanished through the doorway, the wretched man felt that the light had departed from his soul. He had been spurred, trampled on, bound like a felon before her—yet he bore sternly up, despite the agony which his proud soul endured; but when the dark conviction pressed upon him that he should see her no more—that her love would bless another—his fortitude gave way, and he cursed his destiny and his rival's happier star.

Colonel Mowbray and his lady left the room without exchanging a word with him: they were too much occupied with their own affairs to feel any deep interest in his. The young man smiled bitterly—but not with disappointment: it was long since he had learned to judge their mercenary natures rightly.

In a few moments it was announced to him that the carriage which was to convey him to his temporary prison was in readiness. As he crossed the hall, he encountered the ayah, who, with passionate grief, threw herself upon her knees before him.

"Curse me—kill me!" she exclaimed; "it is I who have destroyed you!"

With a bitter smile her foster-son passed on, surrounded by those who had the charge of him; and Zara, overwhelmed by her feelings, veiled her eyes to avoid witnessing his humiliation and disgrace.

It was arranged that Mr. Elworthy should remain in possession of the abbey, in the name of the executor, Dr. Orme, who, with our hero and Colonel Butler, shortly after returned to the rectory.

Joe Beans, the sexton, and the constable remained to guard the captive Meeran, at the belfry chamber, until morning.

The return of the triumphant party to the rectory with the rescued Ellen was welcomed by Susan, Mrs. Jarmy, and all the household, with joy. Fatigued and suffering as she was, the poor girl insisted upon visiting Martin in his chamber. Her heart overflowed with gratitude, first to heaven for its interference in her behalf, and next to the old groom, as its instrument.

The dim eyes of the aged domestic sparkled with something of their former brightness, as the niece of his beloved master pressed her still pale lips to his withered hand, and thanked and blessed him for having been the means of releasing her from the guardianship of her worthless uncle, by discovering the will.

"Well have you proved your gratitude," she added, "to the living, and your fidelity to the dead!"

"Not yet!" muttered the old man, with a meaning smile. "I have done something, but not all. What, Master Harry," he added, addressing our hero, who had accompanied Ellen on her visit, and stood beside her at the foot of his bed—"what did you once tell me was the name of that curious thorny plant which lives to a hundred years before it blooms—then dies?"

"The aloe, Martin."

"I told you," continued the faithful domestic, "that I was like that plant."

"You did."

"I have only put forth a bud yet—not a flower; but I soon shall. I feel it—I know it. I shall live to see my master's son sit in his father's seat. Old Martin then will give up his trust; and, like the withered aloe, die in peace."

"What trust?" demanded both his visitors.

"When the hour and the heir arrive I will speak. Till then the grave is not more mute than Martin," was the reply.

Nothing more could be extracted from him; he turned upon his side, and addressed himself to sleep—for, as he said, the time and the occasion would soon arrive when he would require all his strength and memory.

How sweet that night were the slumbers of Ellen. Her dreams were of quiet, deep content. Susan watched by her side, and quitted her not till morning.

"I tell thee what it be, Philip!" said the worthy Farmer Ashton to his brother, as, after bidding our hero and the rector good night, or rather good morning, they directed their steps towards the farm; "I cannot understand 'ee!"

The Khan smiled.

"Thee hast no natural love in thee!" continued the worthy man. "When I saw how nobly Harry behaved, I could have hugged him to my old heart; whilst thee—thee, who beest his father—stood as cold and unmoved as a stone! I am sure the boy suspects something. He will be down at farm to-morrow. He will question me, and I can't—I won't tell him a lie!"

"I can only repeat what I have already told you—that it is for his good—nay, more, his safety—that he should not be known for my son!"

"But he is known, Philip, for thee son!"

"By whom?" demanded the renegade.

The farmer looked embarrassed and foolish.

"By your wife, I suppose?" continued the speaker, who guessed where the farmer had proved weakest.

"What could I do? Dame wor uneasy, like. There had always been confidence between us, and so—I—"

"Told her that I was your brother?"

"Yes!"

"In that case," replied the Khan, "I must see Henry Ashton in the morning. Matthew! your indiscretion has provoked an explanation which may prove fatal to us both!"

CHAPTER CXIV.

And life is now a dreary waste,
A blighted tree which ne'er can bloom;
My heart has not one resting-place,
Or ark of refuge, save the tomb.

THE EXILE.

As in nature there is no calm more profound than the silence which succeeds the storm, so in humanity the wearying strife of passion—the tempests which rend the heart—the mad desires which take the reason prisoner—the struggles, which, from their intensity, exhaust its energies—are generally, if not invariably, followed by repose and self-possession—a repose so deep and still, that it would seem as if the soul, worn and tired with the contest, retired within itself, to gather fresh strength in solitude and contemplation.

The look of anguish and despair which Meeran Hafaz cast upon Ellen, as they removed him from the library, was the last indication which the young Indian permitted to escape him till he found himself alone in his prison.

"Thus ends my dream of life!" he murmured; "love ambition! the career of usefulness and honour—all that men prize—wrecked—for ever wrecked—on the mad sea of passion! Do I regret the past? No! Let fools, or cowards who fear to grapple with their destiny, regret: it is the most useless feeling of the heart; with me it shall be the last! I am of iron nerve and mould! I will meet the phantom death face to face—nor shrink at its ghastly terrors! Meet it! but not as my enemies expect! No!" he added, proudly; "the ruffian hand of the executioner shall never pollute my person with his touch! My hated rival shall not see me on the scaffold! Meeran Hafaz shall have an execution no less illustrious than himself!"

Full of his purpose of self-destruction, he cast his eyes around to contemplate the means: he had neither knife nor weapon upon his person—those who had taken him having carefully removed every instrument by which he could commit suicide. Nothing remained to him but his pocket-book, filled with bank-notes to an enormous amount, and the matchless gem—his mother the Begum's parting gift—an heirloom of her race—upon his finger.

He contemplated them for some moments in silence. He would have given them all—notes and gem—for a weapon—a blade to reach the secret seat of life—to enable him to master the bitter destiny which overshadowed him.

Whilst the young Indian was indulging in these melancholy fancies, Joe Beans, the sexton, Red Ralph, and the constable, were keeping watch in the chamber of the belfry below.

"Hark," said Joe Beans, after listening to the step of the prisoner above, "how impatiently he measures the old planks! How his proud spirit must feel like a caged tiger's, to be thus caged up! I'd rather be simple Joe Beans, with a clear conscience, than the rich Meeran Hafaz!"

"True," said the sexton; "especially with the prospect which he has before him—prison—trial—death!"

"Do 'ee think they'll hang him?" demanded the boy.

"Little doubt of that," observed the constable; "I heard Colonel Butler and Lawyer Elworthy say it would go hard with him."

"But he be mortal rich!" added Ralph.

"What of that?"

"What o' that, master constable!" repeated the lad; "thee beest a cute chap, but I lean't a fool—be I, Joe?"

"Certainly not," answered the young man, in whose opinion the intelligence of the uncouth speaker had risen fifty per cent. since his adventure with the Rev. Mr. Twine-text in the park.

"Well, then," continued Ralph, "I never knowed a man hanged who had a power of gold. Rich men can do anything with justice, I be thinking! They be like the traps I used to set in Remnant's fields at Mortlake: the wrens, linnets, and poor little sparrows; but the big birds, a'most allays contrived to get out. Chap up stairs," added the boy, with a cunning look, "be a big bird, I reckon!"

His hearers could not avoid smiling at the observation of the lad, which was not without a certain amount of shrewdness. The "big birds"—as he quaintly termed the rich criminals—somehow or another—with all our boasted equality and love of justice in England—frequently contrive to escape.

A loud knocking was heard at the door of the belfry. Joe Beans directed Red Ralph to ascertain who it was, but by no means to admit any one.

"It be all right!" said the boy, proud of the confidence reposed in him; "if they want to come in, they mun get through the keyhole for I!"

The next moment his heavy footsteps were heard descending the stairs which communicated with the lower part of the tower.

"It be a woman," observed the constable, listening to the voice of the speaker.

"Then there be mischief afoot," said the sexton, who was a confirmed old bachelor: an opinion in which Joe could not bring himself to coincide. Perhaps he thought of Susan.

"Well, Ralph," said the young man, as the messenger re-appeared, with a broad grin upon his countenance, "who is it?"

"Black 'oman," replied the lad; "she be sitting and crying like a good un! The rain be pelting on her. She'll be like a drowned rat afore mornin'!"

"Before morning?"

"Ees," said the urchin; "she swears she won't stir till she has seen the Indian chap up stairs."

The night was indeed a wild one—for the heavens had become suddenly charged with clouds dark as the fate of Zara's foster-son. Not a star was to be seen, and the watery deluge descended in large drops, whose heavy, monotonous splashes were only interrupted by occasional gusts of wind, which broke with a wailing sound against the buttresses of the old church tower, at whose base the ayah had seated herself in sullen, fixed despair. She heeded it not—felt it not; every thought and feeling was absorbed in the danger of her idol Meeran.

"Poor thing!" said Joe, as from the window of the belfry he gazed upon her; "she be faithful to the last!"

"And we must be faithful, too!" drily observed the sexton.

Without seeming to notice the observation, the young man descended: his heart was touched by her fidelity and sorrow.

"I'll see her!" he thought; "she is a helpless woman, in a foreign land, and a kind word may cheer her; she be a poor ignorant heathen, and should not be judged like one of us! What would you?" he said, as he unbarr'd the door of the belfry. "Return home, Zara, or to Miss Ellen, at the rectory: she has a kind, good heart, and—"

"Home!" repeated the ayah, interrupting him; "my home is here—here, with my foster-son! I could have abandoned him in prosperity and happiness—but never in misfortune! I know," she added, passionately, "that my feelings, thoughts, and language appear strange to you—my skin, too, is not of your colour; but my heart is human as your own! Let me see him! I have betrayed him—delivered him to his enemies—to shame and death, perhaps; but I must see him—I cannot die without his forgiveness!"

"Die!" said Joe, who began to feel his resolution giving way at her passionate burst of sorrow. "There be no fear of that: Miss Ellen will take care of thee!"

"I shall soon be beyond her care!" exclaimed the Indian woman. "All I ask is, let me behold my foster-son!"

"Impossible!" said Joe, trying to look resolute; "it is forbidden!"

"There is nothing impossible to a love like mine!" observed the suppliant.

"But I am trusted!"

"And was I not trusted?" exclaimed the ayah, passionately; "but I yielded to the voice of my heart—the promptings of its pity! To save Ellen, I betrayed the noble boy I nurtured at my breast; who loved me—meant and worthless as I am—who loved me like a son! Man!" she added, casting herself at his feet, "as you were born of woman, have pity on a woman's sufferings! You cannot tell the undying devotion of the Indian nurse for those she has reared! I saved Ellen—saved her for him you call your friend! All I ask in return is to see, to speak for a few moments with him whose trust I have betrayed—whose heart I have broken!"

"See him!" repeated Joe, in a tone which showed that he was deliberating with himself. "Alone, I suppose?"

"Alone, or in presence of others, imports but little, replied Zara, "so that I see him!"

"And thee shalt see him!" said the young man, firmly "in spite of what constable and sexton may say!"

The eyes of the suppliant flashed for an instant with intense brilliancy; the next they were calm and subdued. Her countenance reminded Joe of a thunder-cloud suddenly illumined by the summer lightning's flash, and then dark again.

"Follow me," he said; "I will bring you to the presence of Meeran Hafaz!"

Despite the remonstrance of his two companions, he kept his word. As a matter of precaution, however, they insisted not only on accompanying her and being present at the interview, but that she should be searched. Zara submitted to the humiliating conditions with an air of scorn and indifference. Not a weapon, drug, or instrument of any kind could be found upon her. To all appearance she was unarmed. Even Ralph, who stood watching every movement, detected nothing to excite his suspicion.

"I hope you are satisfied?" said Joe Beans, addressing the constable and sexton.

"I don't know that I am!" replied the latter, shaking his grey head, with a foreboding air; "there be always a woman concerned when mischief is afloat!"

With this ungallant observation, all further opposition ceased, and the party mounted the stairs which led to the chamber above. No sooner had the constable unlocked the door, than Zara precipitated herself into the apartment, and, sinking on her knees, with her hands crossed upon her bosom, remained motionless as a statue at the feet of her foster-son.

The object of the men in accompanying her was to prevent the conveying of any instrument of self-destruction, or attempt to escape: they had no wish to overhear any conversation which might pass between them. They contented themselves, therefore, by withdrawing to one side of the room, and watching them in silence.

"Zara," said the prisoner, "whence this grief? I should have thought to see your face all smiles! Success does not generally deck itself in tears!"

"Success!" repeated the ayah.

"Ay!" continued the young Indian, calmly; "when the serpent glides towards the couch of the sleeper—who like a fool has cherished it—and stings the confiding fool to death, some may call it treachery—but the world is wiser, Zara—the world names it success! Come, you," he added, bitterly, "to witness my degradation?—to report to Ellen and the rival to whom you sold me, the despair and impotent regrets of Meeran Hafaz?"

The nurse rose slowly from her knees. There was an air of dignity in her manner which no acting could assume.

"Shall I tell you," she said, "what brought me here? Meeran, I came to die with you!"

"Die with me!" exclaimed her foster-son; "with me! Zara, repeat those words; for they imply the death of both!—the throwing off this coil of flesh—disappointing the scaffold of its prey—my enemies of their triumph!"

"And didst thou think," said the Indian woman, in a reproachful tone, "that I could desert thee! They searched me, Meeran, when, by my prayers, tears, and abject supplication, I prevailed upon these accursed gaolers to admit me to your sight; but they found neither steel nor drug upon my person; and yet I am armed—armed with a means of death as certain as the serpent's fang! The fools saw it, but knew it not!"

As she spoke, the ayah raised her hand so that the light from the lamp suspended from the centre of the vaulted roof fell directly upon it. The eyes of the captive sparkled, as he detected upon the thumb-nail of his nurse a dark and almost purple stain.

It was the ourari poison—the most subtle known: so deadly are its effects, that the Indians who prepare it scarcely ever employ any other weapon than a reed dipped in the deadly juice. It is a well-known fact, that they frequently destroy their enemies by inflicting a slight scratch with the thumb-nail, which they have previously stained with it. The wound causes almost instant death.

"The ourari?" he said.

"E'en so!"

"Zara," exclaimed the young man, "I forgive thee all, for this one triumph over my rival, the scoffing world, and Ellen's hate! The noblest blood of India," he added, proudly, "must not be shed like a common felon's!"

"Never!" muttered the ayah; "never!"

"In this land I have none to regret me," he added, "save one!"

"You forget, Meeran," said Zara, reproachfully, "that she dies with you!"

This conversation having taken place in Hindostanee, as a matter of course, was perfectly unintelligible to Joe Beans and his companions, who were far from suspecting its purport. When the nurse raised her arm to expose the poison, Red Ralph asked of Joe, in a whisper, if black woman was a-goin' to conjure.

"Silence!" said the young man; "bad as they have been, let us not insult them!"

"I don't want to sult 'em," replied the boy, sullenly.

"I only want to see un hanged!"

"Farewell world!" said the young Indian, with a sigh; "my spirit longs for freedom! I have struggled with destiny, but the iron ruler of the world has proved too strong for me! I have lost the battle, but I will not lament it! Now, Zara," he added, "thine must be the office of the sacrificing priest of old! The altar is ready and the victim willing!"

"I cannot, Meeran," said his nurse, with a passionate burst of grief—"I cannot bring sorrow to your widowed mother's heart, which pines for your return, and day by day will count the hours with anxious hope! I cannot destroy the child I reared, loved, honoured, and betrayed!"

"Would you rather see me upon the scaffold?" calmly demanded her foster-son.

Zara shuddered.

"In the hands of the hangman?"

"Have pity!" she sobbed.

"The cord—the vile, degrading cord," he added, "round my neck—the gaze of the yelling mob—my rival looking on the while?"

"Never!" exclaimed the Indian woman, starting like a roused lioness from the crouching posture into which she had fallen. "Tis past—the weakness has passed, and my resolution is of steel—steel!"

"We must be brief," said Meeran; "those who watch me begin to cast suspicious glances on our interview! Zara," he added, "in thy arms my infant years first slumbered—in thy arms I will sink to my last sleep—what shouldst thou fear!"

"For myself, nothing!"

"It will soon be daylight!" said Joe Beans, who began to feel a vague uneasiness at the length of the interview, although he did not understand a word of what was uttered. "It is time to depart!"

Zara regarded him with a look so vindictive, that the honest fellow gave an involuntary shudder. She looked around as if she anticipated that some means would be found to avoid the dreadful extremity for which she came prepared.

"Is this your courage?" said Meeran, calmly.

"Farewell!" she cried; at the same moment opening her arms to receive him; "but not for ever! My spirit will take its flight with thine!"

One instant—and only one—the devoted woman strained him to her breast; then inflicted with her nail a slight scratch upon his neck, directly beneath the ear.

"They are a long time a-huggin'!" observed Red Ralph.

"You must leave!" said the constable.

"I am ready," replied the ayah; "but your prisoner has escaped you!"

"Escaped?"

"Ay! he is dead!"

She opened her arms, and the body of Meeran Hafaz slid gently to her feet.

"What be this?" demanded the horror-stricken Joe.

"I told 'ee she wor a-goin' to conjure!" whispered Red Ralph, pulling him by the skirt of the coat.

"It means," exclaimed Zara, in a tone of mingled despair and triumph, "that your victim has escaped you—that the proud spirit and warm heart are both at rest! Advance not," she added, passionately; "no hand but mine must touch his sad remains!"

"A surgeon—run for a surgeon!" said the constable.

"For Colonel Butler!" added the sexton.

"Fools!" replied the ayah; "as well try to unite the severed flower unto its parent stem! He has escaped your laws—escaped your justice! The malice of his enemies will not be gratified by witnessing the degradation and the shame of the descendant of a line of princes! He is sold—cold as my heart!"

Overwhelmed with sorrow, the Indian woman seated herself upon the floor of the prison; and, with a mother's tenderness, began to arrange the limbs of her foster-son. There was a proud smile upon the half-opened lips of Meeran, as if his last thought—his last feeling—had been of triumph, rather than defeat.

"Let us leave her!" said Joe Beans, mournfully; "she cannot escape. Bad as he was, he has one to sorrow for him!"

His companions had been too much puzzled by the manner of their prisoner's death, to venture to lay hands upon the ayah, whom they regarded with a mysterious dread. To their superstitious imagination, she seemed invested with supernatural powers. They carefully closed the door upon her, and descended to the chamber below, leaving Zara alone with the dead.

"I told 'ee," said Red Ralph, as soon as they were seated, "that black 'ooman wor a-goin' to conjure! There 'll be only t' old un," he added, in a tone of disappointment, "to hang, arter all!"

THE PRICE OF DIAMONDS.

Rough diamonds, fit for cutting, are sold at £1 13s. 4d. to £2 the carat. A carat is rather more than three grains, and 156 carats equal to one ounce troy. But if the stones are above one carat, the square of the weight is multiplied by the price of a single carat; so that, for example, a rough stone of three carats costs 3x3x £2, or £18. It is similar with cut diamonds, and at present (1850) the purest brilliants of one carat fetch more than £8, a brilliant of two carats 2x2x £8, or £32. When stones are over eight or ten carats, however, this is altered—so that they are often valued still more highly. Diamonds of a quarter of an ounce weight are extraordinarily costly, but still larger are met with; and one of the largest known is that of the Rajah of Mattun, in Borneo, which weighs nearly two ounces and a half; that of the Sultan of Turkey weighs two ounces; one in the Russian sceptre more than an ounce and a quarter. The greatest diameter of the last is one inch, the thickness ten lines. The Empress Catherine II. purchased it in the year 1772, from Amsterdam, and for it was paid £75,000 and an annuity of £650.

Diamonds weighing an ounce exist also in the French and Austrian regalia. One of the most perfect is the French, known as the Pitt or Regent diamond. It was bought for Louis XV., from an Englishman named Pitt, for the sum of £130,000 sterling, but has been valued at half a million. One of the stones most renowned in the East is the Koh-i-noor, or Mountain of Light, now in possession of the Queen of England. It came from Golconda to Persia, and while uncut weighed more than five ounces; but now, polished, only about two ounces. It is valued at more than £2,000,000 sterling. If we look only to the common mode of estimating the value, a perfect brilliant weighing half a pound would be worth £20,000,000. Some have stated that such a diamond exists among the royal treasures of Portugal, as large as a hen's egg; according to others, this is only a topaz.

THE war-banner floats—there are spears on the coasts—
And the valley resounds with the landing of hosts!
The ships in the offing like Bacchanals reel,
And the bayonets flash forth like a river of steel!
The villagers flee from the coming of War,
And their flocks speed alarmed to the mountains afar
Mead, vintage, and garden, that toil had made sweet,
Lie trodden and tossed 'neath the tempest of feet.
And the church where each Sabbath their homage was given,

Seems lifting its spire as appealing to heaven!
But vain supplication! the war-blast is there,
And the red breath of slaughter is loading the air!
The carnage rolls onward, nor ebbs in its flow,
'Mid the storm-blaze of havoc, and ravage, and woe.
See! the ranks have been routed, the centre hath broke,
And like lightning the sword through the sulphurous smoke

Flashes doom on the flying! Resistance is gone;
Whilst the madness of passion yields mercy to none!
The steed, whose proud neck in war's tempest was tost,
Now leaps from the strife, but its rider is lost!
The columns are shattered—the banners o'erthrown,
And the lips are now stiff that the trumpet have blown.
All struggling and wounded, the steed pants for breath,
Or lifts its wild head in the grandeur of death!
The limbs that shook earth 'neath the fire of their speed,
Now quiver, and quail, and grow weak as a reed.
The eyes that, like star-beams, glanced light o'er the plain,

Glare, bloodshot and filmed, in convulsion and pain;
Slow straining each nerve, one last effort to make,
While his nostrils distended with agony shake!
He springs—and, with forelock extended in air,
Is dead—with the effort that mocked his despair!

Alas! for the leaves and the flowers of the spring,
The lark has just left them with blood on her wing.
The hive of the bee, so untainted before,
Lies plashed by the feet that have waded through gore
And the cot, with its roses—where beauty and love
Seemed linked to the angels and Eden above;
Now ruined—in embers—its sweetness forgot,
Sinks shattered in heaps 'neath the flame-hissing shot
And the CHURCH—with a sin that humanity loathes,
Is turned to a stable, and ringing with oaths!
For ruin, and rapine, and murder, and wrath,
Still follow, like demons, War's desolate path.

COME, let us mount the cliff, the crested height,
Where Dover rears her fortress to the sight!
Like beings of the deep the vessels glide,
Proud of their own reflection in the tide;
Proud of their mission, which is war no more;
But Commerce, Christian love, from shore to shore!
The cannon—sentenced ne'er again to float,
Stilled the red thunder in its murderous throat—
Lies, by the majesty of Truth o'erthrown,
Rusted, dismounted, weed and moss o'ergrown.
The cautious lamb hath dared to make its way
Unto the very mouth which spoke—to slay!
While e'en the butterfly within it dips,
And grass and flowers spring from its iron lips

Oh, might of Peace, that in the throat of death
Can scatter bloom with thine immortal breath,
And bid the timid lamb no longer heed
The cannon's mouth, but there in safety feed!
Crop the wild flowers that live within its breast,
And taste the sweets of nature and of rest!
When will men learn, who still to battle haste,
That Peace is property, and War is waste?
That Education makes a nation great,
And Knowledge is the safeguard of the State?

False is the triumph of the Battle-hour;
The noblest triumph is in Moral power.
Time laughs at battles, and the fruits they earn;
The conquering sword lies conquered in its turn.
But there's a power which even time can bind;
E'en Time itself is vanquished by the Mind!
It grasps beyond the victor's blood-won name,
And marshals cent'ries on the path of fame.

Then welcome Peace! May Nations build thy shrine,
Profess thy creed, and own thy breath divine.
May Science, Literature, and Genius spring,
Like rays of glory, from thine angel wing!
Strike down deception—let no wrong endure;
Take to thy heart the interests of the poor;
And prove, O! Peace, that War usurps thy right—
Not his, but thine—the victory and the might!
Strength with simplicity, with grandeur, rest!
And majesty, with meekness, guard thy breast,
Till War, and misery, and crime be gone,
And all the people of the earth ARE ONE!

It would truly be a fine thing if men suffered themselves to be guided by reason, that they should acquiesce in the true remonstrances addressed to them by the writings of the learned and the advice of friends. But the greater part are so disposed that the words which enter by one ear do incontinently go out of the other, and begin again by following the custom. The best teacher one can have is necessity.

CHURCH OF IVAN THE CRUEL, MOSCOW.

THE PRINCE AND THE PRELATE.

A TRADITION OF MOSCOW.

RUSSIA is richly endowed with churches and monasteries. At one period they actually were so numerous, that in Moscow, previous to the invasion of Napoleon, there was one church for nearly every hundred of the inhabitants, including women and children. This overabundance the Emperor Alexander deemed a nuisance; and had those that stood in need of repairs pulled down, to the great scandal of the priesthood, who did not hesitate to ascribe the calamities of 1812 to this act of impiety. As if wisely razing some forty crazy structures, that threatened every day to tumble down of their own accord, could possibly invoke the vengeance of heaven! But priests of all ages, and all creeds, retain the ground they have obtained with scrupulous tenacity. Knowing that to retrograde, even slightly, is dangerous, they retain a vice-like hold of everything that superstition, fraud, speculation, and violent aggrandisement have placed in their possession. It is only such monster-kings as our own Henry VIII. that can put the bridle on insolent and corrupt priesthoods. And here we may observe, as a strange fact in history, that all the sacerdotal oligarchies that ever flourished have invariably been punished by men whom the world has stigmatised as tyrants: as if it had been reserved for men of this class to brave the lightning and pierce the dun clouds that religious monopolies ever gather in and around the material structures by which they awe the multitude into obedience.

But, as if in despite of the prudence of Alexander—who in religious matters was inclined to be exceedingly tolerant—and the great fire, the church in Moscow is a mighty establishment—very rich, both in property and saints—very haughty, very ignorant, and plunged in superstitions that are more heathen in their character and observances than some of the practices of the Buddhists—a sect more numerous than all the Christians in both hemispheres, and, as our intelligent readers are aware, who have forms and ceremonies which look almost like exact copies of those in use in the Greek and Roman churches.

The church, however, in Moscow, is the last relic of its ancient grandeur. The archbishop clings to the doomed city with paternal fondness. No doubt he looks forward to the time when the seat of the empire will be removed to Constantinople, and he, as Greek patriarch, be afforded the glorious opportunity of astonishing the Latin Church by celebrating the mysteries of his faith within the venerable walls of the Cathedral of Sophia. This is the belief of the emperor, and of every member of the Greek Church both in and out of Russia; and we must express the opinion that it is inevitable. Turkey must fall. Her horrible massacres of Christians must be avenged. And who can avenge them but Russia, who first received her Christianity from the capital of the East, and in the course of ages has grown into the Colossus—the Hercules of the North—whose mission seems to be to wrestle with and overpower the Arabian lion who has ravaged the East for twelve dreary centuries?

But, whatever may be the destiny of the Greek Church—an eastern Luther and an eastern Henry VIII. will both come at their appointed time—in Moscow its architectural institutions rank among the most striking of the embellishments of the city.

The finest and most sacred edifice in the empire is the Cathedral of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary. It was built, in the reign of either Ivan III. or Ivan IV., on the site of the original edifice, and exhibits a splendid specimen of the Greco-Italian architecture of the fifteenth century. It is loaded with ornaments to an extravagant degree. Like the Greek worship, it is profuse in exterior adornments. On the walls are painted 249 full images, and 2066 half-lengths and heads, many larger than nature. The quantity of gold leaf employed in embellishing it is said to have amounted to 210,000 leaves. Images gaudily adorned, splendidly gilt and ornamented holy books, massy gold crosses of beautiful workmanship, rich episcopal vestments—in short, every article that can impress the observer with a striking idea of the material magnificence of the Greek service, are here to be seen in the greatest profusion. In the middle of the church is suspended a crown of massive silver, accompanied with forty-eight chandeliers, all of a single piece, and weighing nearly 3000 lbs. There are also numerous candlesticks, "almost as high as a man," some of silver, others of copper silvered, holding candles "thick as a man's leg."

The Cathedral of St. Michael ranks next to this in splendour and dignity. It is venerated by the Russians as the place where their sovereigns were formerly interred; while the Cathedral of the Assumption is honoured by being the place where they are crowned.

The next church of importance is that of St. Philip, which is distinguished as containing the patriarchal treasury, the riches of which consist of manuscripts and books, mitres and sacerdotal dresses and ornaments, vessels for the preparation of the holy oil, and the reception of relics of saints. The most valuable manuscripts are those of the Slavonic New Testament, which date as far back as the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Dr. Lyall was shown "a small parchment volume, a good deal sullied, said to be the Gospel of St. Luke in his own handwriting." In what language and character he does not state: perhaps the Slavonic also! There is a copy of the Evangelists, in Slavonian, written by Tatiana Michailovna, daughter of the Czar Michail Pheodorovitch. The sacred vessels are very numerous. Those for the preparation of the holy oil consist of two large silver kettles or boilers, gilt inside, two feet and a half in diameter, which, together with silver stirrers and ladles, were presented to the holy synod by the Empress Catherine II. Between these boilers stands a large silver receiver, on the cover of which is a representation of "Samuel anointing Saul." They weigh altogether upwards of 700 lbs. From the receiver the oil is emptied into sixteen elegant silver vases, presented to the synod by the Emperor Paul. The "holy oil" is only made once a year, with great ceremonies. All these churches are within the Kremlin.

Our illustration is the Cathedral of the Assumption, popularly called the Church of Ivan the Cruel. This must have been an invention of the priests—for both the great Ivans were very distinguished men.

Ivan III. ascended the throne in 1462. He was surnamed the Proud. This great Duke*—being a Norman by descent, he clung to the title held in most veneration by his Scandinavian ancestors—was the first prince whose talents and good fortune imparted union, consistency, and independence to the Russian states. He united under his government the different principalities or appanages, and subdued Novogorod, which, during the internal troubles and the Tartar invasion and conquest of Russia, had achieved and preserved its independence. He also freed himself and country entirely from the yoke of the Tartars, and imposed a tribute on the kingdom of Cazan. He invited and encouraged foreigners of talent and information to settle in his territories. By one of them—Aristotle of Bologna—the money was re-coined, and gunpowder and the art of casting cannon were introduced.

He was assassinated A.D. 1505, after a reign of forty-three years. Few of the Russian monarchs ever died in their beds.

The next sovereign by whom the territories of Russia were enlarged, was Ivan IV., surnamed the Terrible. He began his reign in 1533. He first taught his soldiers the use of fire-arms, and by means of these conquered the kingdoms of Cazan and Astrakan. Siberia was also annexed to Russia during his reign. He was not, however, merely a warlike prince: to him the Russians are indebted for the first code of laws, and the introduction of printing. He invited foreign artists to Moscow, encouraged commerce, and permitted the English to establish factories in his dominions. Before his time—as the Russians had no ports except Archangel, which, from its situation, was of no use for foreign commerce—their trade had altogether been in the hands of the Livonians; but by the conquest of Astrakan, the commerce of the Caspian Sea was opened to them; and by the temporary conquest of Narva, in 1558, they were first introduced to our experience of the advantages they might derive from the possession of ports in the Baltic. Ivan also encouraged religious toleration. He was an innovator as well as sovereign ruler. Now, as it is well ascertained that the church which has been assigned to an "Ivan" of "cruel" memory, was erected under the auspices of either Ivan the Proud or Ivan the Terrible, we may gather some clue to the origin of the more ignoble surname, from the following legend of

THE PRINCE AND THE PRELATE.

About the twentieth year of the reign of Ivan IV., it was high Easter in Moscow, and the prince, to the great joy of the prelate, was absent on a distant expedition. The day before, all the markets and shops had been filled with flesh-meat, butter, eggs, poultry, pigs, and every kind of food. Every foot-passenger had his hands, and even his arms, filled with provisions. Indeed, every gastronomic preparation seemed to have been made for holding the solemn feast of the Resurrection, and making ample amends for the severity of the Lenten fast. At midnight, the great bell of the cathedral tolled—its vibrations seemed to be the rolling of distant thunder; and they were instantly accompanied by the noise of all the bells in Moscow. Every inhabitant was stirring, and the uproar in the streets was greater than at noon-day. The whole city was in a blaze: lights were seen in all the win-his innocent daughter! By St. Andrew, my lord, we will have no such tricks of youth in our dominions! And mark me, Alexis—thou knowest the crime and thou knowest the penalty—the young man shuddered—the latter was death,—“therefore, if thou dost not marry the girl, the law shall do its justice on thee within the hour!”

* The title Czar was borne by only two sovereigns of Russia. The word is a Slavonic translation of the Tartar Khan, or King. In their translation of the Old Testament, it constantly occurs in this sense; the Czar Solomon, or the Czar David, being the ordinary terms in use.

The nobles burst into angry execrations, but the levelled arquebuses of the guards soon restored order. In that age fire-arms were regarded with tremendous awe.

Alexis, whom a detachment of guards had completely separated from his friends, being somewhat of a craven, yielded; and my lord archbishop performed the nuptial ceremony at the foot of the throne. From that union sprang emperors of Russia. The daughter of a Moscow tailor lived to see her eldest son heir-apparent to a crown! So much for the justice of Ivan—surnamed the Cruel.

After the ceremony had been performed, and the young couple sent away under a strong escort, the duke retired. In a few minutes afterwards a person in the dress of an Armenian sat upon the throne. Cold drops of sweat trickled down the archbishop's brow. Many of the nobles present uttered exclamations of alarm.

“My lord archbishop,” said the duke, as he threw off his high Persian cap and false beard [the Grand Dukes of Moscow, being of Norman descent, shaved].

“Entreats a private audience of your grace!” faltered the prelate.

“It is granted!” was the reply. “But, as your welfare concerns all our subjects, we think it right to tell you that, in your absence, we have driven the Evil One from your holy convent. Certain dancing-girls we have married to some of our most deserving petty officers. And touching our late conversation with you—”

“I submit to your highness's consideration and clemency,” said the prelate, hurriedly, and completely humiliated.

And with that the council broke up. The duke obtained half the treasures of his metropolitan before he parted with his sacred person. The next day there was a revolution in Moscow; but the duke had taken such wise precautions that the rebels were defeated, with immense slaughter. In the mêlée several churches were set on fire. These the duke carefully restored; and tradition says, that it was from these and other incidents that the ecclesiastics maliciously caused his memory to be branded as “cruel.”

His reign was long and prosperous, and his country flourished. But the revenge of the nobles and priests only slumbered. In the reign of his successor, Theodore, it burst forth furiously; and with the death of that monarch ended the dynasty of Rurik the Norman, after it had endured above seven centuries. A murderous civil war then ensued, and was only quelled by Michael, of the house of Romanoff, being elected the first Czar of Russia, in a general assembly of the nobles, burghers, merchants, and persons of property and distinction: so that the throne of Russia, like that of England, was in its origin elective.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDERS.

THE Philippine Islands, a group which forms one boundary of the Chinese Sea, have seldom been visited by travellers. Recently, however, a Frenchman, M. de la Gironière, has published his adventures in those islands, during a residence of many years, and which contain a vast amount of entirely new information respecting the islands and their inhabitants. We extract a passage of great interest:

“One morning,” writes M. de la Gironière, “as we were silently pursuing our way, we heard before us a chorus of shrill voices, more resembling those of birds than of men. Presently we perceived at a short distance about forty savages, of both sexes, and all ages, and having completely the appearance of animals. They were gathered round a large fire, hard by a stream. We took a few steps forward, presenting our guns at them. On perceiving us they blatted, and were about to fly; but I showed them a packet of cigars, and made signs that we wished to present these to them. When they understood this, they drew up in a line, like soldiers on parade: it was the signal that we might approach. We did so, cigars in hand; and, commencing at one extremity of the line, I distributed my gift. It was very important to make friends of them, and, according to their usages, to give to each an equal part. The distribution over, our alliance was complete; the savages had nothing more to fear from us, nor we from them. They all began smoking. A deer was hanging from a tree: the chief took a bamboo knife, and cut off three large pieces of venison, threw them into the glowing embers, and, a minute afterwards, withdrew them, and presented a piece to each of us. The outside of this savage carabao was rather burnt and ashy, the inside quite raw and bloody. It would not do to show repugnance; my entertainers would have been scandalised, and I wished to live with them for a few days in harmony—so I ate my bit of deer, which, upon the whole, was not so very bad; my Indians followed my example, and thenceforward treachery was out of the question.”

M. de la Gironière found it very difficult to make himself understood, but the next day he fell in with a woman who spoke the Tagal tongue. She acted as his interpreter; and from her he obtained such information as he desired concerning the Ajetas. These people appeared to him to be far more like monkeys than human beings; even their voices resembling the cries and jabbering of the animal, whilst their gestures were monkey all over. Their superiority consists in knowing how to make a fire, and to use bows and lances. Their colour is the ebony black of the African negro; their utmost stature hardly attains five feet English; their hair is woolly; and, as they know not how to get rid of it, it forms a strange sort of crown or halo round their heads. Their features resemble those of the African blacks, but the lips are less prominent. Their sole dress is a girdle, eight or ten inches broad, made of the bark of trees. They feed on roots, fruit, and the produce of the chase. A bamboo lance, a palm-wood bow, and poisoned arrows, are their weapons. They eat their meat nearly raw, and live in groups or tribes, composed of fifty or sixty persons. During the day, the old people, the invalids, and children sit around the fire, whilst the others go hunting: when they have enough food to last for some days, they all remain round the fire, and at night they sleep promiscuously in the ashes. It is extremely curious to see thus assembled some fifty of these brutes, of all ages, and all more or less deformed. The old women are especially hideous—their decrepit limbs, their pot-bellies, and their extraordinary hair, giving them the appearance of furies or witches. Nothing human can possibly be more degraded than these Ajetas. They have no religion; they neither worship sun nor stars, nor bow before permanent idols—but adore, for the day, any rock or tree-trunk in which they trace a resemblance to an animal. Their language has very few words; their children take for sole name that of the place where they are born. They have great respect for old age, and for the dead. For years after the decease of one of them, they place tobacco and betel-nut upon his grave, above which his bow and arrows are suspended. Every night—so they believe—he quits his grave to go a-hunting. They have no funeral ceremony. They lay the corpse at full length in the grave, and cover it with earth. But when an Ajeta is ill of a malady deemed incurable, or has been slightly wounded with a poisoned arrow, his friends place him in a large hole, his arms crossed upon his breast, and bury him alive.

All the weapons of the Ajetas are poisoned; but a wound from one of their arrows would not suffice to check the career of so strong an animal as the stag. But the least scratch of the poisoned dart produces an unquenchable thirst, and as soon as the animal drinks, he dies. The hunters then cut away the flesh from around the wound—for otherwise the whole carcass would quickly acquire so intensely bitter a flavour, that even the Ajetas (not very dainty feeders) could not eat it. When in Sumatra, M. de la Gironière had investigated the nature of the poison used by the Malays for their arms, and had found it to be simply a strong solution of arsenic in lemon-juice. He was curious to know what the Ajetas used. They took him to a large tree, tore off a bit of the bark, and told him that was what served them for poison. He chewed some in their presence: it was insupportably bitter, but otherwise harmless, in its natural state. To render it fatal the Ajetas prepare it in a particular way, but they would not communicate their secret. It forms a paste, of which they spread a thin coat upon their arms. M. de la Gironière had painful experience of its powerful and pernicious effect. On quitting the Ajetas, who had treated him hospitably, and to the best of their ability, he took it into his head to carry away with him one of their skeletons, which he thought would be an acceptable present to the Jardin des Plantes, or Anatomical Museum at Paris. It was rather a dangerous undertaking, owing to the savages' veneration for their dead; and he had little quarter to expect if caught body-snatching. Undeterred by this risk, he had got but to a quarter of a league from the camp, when he commenced opening some old graves. The first skeletons he got to were mouldered, but towards evening he met with that of a woman, who, from her attitude, had evidently been buried alive. Her bones were still covered with the skin; she was a sort of mummy, and exactly what Dr. Pablo wanted. So he took her out of the grave, and put her in a sack, but had scarcely done so when shrill cries were heard. The Ajetas were on the trail of the three resurrectionists, who ran for their lives, but without relinquishing their booty. The savages climbed trees (which they do just like monkeys—using their hands, and setting the soles of their feet against the trunk), and peppered them with arrows. Darkness facilitated the escape of the fugitives; but, on getting out of the wood, M. de la Gironière noticed a scratch on one of his fingers. He attributed it to a branch or briar, and thought no more about it.

Seated upon the sea-beach with the skeleton, the three wanderers took counsel together. Alila was downcast, and anticipated evil. His chief did not much admire the aspect of affairs, but nevertheless kept a stout heart and a bold visage, and cheered his followers. A fire was lighted, and the two Indians went to seek shell-fish. On their return, they announced the discovery of a pirogue, which the waves had cast upon the strand. It was half buried in the sand, and needed caulking and repairs; but with the help of gum and bamboo-fibre, they managed to make it water-tight, and put to sea. A bamboo formed the mast, the skeleton's sack was converted into a sail. The waves ran high, but the voyagers were accustomed to handle those fragile boats, and feared nothing. Unluckily, the Indians, more used to the lake than the ocean, fell sea-sick, and M. de la Gironière had to sail and steer the skiff totally unassisted. “When I reflect,” he says, “upon the position in which I found myself, afloat on the Pacific Ocean in a frail pirogue, having for auxiliaries two helpless persons (the Indians lay prostrate in the bottom of the boat), two skulls, and the skeleton of an Ajeta, I can imagine my readers suspecting that I am fabricating a story.”

After four-and-twenty hours' anxious navigation, the pirogue put into land, near a Tagalog village, and another day and night took the adventurers to Jalajala. Thence M. de la Gironière went to Manila. On the first night of his arrival there, he experienced such acute pain in the finger which had received a scratch during his flight from the Ajetas, that he twice fainted away. The pain became so violent that he no longer doubted the trifling hurt to have proceeded from a poisoned arrow. An operation, performed by a brother surgeon, rather increased than diminished the pain and irritation. The inflammation spread to the arm, then to the chest. After some weeks' illness, agony, and sleeplessness, the doctor made way for the priest, who administered the last sacrament. Nevertheless, M. de la Gironière recovered; but his convalescence was long, and for more than a year afterwards he suffered from acute pains in the chest. But, with characteristic tenacity, he had stuck to his skeleton, both by sea and by land, and it is now in the Museum of Anatomy.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, &c.

COSTLY FOOD.—Diamonds are sometimes found in the crops of chickens, in the diamond districts of Brazil.

STATISTICAL.—It is estimated that the aggregate incomes of Great Britain amount to the sum of £340,000,000 per annum.

RATS.—A plant which grows in abundance in every field, the dog's tongue (the Cynolobos officinale of Linnaeus), if gathered at the period when the sap is in its full vigour, bruised with a hammer, and laid in a house, barn, granary, or any other place frequented by rats and mice, causes these destructive animals immediately to shift their quarters.

LUNATICS.—The House of Lords has ordered a return, which has just been printed, of the number of lunatics under an inquisition, who are resident in asylums, and the amounts of their respective incomes and allowances for maintenance. There are 238 persons confined in asylums, including licensed houses. In many of the cases the whole income is applied for maintenance. The largest income in one case is £5000 a-year, of which £700 is for the support of the lunatic, and £2500 for keeping up Hazlewood Castle.

SEALING-WAX.—The most careful persons will occasionally drop melting sealing-wax on their fingers. The first impulse of every one is to pull it off, which is followed by a blister. The proper course is to let the wax cool on the finger; the pain is much less, and there is no blister.

IMPROVEMENTS IN PREPARING OILS FOR LUBRICATING AND BURNING.—The object of this process is to impart additional fluidity to lard or tallow oil, and viscid oils generally, by combining them with oleic ether, and thus giving the oils more of the character possessed by sperm oil, and rendered better adapted for burning and lubricating. For this purpose one part of oleic ether is mixed with two parts of neutral tallow oil. To obtain oleic ether, the patentee proposes to adopt the well-known continuous process of making sulphuric ether, substituting, of course, oleic acid for sulphuric. The oleic ether is washed with an alkaline solution previous to use. Wood spirit may be employed in the manufacture of oleic ether, instead of spirit of wine.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF TIN.—In this process, the ores of tin, which have previously been passed through the stamping mill and washed, are mixed with common salt, and the mixture exposed to the temperature of 163 degs. of Daniell's pyrometer, in a reverberatory furnace. The result of this heating is, that the chlorine of the salt combines with the other metals present, so as to render them soluble in water. The purified tin ore, thus obtained, is then washed and smelted in the usual way. A previous analysis of the rough tin ore is necessary, in order to fix the proportion of common salt to be employed; care is also required to be used in the regulation of the temperature of the furnace, so as not to decompose the oxide of tin.

COLOURING COLLOIDION PICTURES.—A patent has just been taken out (dated September 23, 1852) for this purpose, by Mons. J. L. Tardien, of Paris. He terms his process radiochromy. It consists in applying oil or other colours at the back of the pictures, so as to give the requisite tints to the several parts of the photograph, without at all interfering with its extreme delicacy. It may even, in some cases, be used to remedy defects in the photographic pictures. The claim is essentially for the application of colours at the back, instead of on the surface of photographs, whatever kind of colours may be used. It is therefore, of course, applicable only to photographs taken on paper, glass, or some transparent material.

THE RHUBARB PLANT.—Rhubarb, like steaks, has worked its way, and upon its own merits. It is not only used and esteemed for tarts, puddings, and pies, but is the very king of preserves: with about a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit-stalk, and well boiled—the boiling is absolutely necessary, on account of the watery nature of the stalks—with the addition of a little ginger and lemon, or any of the three marmalades, it makes one of the finest of all preserves, next excepting the greengage plum. The first of this preserve I ever saw was made by Mrs. Knudall, a market-gardener's wife, the preserve being made from the sort bearing her name; and in my opinion the rhubarb is as far before all the others as a Ribston pippin is before a Hawthornden apple. Rhubarb also makes a capital wine, with about three pounds of sugar to a gallon of liquor. The fruit-stalks are first well bruised, then a little water added along with the sugar; it is then strained off, and put into the casks. It ferments briskly for a fortnight or so. Rhubarb for wine purposes must not be gathered before August: the root by that time has come growing; the stem then gets all the benefit of the condensed and elaborated sap, being much more strong in acidity, and containing much less water. This wine is much more wholesome than gooseberry wine; it effervesces like the best champagne. The colour of the wine, like the preserve, can be made according to fancy—for instance, a little brandy would colour it, and improve its quality. Mr. Oldacre, gardener to the late Sir Joseph Banks, was the first to introduce the then best variety, which he brought home from St. Petersburg, having been gardener to the Emperor of Russia for some years.

DANGER OF TAKING THINGS FOR GRANTED.—It was objected to the system of Copernicus, when first brought forward, that if the earth turned on its axis, as he represented, a stone dropped from the summit of a tower would not fall at the foot of it, but a great distance to the west; in the same manner as a stone dropped from the mast-head of a ship in full sail, does not fall at the foot of the mast, but towards the stern. To this it was answered that a stone, being a part of the earth, obeys the same laws, and moves with it; whereas it is no part of the ship, of which, consequently, its motion is independent. This solution was admitted by some, but opposed by others; and the controversy went on with spirit; nor was it till one hundred years after the death of Copernicus that, the experiment being tried, it was ascertained that the stone thus dropped from the head of the mast, does fall at the foot of it.

PURIFICATION OF OLEIC ACID, AND APPLICATION TO MANUFACTURING PURPOSES.—(Wilson's Patent.)—In the manufacture of Price's stearic candles, from palm oil or tallow, a large quantity of oleic acid results, which has not hitherto come into much demand, on account of its unpleasant odour. The removal of this objectionable smell, which arises from the presence of a volatile matter in the oleic acid, is effected, in Mr. Wilson's process, by submitting the acid to the action of steam, heated to 400 degrees of Fahrenheit, for about two hours, and then gradually introducing cold water to cool it down. The oleic acid thus purified, is now fit for use in place of oil. The application of this purified oleic acid to manufacturing purposes, consists in combining it with a solution of soda-ash, rendered caustic by means of quicklime, in the proportion of one pound of soda-ash to a gallon of water, and adding thereto a pint of oleic acid, well stirring the mixture, to effect a complete combination of the ingredients. This saponaceous compound may be employed in milling and fulling woollen cloth, and in washing wool.

NUTRITIOUS VALUE OF FOOD.—The great importance of an attentive consideration of the kinds of food taken under different circumstances becomes evident, when it is known that one class of substances supplies the fuel that maintains the heat of the body, and other substances supply the materials that form the flesh and the bones. The lungs act as a furnace, in which the process of slow combustion is always going on, by the absorption of oxygen from the air into the blood, and the exhalation of a portion of it, in combination with the carbon of that fluid, in the form of carbonic acid. It was stated by Dr. Playfair, that the weight of oxygen absorbed by a man in this manner in a year, averages 700 lbs., and that the consumption of carbon during the process is so rapid, that in the course of three days all the carbon in the blood would be exhausted, if it were not renewed by a supply of proper food. As the temperature of the body is always the same under every climate, the inhabitants of the colder regions of the earth require a larger amount of food containing carbon than those who live further south, to maintain the heat at its requisite standard.

AN OLD STORY.

SAYS Tom to Jem, as forth they went

To walk one evening fine:

"I wish the sky a great green field,
And all that pasture mine!"

"And I," says Jem, "wish yonder stars,
That there so idly shine,
Were every one a good fat ox,
And all those oxen mine!"

"Where would your herd of cattle graze?"

"Why, in your pasture fair."

"They should not, that's a fact!" said Tom;
"They should not, I declare!"

With that they frowned, and struck, and fought,
And fiercely stood at bay;
And for a foolish fancy cast
Their old regard away.

And many a war, on broader scale,
Hath stained the earth with gore,
For castles in the air, that fell
Before the strife was o'er!

GRAVITATION has, amid all her immensity, wrought no such lovely work as when she rounded a tear.

WHAT A BRIDE IN SIBERIA MUST DO.—It is a received custom that every young bride, on her arriving at her husband's house, must invite guests to a dinner prepared by her own hands, and the repast is considered a test of the education she has received at her parents' house. Shame and disgrace are the consequence, should she be found deficient on such an occasion; and shame also to the parents who did not attend to that essential branch of her education. Whereas her success in gratifying her guests is taken as a proof not only of the woman's own excellence, but also as no small recommendation of her own family, among whom she must have had so good an example, and received such excellent instruction.

[HERCULES AND THE CRETAN BULL.]

SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION IN DUBLIN.

HERCULES AND THE CRETAN BULL.

FOREIGN governments have been magnanimous contributors to this brilliant undertaking. The Emperor of the French is a very large contributor. So are the King of Holland, the King of the Belgians, and the King of Prussia: and the examples of these sovereigns have been liberally followed by their respective subjects.

Our pictorial illustration this week is taken from a colossal bronze group, presented, for this interesting occasion, by that munificent patron of the arts and sciences, the King of Prussia. The subject is one familiar to us all. It is Hercules taming the Cretan bull. The figures are vigorously executed, and replete with animation. The artist has adhered to the fable with marvellous fidelity. The figure of the Grecian hero is an embodiment of the majesty of rude strength, coupled with indomitable nerve and a resolution founded on something nobler than a confidence in the power of gigantic bone and muscle. You can perceive that Hercules is cool and collected—that he wishes to subdue, not slay. His action is that of Hercules—not Alcides. He is the brute-tamer—the heroic king of the barbarous and mystic ages of Greece; ages upon which the civilising light of Egypt had not yet fallen. The bull is a savage denizen of the plain and forest—not the monarch of the mead. His short, strong, and straight horns are intended for battle. The model, no doubt, was one of those intractable animals still to be found in the wilds of Andalusia.

But while we unreservedly bestow a just share of admiration on these exquisite works of art, we must quarrel with the taste that leads genius to fritter away itself on old forms. Why not invent new modes of developing the illimitable resources of art? This age invents to an almost incalculable, most certainly a glorious extent, in science. Let the visitor go to the machinery hall, and he will find himself in the midst of the most stupendous inventions—in fact, the revelations of the genius of modern times. With art it appears that invention is still in its infancy. This "Hercules and the Cretan Bull" is rendered just as a Greek artist would have done in the days when the literati of Greece believed in the Delphian oracle. The fable is faithfully and energetically interpreted; but what artist has hitherto attempted to give us an idea of the historical Hercules—of the great warrior, the wise statesman, the deliverer of his country? Every nation and every people has had its Hercules. Bala Rama is the Hercules of the Hindoos, Belus of the Babylonians, Wodin of the Scandinavians—and, to come to later times, King Arthur of the Britons. The exploits of all these heroes, owing to the absence of the means of perpetuating them, have been shrouded in allegory. But surely the imagination of genius could clothe them in higher attributes than those of athletes. The twelve labours of Hercules are symbolical of actual events that influenced the destinies of mankind—and yet art has never yet gone beyond the idea of the fable itself. In this inventive age such a fact must be accepted as evidence of the materiality of art—of its poverty in spiritual development—and, we must add, its inability to discard old forms, and stride boldly into the wide field of originality.

CANDELABRUM OF BOG-OAK AND IRISH DIAMONDS.

This is exhibited by the Messrs. Grogan, and as a portion of the remarks we have elsewhere applied to their inkstand will equally apply to this really splendid production of industrial art, we must content ourselves with congratulating the exhibitors on the success they have achieved in the manufacture of articles of ornament and utility from wood that, until very lately, was only valued as fuel, or as affording room for the speculations of the antiquary and the geologist. This candelabrum is very beautiful; and should the public only support these efforts to render art subservient to the purposes of domestic convenience and decoration, we do not doubt but that, in a short time, in design and ornament, our native manufacturers will successfully compete with the most celebrated artists of the continent.

But before this can be accomplished, they must study—and study hard, too—study with a view to improvement, to development—not copying. Emendation is the bane of art. It takes the lead where it should only follow. The higher principles of art—in order to work out a general change in British artistic idiosyncracies—must be more consulted in designs for articles of utility as well as of ornament. Manufacturers must learn to appreciate the doctrine that art is not confined to painting and sculpture merely. The embodiment of the ideal must not be reserved for the private recesses of luxury and wealth, nor its enjoyment limited to the highly-educated minority. The germ of that ideal still lives within the rudest human form; and if art be the language of the Universal, and be designed to convey a spiritual message to all, art, still following in the footsteps of nature, must instinctively seek to find some expression in every object made by or for the use of man. And it is in the pursuit of this its instinct that, ever since the first dawn of civilization in man, not only the temples, palaces, and tombs, but also the common habitations—and even the most ordinary furniture, utensils, and appliances of every-day life—began to clothe themselves in such graceful forms and ornamental decorations as growing taste led men to feel might contribute to the satisfaction of that earliest craving of human nature for the spiritual, represented as it is by the beautiful and the graceful. The success with which manufactures were made to subserve the purposes of artistic teaching and suggestion, while retaining their fitness and convenience for domestic use, has been among all nations in proportion to their real civilisation—taking the word in its highest sense. Such an Exhibition, then, as this, will afford a test of that civilisation; and offering, as it will, examples from almost all Europe, and many specimens of the highest class produced by each nation, it will also supply an opportunity of comparing the advance of each country with that of its neighbours; and to Ireland it may point out the path to perhaps more complete success.

The adaptation of graceful, pure, and appropriate forms to all the various objects which surround man in his daily life, does insensibly tend to refine and elevate his mind; while on the other hand, to be for ever accustomed to see only coarse and clumsy forms, degrade it, by making it habitually content with what is in its nature earthy and unideal.

And while such are the comparative effects of graceful and coarse designs in the manufacture not only of the ornamental parts of our dwellings, but the utensils of ordinary use, how important must it not be to prevent as much as possible the manufacture of those most coarse forms with which, in every variety of pretensions and unmeaning vulgarity, we, here in our generation hitherto, have been so unfortunately beset. For as long as such things are generally made they will be circulated, and become—some of them at least—"fashionable;" and in the general dullness of sound and pure taste, even those of better instinct are apt to submit to this poor, empty word "fashionable." Again, it so happens that hitherto those of poor or but moderate means are forced to content themselves with forms of entire ugliness around them, because those manufactured articles which aspired to elegance were made of such costly materials, or in such a costly manner, as to be entirely beyond the reach of their little means.

The only preventative in future for this state of things, is a more generally diffused power of appreciating what is tasteful or graceful, and so much artistic education of the mechanic and manufacturing classes as will enable them to accommodate the forms of all their works—even those in the cheapest materials and for the commonest purposes—to the principles of art: so that each should, through the simplicity and purity of its design, through its appropriateness, and through the lightness or massiveness, softness or strength, of its outlines, satisfy refined taste by its completeness, and insensibly infuse into the mind namely, of originality. For they are never mere copyists of what had been done before them: they studied previous works but to find their key, their secret, the guiding principle that led to their success. And having found it—as patient and loving study will ever find, but patient and loving study alone—they applied it to new forms and new things, to the realisation of their own ideas, still different and higher, or struggling to be higher, than those that had preceded them.

BOG-OAK INKSTAND.

No article in general use can excel the inkstand in value. Its tiny bottle or reservoir holds the fluid that is as much an agent in governing the world as coal and water are instrumental in giving motive power to the steam-engine. Ink to human intelligence is what the blood is to the system or the dew to the flowers. Thought is powerless without it. To the press it is daily bread—to genius and civilisation life, everything—for without the means of perpetuation, mind would once more "fall into the blind cave of eternal night." Yet until within the past few years no article of essential utility was more scurvily treated than ink. The first ink-holders were bottles made of clay, then porcelain came into fashion, afterwards pewter, and latterly glass, the best material hitherto adopted; but as regards the form of the vessel, we cannot perceive any improvement on that villainous bottle which the unwelcome exciseman used to carry in his button-hole, and now the equally obnoxious tax-gatherer has peeping out of his waistcoat-pocket, like a little imp shedding tears of joy over the exorbitancy of the numerous demands made on the resources and tempers of her Majesty's subjects. The inkstand fared still worse: it was positively ugly—either a flat wooden trencher or an unsightly trough. Of late there has been more taste displayed in the manufacture of these stands—the eye has been more consulted; but still they have rarely departed from the platter or trough form. We are glad, however, to perceive that there is promise of immense improvement in this respect. Our illustration presents us with an inkstand that deserves the name. It is really pleasing and ornamental, as well as useful. It is made of Irish bog-oak, and mounted in gold and silver. It is the contribution of Messrs. Groggan, Dublin; and, independent of the interest attaching to it as being of Irish manufacture, combines associations that take it right out of the category of dullness. A man can look at this inkstand, and never be at a loss for an idea. Bog-oak! Why he is looking at, touching, and using a piece of timber that grew thousands of years ago—long before the advent of Christianity, long anterior to the foundation of Rome, the wars of Alexander, or the foundation of the Temple of Jerusalem. Probably it flourished "a hale green tree" when Ireland traded with Tyre, and sent forth her contribution of artists, the Cyclops, to astonish ages by their gigantic architectural performances. And then the round tower to the right—a mysterious vestige of the dead, buried, and forgotten past. Who erected these ivy-crowned, circular edifices—what was the object for which they were intended? Were they observatories for the study of the heavens, or towers for the worship of the sun? Did Sabism ever prevail in the Green Isle? Can the Irishman who lights a fire on the hill-top, on St. John's Day, exclaim in his heart, when gazing on these hoary vestiges of an extinct era—

Spirits of fire, that brood not long,
But flash resentment back for wrong;
And hearts where slow, but deep, the seeds
Of vengeance ripen into deeds;
Till, in some treacherous hour of calm,
They burst like Zelem's giant palm,
Whose buds fly open with a sound
That shakes the pigmy forests round.

It is an article of such apparent simplicity—an article in such frequent use—can suggest thought, or refer the mind to its stores of previous reading, like this one has done with us, we must say that the exhibitors of this inkstand have made the first deserving of the name.

HENRY BIBB.

HENRY BIBB was born in the month of May, 1815, in Shelby County, Kentucky. His mother was a slave, the property of David White, Esq., who reckoned the infant as he would a sheep added to his flock, or an acre to his farm. He "flogged him up," and with the earliest taste of life, this son of the bondwoman, the eldest of seven brothers, felt that gall which breeds bitterness in the hearts of a whole race against the teachers of Christianity. Who his father was he knows not—for the ties of life are not binding to the slave; and if he had known, there would have been no better lot for him. Even from the one parent he knew, he was, as a young child, dragged away to labour; and for eight or ten years the wages of his drudgery, first under one master, then under another, went to pay for the education of his owner's daughter! She, in the polished society of the Southern States, sang, no doubt, and tinkled a guitar, and breathed out beautiful sentiments and utterances of affection; not a shade the less charmingly because every note was learned, every grace acquired, from the gains of a wretched boy, toiling under the lash—for the experience of misery began with him early. Barely allowed a rag of clothes, he worked all day hungry and tearful, lying down at night on a floor of hard earth, or a bench; sometimes treading with bare feet the frozen ground in December, and staining it with foot-prints of blood.

Aspirations he had, indeed, to burst these sordid chains,—but the vault of Chillon was not more dark than the world in which this fettered child was compelled to move. Reading and writing were forbidden to the slave, and all that was left to his mind was liberty to plot in secret an escape—as Henry did, though with many their very souls corroded in the absence of all hope. But he soon began to meditate flight. At ten years of age he was living with a Mr. Vines, in Newcastle town; and the wife of this man was an example of the corrupting influence of the slave system upon human nature. The little boy whom an Englishwoman would rather have fondled in her bosom, was to her a victim whose miseries might absorb some of her savage feelings. She struck him, flogged him, reproached him for every act; and when he ran away, lacerated his flesh with a cruelty almost more than human. Several times was this repeated, until in despair of taming this negro child's spirit, his master sent him back to Mr. White, whose property he was. That person had married a second wife, and this new tyranny was worse than the former. Half the time that Henry Bibb lived here, he was away in the woods seeking to escape that blood-dripping thong which surely awaited him on his return. His mistress was not only a task-master, but a torturer by predilection. She forced him all day to rub the furniture, to wash clothes, to scrub the floor; rock her chair, tickle her feet, and scratch or comb her hair, and then to reward him, scourged his limbs till they quivered under her hands. Several times he tried to escape, and once or twice, by taking a bridle with him, and pretending he was on the look-out for a runaway horse, strangers suffered him to pass; but in the end he was always captured, and condemned to a whipping.

From that time burned in his heart an unquenchable longing—and more than a longing, an unchangeable resolve—to be free. When he was eighteen years old, the of even the rudest, something of that undefinable feeling of pleasure, which even the least educated man receives in regarding the smallest objects of healthy external nature.

But if Irish students wish to really produce anything important by its originality, beauty, and appropriateness of design, they should eagerly take advantage of the Great Exhibition, to study the works of other nations, and each particularly in his own department. The flexibility of the French mind, the variety of resources of French genius, their warm feeling for beauty and grace in every form, their remarkable talent for drawing, should recommend their works to the peculiar attention of the Irish people; and a higher lesson still is to be learned from them—that, light of religion dawned over his mind—for in spite of every hostile law, knowledge sometimes came, like manna in the desert, to the slave. A young white girl tried to set up a school for teaching the negroes; but police were sent to break up its second meeting, and the attempt was declared an incendiary crime. Far pleasanter was it to the proprietors to see their bond-people degraded by debauch, and sinking into an oblivious apathy, which threatened no revolt against a despotism the most monstrous ever conceived by human nature. In consequence of this, every Sunday was an occasion of riot, fighting, gambling, and profanity, encouraged by the masters: and thus the black population was scientifically debased, in order that every human thought might be deadened, and every yearning for liberty buried in obscenity and vice. The slaves with whom Henry Bibb associated were, like the savages of their original country, superstitious to the last degree, and he himself relates how several times he went to quacks for amulets and charms, in whose efficacy he was taught to believe, in order to save himself from hard work and flogging.

Still there was a star above these clouds. Liberty was more than a name to him—it had penetrated to his heart. He heard that Canada lay somewhere in the north—a country of freedom, whither the slave might fly. Beyond Egypt there was even for him a promised land; but the hosts of Pharaoh were less inevitable than hunters of men, who invariably seized him before he could cross the broad, bright Ohio. Often, from the cliff-like banks of that noble river, he stood alone, looking, as he tells us, at the blue northern sky, thinking of the happy people there, asking his hope when he might be among them, and wistfully gazing on the thousand splendid steam-boats, arriving and departing with men, women, and children, who, made like him, feeling as he did, born in the same nature, and nurtured in the same desires, yet belonged, it seemed, to another creation—for they were all free, and he was a miserable slave. There were birds flying over those waves, that perpetually ran by to the ocean; but they and the brutes enjoyed what he was robbed of by those of his own kind, in a state proclaiming itself the moral glory of the world.

From these reflections he was for some time diverted by the society of many young women, in associating with whom he found no little delight. He relates some curious incidents to illustrate the sordid ignorance and superstition in which the negroes are bred. Desiring to secure the affections of one, he asked some quack conjuror for a charm. The fellow told him to get the bone of a bull-frog, and if he could rasp with it the naked skin of the girl he liked, she would reciprocate his affection. He selected one whom he knew to be already as affianced as slaves are ever allowed to be, and, as he humorously relates: "I happened to meet her in the company of her lover one Sunday evening, walking about: so when I got a chance, I fetched her a tremendous rasp across her neck with this bone, which made her jump. But in place of making her love me, it only made her angry with me." The poor fellow did not then know that he himself possessed the mightiest amulet with which man can subdue women to his heart—a faithful and loving disposition, that could express itself in the genuine language that needs no interpretation. He soon afterwards met a mulatto slave-girl, named Malinda, who lived in Oldham County, Kentucky, about four miles from the residence of his owner. She possessed a beautiful form; her skin was soft and smooth; her cheeks had a dark bloom upon them, and her eyes were as bright as those of the New Orleans quadroon. She associated with slaves of the first rank—for there are castes and grades even among these wretched people; and for the sweetness of her voice, was admired by many of the free population.

Henry Bibb visited Malinda two or three times, without thinking of more than an acquaintance. But even the code of those southern states cannot change the nature of man. There was soon an union of feeling between them; every visit deepened the impression, and it was speedily apparent that the girl loved him, too—for her eyes sparkled when he came, her hand lingered in his, and she asked him to come, when her mother wished him to stay away. She allowed him to pass through every phase and sentiment, until he became attached to her by all that can bind the heart. Solemnly, however, does he declare, that had he then fully known to what miseries and humiliations the child of the slave is born, he would not have taken a wife, and propagated inheritors to such a curse.

One Saturday evening, however, which he remembers to have been lit by a bright moon, he met Malinda at her mother's door. As he approached, she flew to him and took his hand; he told her then what was the chief emotion of his mind: that he desired her as his wife, and would for ever love her as such; but only on certain conditions would ask her to make the pledge. He was religious, he said, and she also yearned through an untaught faith, to heaven. He was determined to be free, and if she would consent to be his partner in the troubles and dangers he saw in view, then the nuptials of their hearts were complete. She required a week to make her decision; and when he met her again, it was agreed that if they still remembered this promise at the end of a year, they should be married—that they should lead a pious life, and never forget that the promised land they desired was beyond the Niagara Falls, under the sacred flag of England. Legal wedlock they could not enter into. What is immorality to the white, is forced upon the American slave. They are forbidden to seal their union before the altar, and they may be torn asunder whenever their remorseless owners may require. But there was not for these less faith in the mutual pledge now sworn between these young lovers. They clasped each other by the hand—they pledged their sacred honour they would be true—they called on heaven to witness and bless these nuptials: and in this manner they stood bound by the only ties by which they could ratify their promises of love.

Many difficulties arose in the way of this marriage. Henry's mother opposed it, because she thought he was too young; Malinda's mother because she desired to match her daughter to the favourite slave of a wealthy man. His own master objected, because he thought he would steal for his wife's sake; but hers consented willingly, and at last a festival took place to celebrate the occasion.

For some time Henry could only visit his wife on Saturday night, returning punctually to his master's estate on Monday, under pain of a flogging. The oppression he suffered was so great that his owner feared his running away, and sold him to William Gatewood, the proprietor of his wife. Then the unmitigated bitterness of slavery plunged the iron deeper into his heart. He was forced to stand by while Malinda was tortured, insulted, and abused; to see her staggering at her toil, to see her whipped by coarse and cruel men.

A few months after this, a daughter was born to these affectionate but unhappy slaves. Scarcely had she grown to be able to walk, when her mother saw her the victim of the same inhumanity that was practised on herself. She saw Mrs. Gatewood whipping her, bruising her face with her heavy hand, and reiterating her savage blows at every heavy sob extorted by pain from the feeble creature. She was named Frances, and was a quick, playful, vivacious, and interesting little girl, with a keen black eye, and in her face a reflection of her mother's beauty. But with such a wife and such a child to love, Henry Bibb was wretched—for separation, tying up, flogging, insults, hard tasks, and a denial of every soothing influence of life, rankled every day more deeply in his soul.

In the fall of the winter of 1837, the climax of this tyranny had come. There was, perhaps, little worse to endure—but there was more already than the most abject could bear. Henry Bibb resolved to attempt to escape. It was a perilous trial. Two dollars and fifty cents, with a suit of clothes he had never worn before, were all he possessed. Had he told his wife this intention, it is improbable that he could have succeeded; but he desired work, and liberty for her as well as for himself. Gaining permission from his master to work for himself at Christmas, he went, on the 25th of December, down to the Ohio, pretending to seek for employment. Instead of this, however, he managed to cross in a ferry-boat, and found himself in a free state, though not in one whither he could not be pursued. Steam-boats were landing passengers here every night—so Henry concealed himself until the sound of one coming up the stream came like the welcome of freedom to his ears. In a few moments he was on her deck, bound for Cincinnati, but bewildered by fear and excitement—for he was liable at any moment to be seized, fettered hand and foot, and sent back to his master. One advantage he had—in his complexion, which was not black, but somewhat fair—since there was some slave-holding blood in his veins. Every time, nevertheless, that the mate came with a lantern to the steamer, he trembled in anticipation of a discovery; but contrived at last to hire a hammock, in which he lay, muffling the clothes about his face, till morning. No questions were asked, and about nine o'clock next day the vessel moored off the quay of Cincinnati. The fugitive stepped on shore, walked as calmly and gracefully as he could up the main street, and escaped observation. But Canada was his destination. How should he find the way? An inquiry might cause suspicion. In this exigency he had faith in the honesty of his race. He would ask some one kindred to him by blood, and sure he was that none of that race would betray him. Nor was he disappointed. A poor wood-chopper gave him directions, told him of the abolitionists, feasted him hospitably, and gave him God's speed on his way. Then striking out at the high road, the escaped slave walked rapidly along, and as the night approached, his eyes sought in the depths of heaven for that North Star which hung like a lamp of hope over the unreachd haven of his desire. For forty-eight hours he struggled on without food or rest, and then, half frozen with cold, barefooted and hungry, he knocked at a door, and asked leave to warm himself at the fire. They were Latter-day Christians, indeed, who were within—for they refused him this little dole of charity; and at the next house the same inhospitable answer met him. In the morning, however, he saw a low-roofed cottage, and through a window the breakfast-table spread with all its bounties. A woman sat near it, and, stepping up to her with his hat off, Henry asked for sixpence worth of bread and meat. She gave it, and when he offered payment, burst into tears, bade him take it as a gift, and go in peace on his journey. Mungo Park fed with milk under a tree by the poor African woman, was not more gladdened by her cheer, than the fugitive who now, it might be said, was receiving similar kindness at the hands of one of that traveller's race. In this way Henry Bibb got through the state of Ohio, faring at public-houses on the road, and at length earning a meal by assisting the cook at an hotel. She wanted to hire him for the winter; but he went in fear of being pursued, though at Perysburg he was persuaded to remain, gaining a livelihood as a wood-chopper, until the next spring.

On the 1st of May, 1838, he hastened on his return to Kentucky, through a dangerous expedition. He could not live without his wife; and, having saved fifteen dollars, resisted the advice of his friends, and determined to risk the perils of the enterprise. He laid out his cash in pedlar's ware, bought a pair of false whiskers for disguise, and set off in search of his little family.

The journey was comparatively easy. When he reached Cincinnati, he had sold all his goods at a profit. He then took passage in a steamer, and in due time landed about six miles from Bedford, where his mother resided, near the estate of his former master. It was glowing moonlight, and he walked rapidly through the plantation, until he reached her house. He knew she slept in the kitchen, and that her bed lay near the window. He tapped on the glass. A woman put her head out, and inquired who was there. With his false whiskers she did not know even her son; but when he took off this disguise, and claimed her as his mother, her affection recognised its own at once, and she bounded out through the door to embrace him.

Happily, Malinda and little Frances happened to be staying a night with her, so that the meetings all took place at once. There was weeping and laughing for joy, delight, and fear; hope flickering through the gloom of doubt and dread, so fearful that they were only not despair. Henry Bibb, however, was not easily depressed. He gave his wife money to pay her passage to Cincinnati, and arranged to meet her there on the next Sunday. He would not long remain in the neighbourhood. On the Wednesday following, therefore, he once more said farewell—promising himself, however, that this was only a prelude to her welcome in the sweet land of liberty. Ferrying himself across the Ohio, he again made his way to Cincinnati; but there all his resources were exhausted, and some friends were obliged to subscribe for his support. Among others, two white men knew his secret, and each gave him fifty cents. They wormed the story from him, cajoled him into telling his master's name, and left the room, bidding him a treacherous God speed. These sneaking spies, who in public would probably act, if they could, as the General Monks of America, took passage on board the steam-boat down the river, found the owners of Henry Bibb, got a promise of three hundred dollars for betraying him, and, returning to Cincinnati, engaged a pack of ruffians to aid them in capturing the poor slave, who had committed the crime of breaking from unnatural chains.

Henry Bibb had engaged to excavate a cellar for the good woman with whom he was stopping. While he was digging under the house, he heard a man enter above; another came to the door. He attempted to pass out, but this fellow drew a pistol, and declared he would shoot him if he moved. Then all the hopes he had cherished melted like aerial delusions before his eyes. His dear wife's coming would be to a desolate place; his child's escape would be into a land where no father awaited her; and he whose wife and whose child were looked for there, was going back in fetters to the toil of a galley-slave.

He was dragged to a "justice office," claimed by Mr. Gatewood, delivered over to him, and locked up in a goal. The gaoler's wife, with another woman, pointed out a way of escape; but for their sake he would not attempt it, and waited until all was ready for his embarkation a third time on the rolling Ohio. On his way, an offer was made to him by some professional slave-catchers, that if he would enter into their employment they would set him free, and soon pay him money enough to purchase his wife and child out of their bonds. But with manly indignation he refused these wages of a bloodhound, and they immediately took him to Louisville, where he was offered for sale. Three of them remained in his room all night, to prevent the possibility of escape; and next morning one stayed, with bowie-knife and pistols, to guard him, while the others went in search of a purchaser.

The man that remained was Dan Lane—a Jonathan Wild of America—a sort of human mastiff, hired to rob a slave mother of her children—to kidnap the young girl by her parent's side—to drag the wife from her husband—to do all the vilest and basest work of the vilest and basest trade. Drunkard, gambler, scoundrel as he was, no fitter agent could be found for the nefarious slave system of America. Dan, while the others were away, was compelled to go to the stables, situated in one of the most public streets in Louisville. Henry Bibb of course accompanied him, marshalled by the arm. When arrived, he was ordered to stand by until his guardian was ready to come out; but the door was open. A glimpse of liberty beckoned him away. He made two or three cautious steps in that direction, and then, with a sudden impulse of courage, rushed through, and shot like an arrow along the street. Dan was not ready to follow. He was only half-dressed; and a moment or two must elapse before he could come out of the stall. With this advantage, therefore, Bibb turned a corner before he was perceived; and by doubling at every point, jumping a number of fences, and diving through arroyos, succeeded in eluding his pursuer. At last he sprang over a high wooden palisade, and came down on a fence-post, with such a clatter of arms barking about him, that he almost gave himself up for lost. There was, however, close by, a huge pile of boards and scantling, where he found a hiding place, and remained ten or twelve hours, enduring the worst agonies of fear.

There was a workshop on either side, and men were at work within eight or ten feet of him. Night came on, however, without his being discovered, and about nine o'clock, groping about, he found his way through a low brick tunnel out into the street. There, as once before, he trusted his secret to a man of his own race's colour, and was not betrayed. It was an old man who gave him something to eat, and told him that he was about forty miles from the residence of William Gatewood, whose wife, whom he still hoped to rescue, was living. There was a good road, but he preferred making his way over the rocky hills, woods, and plantations, back to Bedford. So he started off, content that night by the stars, and in the morning by the larks that sang merrily in the fields all around him. A slave, working in a meadow, gave him a piece of bread, in return for which Bibb taught him the idea of escape, which he pledged himself to do within six months from that day. Soon after, he met an old friend, who managed to procure him an interview with Malinda. They met with tears and dependent looks, for the avenues of hope seemed closing, and life was passing away, while Canada was yet a vision of the soul—a land half fable, too happy for the slave. The fugitive remained several days in concealment, attended by his wife, who brought or sent him food; but not daring to move, for Dan Lane actually went to the house in which he was hidden—near enough to have been reached by his hands, and he heard that there was a large reward offered for his capture.

Evidently no safety was there. He must once again go his way alone, and in the middle of the night he bade a sorrowful adieu to Malinda and his child, and started off in the darkness. "Oh, that was almost like tearing the limbs off my body!" Should he ever see them again? It was not sure. They both cried bitterly at parting; and might they not have been forgiven if a silent curse went out from their hearts upon those sordid tyrants who thus made the life which heaven had given them for happiness, a life of affliction and despair? Henry Bibb then left, and through his knowledge of the way, succeeded early in reaching Perrysburg, in Ohio. There he waited eight or nine months, without hearing of his family. It was clear that Malinda could not escape. Of what use, therefore, was liberty to him? He could make a new effort for her rescue, and if need be, he would sacrifice himself in the attempt—for this unhappy, toil-worn man had not forgotten the sweet hours of his youth, when he pledged himself to that young girl by moonlight, near her mother's door.

Again was Henry Bibb on the scene of his early life's suffering—the place where he had been tortured while a child by stripes, when a man by the humiliation of his wife, and where ever since his fancy had been with those who were dear to it, and who now seemed drifting into oblivion. As one risen from the dead he appeared before his mother. No one was in her room when he entered, except a little female slave, fast asleep. The woman shrieked with joy at beholding her son, and that cry of rapture woke the slumbering girl. This creature nurtured in chains had been abused by them, for the teachings of servitude had rotted her heart, and corrupted it with the darkest vices of human nature. She kept perfectly still, she gave no sign of being awake, she plotted—the pigmy spy—to overhear all, and report it to her mistress. She continued skulking, with closed lids, while the fugitive spoke of his wife, of his child, of his plans, of all he hoped and desired to do. He then went away, promising to come back next night, about seven o'clock. At that hour he was punctually approaching the house, when he was alarmed by seeing several men, with dogs, moving to and fro. He hid among the bushes until midnight was past, and then, tapping at his mother's window, heard from her that the little girl had betrayed him; though, she said, if he kept quiet for a few days, people would believe that the young informer had lied.

Bibb accordingly went to a friendly slave, who concealed him, and generously located him. Happy we are to say, that that man is now enjoying the liberty he helped to secure for another. He carried messages between the husband and wife, and confiding in him alone Henry might have succeeded; but he trusted his secret to another professed friend, who betrayed him for twenty shillings. All was arranged for the start to Canada. It was to take place on the next Saturday night. The heroic adventurer lay waiting the hour under a heap of flax in a barn. Suddenly a tumult awoke him. Loud and savage, but familiar voices grated like curses on his ear. "Shoot him down! Shoot him down!" "If he comes to run or resist, kill him!" Such were the greetings of the dawn to him; and a mob of slaveholders, their faces glowing with diabolical self-gratulation, stood around him, brandishing cutlasses and guns, and threatening death upon the slightest attempt at flight. Farewell, then, to the long-cherished hope of liberty for Malinda and her child; farewell to his own free breathing of the air of heaven; the whole of his labour was in vain. He once more found himself bound with a cord, added of his watch and money, with other things which he prized far more, and led away a helpless and all but hopeless slave. To a blacksmith's shop they go, that he may be heavily manacled with fetters, that the ox never wears, and then to a moist, cold dungeon in Bedford gaol. There he was visited by numerous "gentlemen" of the neighbouring plantations, who came to taunt him—to tell him he ought to be hung, and to chill in his mind a lingering hope of some future success. They brought Malinda, too, and made her look at her husband from without the door; and as he sat there, his bosom swelling for an embrace, he could only see her weep, and hear her broken sobs; for they would not allow her to approach.

In the dead of the next night, when he was alone, two of his fellow-slaves came to the grating, and asked him to tell them about Canada. He gave them directions, and afterwards learned that within a week they were on the road, and successfully reached that country. For himself, however, there was a longer tribulation to come. On the third day he was brought out of prison, heavily ironed, fastened with cords on a horse's back, and guarded by two grinning men, to be marched to Louisville for sale. Following him, and bound on a nag, was his wife and child. Many who had known them shed tears as they went away; but the mother moaned bitterly wept—for she was now growing old, and her son and her adopted daughter were going from her for ever. In a miserable posture, and subject to the jeers of every wretch who passed in possession of liberty, the captives entered Louisville, and were carried to the common gaol. There Henry Bibb was visited by a physician, who prescribed for him: not for his own sake, but to increase his value in the market. Nevertheless, the den he was confined in stunk and swarmed with vermin. Thrice he was transferred to the workhouse, where a ponderous log-chain was rivetted about his leg, and he was set to labour at sawing stone. The fare of this hell on earth was coarse corn-bread, beef full of worms, and nauseous pot liquor; and even of this a very scanty allowance. At night the prisoners were confined, two together, in a damp stone cell, with scarcely a rag of bedding, and bugs and mosquitoes infesting every corner.

Murderers and swindlers were here placed on a level with this man, whose crime was claiming liberty, while Malinda was thrust amid crowds of female pickpockets, forgers, and the most shameless and abandoned of her sex. Yet, though their rascality and ferocity were shocking, they sympathised with the re-captured slave, and endeavoured to aid him in escape; but the plan failed, and despair began to blacken over his mind, when one morning the door of his cell opened, and Garrison, the slave-dealer, with brutal oaths and abuse, thrust in Malinda. She fell upon her husband's neck, moaning and sobbing, and bursting forth into a piteous wail: "Oh, my child—my child! my child is gone! What shall I do? my child is gone!" He could not then learn how, but that evening she told him the story. The child had disappeared, and now she was allowed only two days of companionship with him who was her only friend in that place of desolation.

Little Frances, however, had not been sold. At the expiration of three months, the slaves, handcuffed, and guarded by a savage dog, were marched to a boat at the Ohio, and floated down to New Orleans. The horrors of the voyage were like those of the middle passage—chains, crowding, cramping, and scarcely any air to breathe. At Vicksburg they were examined by a city officer, to ascertain their bodily and mental capacities; and at New Orleans were taken at once to a trader's yard prison, at the corner of St. Joseph Street. There men and women, young and old, were exposed, trimly combed and washed, for sale. They were compelled to stand in rows, to be questioned by the spectators; and if they failed to answer promptly, suffered the punishment by the paddle.

The paddle, says Henry Bibb, is made of a piece of hickory timber, about an inch thick, three in width, and eighteen in length. The part which is applied to the flesh is full of holes, through which the blood gushes at every blow. At length Henry Bibb was relieved from the Orleans prison. He was purchased, with his Malinda and her child, by Deacon Whitfield, of the Baptist Church, who lived on his plantation, at Clartom, almost fifty miles up the Red River. With a saintly tone of voice, an affection of humanity, and professions of kindly feeling, he was among the most cruel of a cruel race—the slaveholders of America. His negroes were a dull, feeble, half-starved, and over-laboured herd. The first impressions that Bibb received were by no means encouraging. First, he saw a man compelled to strip his own wife and flog her; then he saw the deacon give a young girl two hundred stripes on her bare flesh, and was himself compelled to wash her back with strong brine, under which the tears fell like burning drops from her eyes. Appointed to the office of overseer, he was forced daily to witness and participate in horrors which few hearts can conceive, or the pen of man describe. Every morning, long before sunrise, each slave was ordered to light a pine-torch, and go into the fields—so that a number of brilliant stars seemed to be glimmering, low down among the cotton trees. But, at the same time, the pitiable, overworked, poor wretches, under the lash, converted that which might have seemed a paradise, with all its flowers, into the semblance of a hell. Labour the most tedious was apportioned among the females as well as males; cotton planting and picking, grinding corn, and tillage. If a slave was sick, the deacon, a Christian minister, swore it was hypocrisy, and dosed him with a powerful and dangerous medicine. There was no care for the ailing. Malinda was afflicted, and she might have perished, for all that her mistress would have done to aid her; her second child died, and the father was compelled to bury it, coffinless, in a hole.

Shortly after, for attending a prayer-meeting, Henry Bibb was condemned to five hundred lashes, on his naked back. Under fear of this he attempted to escape, with his wife and remaining child. They took their way through the green wilderness, on the borders of the Red River, wandering for eight or ten days, and eating parched corn, grapes, and wild fruits, that hung bountifully on the wild trees. By means of a crooked tree they crossed the stream, and entered on the swamps of Louisiana, where snakes and alligators abounded, and where bloodhounds would probably be employed to hunt them down. Still all this was preferred to the deacon's chains. They were attacked by a troop of wolves, though by yelling and striking at them with a bowie-knife, Henry contrived to keep them at bay. Wolves, however, were not so ferocious as men; for, escaping them, these fugitives saw themselves pursued one day by horsemen and dogs: so that, again bound with cords, cursed and maltreated, Bibb, with Malinda and little Frances, were taken back to their melancholy bondage.

His clothing was stripped off; he was compelled to lie with his face on the ground; his hands and feet were tied to stakes, and he was scored from head to foot with the whip. When the regular number had been given, the deacon took the blood-stained thong in his hands, and, saying there was a spot left where the flesh was not ripped open, laid on a few heavier strokes than any. Eight or ten blows with the paddle were next applied, and after this salt water was poured into the wounds. A weighty iron collar was rivetted round his neck, with prongs reaching above the head, to which a small bell was attached, which he could not reach with his hand. But by the man determined not to be a slave, the bond of slavery may be broken. Henry Bibb had been captured and tortured, but his soul was not subdued, and he was once more in the woods, with an old negro named Jack, who consented to be the companion of his flight. They started for the city of Little Rock, in Arkansas, travelling only by night, under the guidance of the North Star, and concealing themselves all day. At length their provisions were exhausted, and coming in sight of a large plantation, where people of colour were at work, Jack said that after dark he would ask them for some food. They both hid until sunset, but when a female cook was asked, for charity's sake, to give bread to the poor wayfarers, she, to curry favour with her master, gave the alarm, and they had to fly for life. Nevertheless, they managed to get some little sucking pigs and a turkey, which, when in the depth of a forest, they cooked, and satisfied their hunger. That night, however, about ten o'clock, when emerging through the skirts of the woody country, five men sprang upon them with fire-arms, threatening them with instant death if they stirred. There had been a reward offered of fifty dollars for Henry Bibb, whether dead or alive. We, therefore, for a third time find him on the deacon's farm, manacled, flogged, tortured with unendurable toil, and offered for sale to any slave-owner who would buy him.

In December, 1840, he was sold to a party of sportsmen, who treated him with humanity, and, from sympathy with his misfortunes, endeavoured to buy his wife and child; but the deacon would not consent, and swore he would punish her if she attempted to cling to her husband. She did cling to him, and the scoundrel, with a brutality that made even slave-dealers, who were standing by, cry "Shame!" laid the murderous lash, on her back, and answered every appeal for mercy by an oath and a blow. Henry, consequently, was parted from Malinda; but the humane men with whom he was now in company, promised to sell him to some person travelling, and give him part of the money, to aid him in escaping to Canada. They advised him to feign stupidity, but to be alert on every opportunity, and they employed him to drive their waggon, black their boots, and curry their horses. They passed from state to state, giving him more indulgence than ever he had enjoyed as a servitor before, and led a curious life, racing and gambling at every populous place they reached. At last they entered the territory of the Cherokees, where a wealthy half-Indian saw Bibb, and took a fancy to him, as a sort of body-servant, for his personal attendance. He offered nine hundred dollars to the sporting dealers, and they struck a bargain; but they gave Henry full directions as to the Canadian route, by which he determined to profit on the first occasion. His new master, however, prevented him, not by cruelty, but by confidence—for he allowed him to ride a beautiful horse, and to carry a large money-bag, full of gold and silver. The temptation was strong, and the opportunity good; but there was a feeling of honour to check such a desire—and Henry settled for awhile on his master's plantation.

The Indian was a humane and reasonable man, employing many negroes in cultivating grain on a considerable plantation. He gave them good food to eat, and decent clothes to wear, employed no overseers to flog them, and only occasionally chastised them himself, which is generally done by all Indian masters. They sometimes make a rule never to scourge their negroes, but only attack them when they are free to defend themselves, and occasionally put the aggressor to flight! With these people the slave led a comparatively happy life, mingling in their dances and festivals; but this did not last long: the old chief was in a declining state, and shortly died, tended with every care by the man whom he had won by kindness. Henry Bibb watched over him night and day, until the last breath exhaled his soul into eternity, and even prepared his body for the tomb; though then, still longing to reach Canada—that Eden of hope—he plunged into the woods, and commenced anew the adventures of a fugitive. Wet, weary, hungry, he trod on his way, never daring to enter the Indian huts for a long while, when, desperate with want, he feigned drunkenness, and staggered to a cottage door. The inmates gave him a blanket, and fed him, refusing the payment he offered for, among those half-savage natives of that continent, where slavery brands the beautiful face of liberty with a deforming scar—among those heathen dwellers in the forest, with their tomahawks, their bows and arrows, and guns, and hunting knives, with their faces painted red, and grotesque ornaments disfiguring the natural dignity of their faces—Henry Bibb, the outcast slave, wandering and persecuted, was more safe from treachery and wrong, than among the polished and peaceful citizens who crowded the churches, and prayed to the God of all Christians in the stateliest cities of the land.

He felt this; he felt his danger multiplied a hundred-fold when he left the Indian country, and struck out on a prairie, where men of the imperial white race might be seen again; but finding a number of horses running loose in a plantation, he manufactured a bridle from a plant grape-vine, mounted one of them, fled, like Mazeppa over the Tartar plains, and found himself next morning far away, and out of reach of that community. Then he let the animal go, and blessing it for the service it had rendered him, wished it a safe journey back. For himself, he never paused until he crossed the frontiers of Ohio, and entered that State. There he put up at the best hotels, talked of buying land and stock, passed as an admiring traveller, and met a pleasant companion on the road, who lent him a spare horse. Thus, as in a kind of solitary triumph, he rode on, borne up by the exulting joy of his heart, until he reached Jefferson city. There he heard that a steamboat was that day expected down the river, for St. Louis. He knew that the captain would not take a coloured person on board, without ascertaining that he was legally free; but he adopted an ingenious stratagem to overcome this obstacle. He bought a large trunk, placed it on his shoulders, as though it were full packed, and followed a party of white people, as though he had been their slave. Thus he got safely between decks. There he met a number of Irish persons, whom he treated to whisky, and when deep in their good graces, asked one of them to get his ticket for him. In this way escaping observation, he came to Portsmouth, on the Ohio. His money was now exhausted; he had to hire himself to an hotel-keeper, for twelve dollars a month—and this, with the little gratuities he received, enabled him to save. Here he encountered one of the sportsmen who had formerly sold him—but no discovery took place.

Indeed, the end of his wanderings had come. In Detroit he went to school, and learned the rudiments of reading and writing—one of the first available exercises of which was the perusal of a letter from his old master, William Gatewood. There was no chance now of recovering him, so that individual thought proper to be polite. The emancipated slave condescended to reply to his former master: he told him that should he ever travel that way, "I will see you better than you did me, while I was your slave." He forgave him, he said; he begged to be lovingly remembered to his mother, and he advised him in future to treat his negroes more humanely. For, he added, many a fugitive slave would never have thought of escaping from a kind master; but to see his wife stripped and scourged, and his child bruised, until its skin was purple, was more than even the most abject of humanity could suffer.

From that day, Henry Bibb devoted himself to the cause of the slave. He travelled from state to state, manumitted by law, and preached against the iniquities of that traffic, abhorred by the nature of man. Sometimes he was still insulted by the white-skinned puppies, on board a steam-boat, or at an hotel; but the gall of slavery was gone—he was free, and but one wish remained unfulfilled.

That wish was the recovery of his wife—the restoration of his child. In 1845 he went to his native county—at some peril to himself—and inquired for Malinda. Then he tasted the last bitter ingredients of the curse of slavery. Malinda was not with Deacon Whitfield. With her child she was living with another.

When he heard of this, Henry Bibb cast her image out from his heart, and married another wife at Boston, in June, 1848. She was a kind, good person, full of affection for him, and of enthusiasm for his cause. May he long enjoy his remnant of happiness, and see some fruits of his pious labours in behalf of the poor slave population of America!

And what is the knowledge gained from this narrative, incontestably true, of slave life in the United States? It is that the deepest coloured pictures that imagination can employ—the warmest tints of fiction—the amplification of the most fertile and rhetorical pen—cannot exaggerate the infamy and cruelty of the slave-system there. We may decry the agitators for liberty, as the fanners of a dangerous flame; we may reject the delineations of romance, and the declamation of earnest oratory; but the story of Henry Bibb, the authenticated history of his sufferings, and the damning evidence he has given against the oppressors of his race, place beyond contradiction the facts now circulating through the world. If there be in the heart of universal humanity that conscience which knows good from evil; if there be in our common nature that warmth and charity, elevating while they soften; if our hearts are not dead to the eloquent appeal of the wronged—the basely and bitterly wronged negroes of America—then all the service our pity and sympathy can bestow, will be given to them; our voice will be raised for their deliverance from chains, which we could not, would not wear an hour; and if the echo of that voice does not come back to us over the Atlantic in blessings, for the blessing we bestow, sure we may be, that in the deep, and tremulous, and silent joy that will beat in the pulse and burn in the hearts of those dusky millions, will be found a gratitude worthy of all the prayers that liberty can raise for their redemption, in the happiest country of the world.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXXII.

What, ho! knave! speak! What ransom for your life?

The gibbet's raised—the cord and hangman ready.

Now is the time to speak. Your ransom—quick!

Beaumont and Fletcher.

WHEN Sir Henry Beddingfield entered the chamber of his prisoner, he found the Lady Elizabeth calm and collected; the only sign of her having been conscious of the danger she had run, was in the occasional flashing of her dark, keen eye—not a muscle of her countenance quivered. No sooner did she behold the stern old knight, than she gracefully advanced towards him; at the same time extending her hand, which, even to an advanced period of her life, was admired for its beauty.

"Before we thank you, Sir Henry, for your true and loyal conduct, we must ask your pardon for the injustice we so lately did you, in our poor judgment. Alack, that evil times and evil men should have led us to doubt the faith of such a gentleman!"

The governor of Woodstock knelt and kissed the taper fingers of the royal maiden.

"True," she continued, "we are a prisoner now; but our sister's mind may change, or the false knaves who have blown this coal of discord 'twixt us, be detected in their wicked practices. The times, too," she added, with a glance of dignity and pride, "may change, when Sir Henry Beddingfield shall find that Elizabeth forgets nor friends nor foes! The latter, be it understood, to pray for and forgive them!"

Frank Jerningham, who was standing near, could not repress a smile at the last trait of the speaker's character; who never, in the course of her long life and reign, appears to have bestowed, even on the most favoured of her lovers, or devoted adherents, an entire and perfect confidence.

"Madam," replied the knight, "in having had the happiness to serve you, I am well repaid; and doubly so, since that service accords with my duty to our sovereign lady the queen—who will learn with indignation, I feel well assured, this infamous attempt against your royal life."

Elizabeth smiled incredulously; and yet she had no reason to doubt the intentions of her sister. Many blame Mary for her harsh treatment of the daughter of Anne Boleyn—few give her credit for resisting the temptation which the imprudent conduct of Elizabeth, in tampering in more than one conspiracy, gave her. Disguise it as we will, Mary's firmness in resisting the entreaties of her husband, whom she idolised, and the advice of her most intimate councillors, alone preserved the princess from the block.

"We have never doubted our sister's love, Sir Henry," observed his prisoner, in a tone of hypocrisy; "but our bitterest enemies are nearest in her councils; it is the curse of princes that they seldom hear the truth."

The knight remained silent, whilst Elizabeth continued to pour forth professions of loyalty, mingled with thanks to her kind gaoler, as she now playfully termed him.

"Your grace owes me but scant thanks," observed the blunt old man; "for all our ward would have been useless, had it not been for an honest lad who overheard the devilish plot."

"A young man?" repeated her highness.

"Ay, madam—the nephew of a rascally vintner, who keeps the hostel known by the sign of the 'Fair Rosamond,' hard by. I had hanged the mercenary rogue with the rest, had I not learnt that his life might be the means of rewarding the lad—who, it seems, is a suitor for his pretty daughter."

The speaker explained to his illustrious prisoner the oath which the innkeeper had taken; and how he had reflected that the pardon of the father might be made the price of his assent to the marriage of the young people.

"With your permission, Master Beddingfield," said Elizabeth, "I will see these people in the morning. I owe the youth my thanks. Alack! in my present state they are all I have to offer him!"

The knight acceded to her request, and shortly afterwards, accompanied by his kinsman, Frank Jerningham, withdrew to his own apartments in the palace; leaving a strong guard at the lodge, for the protection of his charge.

"God help me!" sighed the royal maiden, as soon as she was alone; "my poor wits are almost baffled in this contention with my enemies; but they shall neither drive me to rebellion, nor a marriage which would banish me from England! No,—no!" she added, musingly, "a simple ring of gold is not to be balanced against the crown of England!"

With this reflection, the future queen retired to her chamber to repose.

On the following morning, directly after the mass—which, at this period of her life, Elizabeth from policy regularly attended—Sir Henry Beddingfield conducted her grace to the old banquet-hall, at one extremity of which a gibbet had been erected. The host of the Fair Rosamond, closely pinioned, the pretty Mabel, his wife, and Reuben, the tapster, were assembled there. From time to time the old man glanced uneasily at the preparations for execution. His whispered instructions to his dame were frequently broken by invectives directed against his nephew, whom he branded as a spy and an unnatural boy.

"This comes of harbouring poor relations," he said; "warm a serpent at your hearth and it is sure to sting you!"

Several times the young man was about to answer him; but the imploring looks of his cousin sealed his lips: the poor girl was half distracted between terror for her father's safety and doubts of her lover's conduct. Repeatedly the thought suggested itself that he must have betrayed him.

The doors at the lower end of the hall opened, and the Lady Elizabeth, attended by Sir Henry, her gentleman usher, and ladies, entered the gloomy old apartment where the second Henry so frequently had held his revel with the beauteous daughter of Lord Clifford. The buff-coats stood to their arms, as the officer who commanded them pronounced, in a loud tone:

"Her grace the princess!"

Elizabeth advanced with a rapid step towards the spot where the group of prisoners was standing. Her keen, dark eye fell for an instant, with no very encouraging look, upon the countenance of the vintner, whose wife and daughter sank upon their knees as she approached. From the old man it glanced upon Reuben: this time it wore a more favourable expression.

"Are these the men?" she said, addressing the knight.

"The same," answered Sir Henry. "The young one merits your grace's favour—inasmuch as to his intelligence and loyalty we owe the discovery of the villain Basset's foul design against your royal person. The old man is under doom."

"We will not interfere with your justice, Sir Henry," replied the princess, sharply; "to which, with all our heart, we do commend him. To you, young man," she added, in a more gracious tone, "we offer our thanks. For your fidelity and discretion, this purse is but a poor expression of our gratitude—but it is a pledge for favour."

As she spoke these encouraging words, she extended towards the tapster a small velvet satchel or bag, embroidered by her own hands with her cypher and coronet. It held about fifty crowns in gold—no inconsiderable sum in those days.

Instead of taking it, Reuben sank upon his knee and implored her highness to intercede with the governor of Woodstock for the life of the vintner.

"True, he is avaricious," he exclaimed, "but incapable of conspiring against your grace's safety. He received Basset and his villainous crew as he would any other travellers who paid well. He neither knew nor desired to know their purpose. If I have been so fortunate as to serve your grace, the only favour I solicit in return is a word to spare him from the gibbet!"

Sir Henry and the princess exchanged a few words in a low tone of voice.

"Were I to grant thy request, young man," answered the royal maiden, "peradventure I should do thee aught but kindness."

"Oh, save him!" exclaimed Mabel, falling upon her knees, and catching the robe of Elizabeth. "He is my father! Whatever his ways to others, he is kind to me! A word will make us happy—change our tears to smiles—and day and night grateful lips shall pray for you—grateful hearts shall bless you!"

"Hark 'ee, fellow!" said Sir Henry Beddingfield, extending his staff of office towards the prisoner; "thou hast a villainous nature, and fortune has dealt better by thee, in giving thee this pretty wench for a daughter and this good lad for a nephew, than thou deservedst. What security canst thou give for thy future conduct?"

The host of the Fair Rosamond, who fancied that the knight was about to put him to ransom, began to protest vehemently that he was a beggar.

"Peace, knave!" exclaimed his judge; "it is not thy trash I mean! Thy name?"

"Miles Max."

"Well, then, Miles Max—I, Henry Beddingfield, governor of Woodstock, tell thee that thy life is forfeit, for having harboured men who treasonably and falsely endeavoured to surprise the royal palace, and attempt the life of the Lady Elizabeth, sister to our gracious sovereign the queen. The security for thy future conduct is this: thou shalt execute me a bond, under the penalty of a thousand crowns, to resign thy hostel of the Fair Rosamond to thy daughter Mabel, and bestow her hand in marriage upon her cousin here."

"The fellow has not a maravedi!" exclaimed mine host.

"The better match, since thou, too, art poor!"

"She does not love him," added the avaricious old man, fixing at the same time a menacing glance upon his child.

"The greater will be thy gratitude for the sacrifice she makes to save thee!" answered the knight.

"I will hang first!" exclaimed Miles Max, bitterly.

"Hang thou shalt, then!" coolly replied Sir Henry. "Heaven forbid that, as a Christian gentleman, I should not leave thee thy choice! May it please your grace to retire," he added, bowing respectfully to Elizabeth. "It were not becoming that the hangman should do his office in such presence."

Again Reuben, with a generosity which said more for his heart than his head, would have interfered to save his worthless relative; but the princess waved him back with a gentle motion of her hand, feeling well assured that at the last moment Miles Max would think better of it. In fact, the whole affair had been previously arranged between her and Beddingfield, as a means of rewarding her preserver.

"I can do no more!" she said, and left the banquet-hall.

"Miles!" whispered his wife.

"Well?" was the sullen reply.

"Thee wilt never be such a fool as to hang, when giving up the old house can save thee?"

"It isn't the house!"

"What then?"

"Reuben—I hate him!" exclaimed Miles, bitterly.

"But for his folly I should have made a thousand crowns, at least, out of Basset's affair!"

Like most military men, Sir Henry Beddingfield was one of those who permitted but brief space between the conception of a purpose and its fulfilment. At a sign from him, the executioner seized the vintner in his grip, turned down the collar of his doublet, and, drawing a cord from a coil of ropes which he carried in his belt, slipped it over his neck.

Poor Mabel and the dame began to shriek and sob most piteously; and Miles, finding that the knight was in earnest, called out that he consented.

"Tis well!" said the old man; "release him!"

No sooner was the vintner free from the gripe of the executioner, than he added, that the marriage should be celebrated in a few days.

"A few days!" repeated Sir Henry, scornfully. "Dost think to palter with me, knave? This very hour the priest of Woodstock shall tie the knot! An' it be not done," he added, pointing to the clock, which wanted but three-quarters of an hour of noon, "before the dial strikes, by every saint, thou shalt swing high as ever Haman did!"

Miles Max now became as earnest in his entreaties to Mabel and Reuben to join their hands, as he had previously been opposed to their marriage. The chaplain was sent for, and the knot tied, a few minutes before the time expired.

The deed of gift which secured the Fair Rosamond to the bride and bridegroom, was afterwards signed, and given into their possession. Thus did the stern old knight reward the loyalty and good conduct of Reuben, whilst he punished the treasonable designs of the innkeeper.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Let bonfires shine in every place;
Sing and ring the bells apace,
And pray that long may live her grace.
POEM WRITTEN IN THE TIME OF ELIZABETH.

IN the month of June following the events narrated in the preceding chapter, Elizabeth was taken so seriously ill that her life was for some time despaired of. On her recovery, Mary not only sent her a ring in token of her amity, but permitted her to retire to her mansion at Hatfield, under the guardianship of Sir Thomas Pope, who, being a good scholar, soon ingratiated himself with his royal charge.

In November she was sent for to court, at the instigation of Philip of Spain, the queen's husband, who left no means short of violence untried to remove her from the kingdom. The pretensions of Philibert of Savoy to her hand were renewed, and she found herself exposed to the solicitations not only of the imperial party, but her sister. With her usual prudence, she contrived to avoid the snare, by positively declaring her fixed determination to lead a single life; after which she was permitted to return to her retreat at Hatfield.

During the rest of Mary's reign, the difficulties and persecutions of Elizabeth were from the different suitors for her hand, which Mary was continually pressing upon her. Amongst others, Prince Eric, the son of the great Gustavus Vasa, and the heir to the Danish throne, were equally rejected. Young as she was, the future queen did not permit her judgment to be dazzled by the prospect of the crown matrimonial of either country, whilst the diadem of England appeared like a glorious certainty beaming in the future.

The moment at last approached when the life of Mary was drawing to a close. The events which preceded her death belong more to the reign of that princess, than the subject of our present memoir. Not long before that event took place, the queen sent two lords of her council—Arundel and Paget—to visit her at Hatfield.

The interview was a curious one.

By command of Mary, they made three proposals to her successor. The first was, that she would not change her privy council; the second, that she should bind herself to make no alteration in the established religion of the realm; the third, that Elizabeth should pay her just debts.

Upon which conditions the queen promised to leave her the crown.

"As for the crown," answered the daughter of Anne Boleyn, "I have no reason to thank her for it—since it is my peculiar and hereditary right, my lords—which none but traitors would gainsay!"

"Touching the religion of the realm, I will not change it—provided only that it can be proved such by the word of God."

"That I should pay the just debts of the queen, my sister, is both equitable and fitting; and I promise to do so as far as may lay in my power."

With this reply she dismissed them, and they returned to London little satisfied with the equivocal nature of her answer.

Shortly after, the crown jewels were sent to her by her sister.

It had been previously arranged, that on the demise of Queen Mary, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton should be the bearer of the intelligence to Hatfield, where the Lady Elizabeth still resided with all becoming privacy; but coming events will cast their shadows before them, and the crowd of courtiers—those true worshippers of the rising sun—which began to arrive, indicated that the crown was about to descend upon the brow of another.

Elizabeth was seated in her closet, in conversation with Cecil and her ladies, when it was announced to her that a gentleman, covered with dust, whose horse had fallen from exhaustion at the entrance of the park, had arrived at Hatfield, and humbly craved audience of her grace. The countenance of the future sovereign flushed, and then turned deadly pale—every eye was fixed upon her.

"Your highness will see him?" observed Cecil.

"Alone!" answered the princess.

"Alone?" repeated the secretary, in a tone of disappointment.

"You can remain—let all else retire."

It was not till the apartment was cleared, that she permitted the entrance of the messenger, who came to announce her succession to the long-coveted crown of her sister—the object of her ambition, struggles, and hopes.

No sooner had Sir Nicholas entered the apartment, than he carefully closed the door; then, bending the knee, pronounced in a low tone, in which exultation, however, was distinctly manifested:

"God save Queen Elizabeth!"

"Amen!" ejaculated Cecil, at the same time bending the knee, and kissing the hand extended towards him.

"Our sister Mary?" said Elizabeth, fixing her keen glance upon him.

"Is dead, so please your majesty."

"Art sure?"

"I had it from one of the gentlemen of the Earl of Arundel!" replied the messenger.

"Sir Nicholas," said the princess, gravely, "it is not upon such uncertain intelligence that we can accept the title you have saluted us with. I must have more certain proof."

"Public rumour, madam."

"May be circulated by mine enemies. It were a childish game to play into their hands by an act of treason, no matter how innocently committed, at such a moment! You must ride back with all speed to London."

The messenger bowed.

"And see the lady of the bedchamber o th queen."

"Mean you your majesty's?"

"Not that title," interrupted Elizabeth; "perhaps it is not yet mine. I doubt not your fidelity, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, but experience has made me careful of the wiles of Philip and his friends. You will see the party I have named, and if the event be true—if, indeed, I am Queen of England—demand from her, in my name, the black enamelled ring which our sister wore day and night upon her left hand. I shall then know what to believe or fear."

As soon as Sir Nicholas had bowed himself out of the closet of the speaker, her grace turned towards Cecil, and demanded if she had not acted wisely.

"Admirably, madam!" was the reply; "and this prudence argues well for your future reign. I nothing doubt but that the intelligence is correct; for three days since I knew that it was the opinion of the late queen's physicians that her majesty could not last more than eight-and-forty hours."

"'Tis possible they may have been deceived!" replied his royal mistress; "and experience warns us not to trifle in matters of such moment."

The ladies, who had been dismissed during the preceding interview, were summoned back to the royal closet—curiosity and expectation were in the countenances of all. Elizabeth received them as if nothing uncommon had occurred.

"She is queen!" whispered one; "see how her cheek and brow are flushed!"

"Her eye is troubled!" observed a second; "perhaps her sister has recovered!" A supposition which was anything but welcome to those present.

That same evening the princess retired to rest, after supping, at her usual hour.

Early the following day a deputation from the privy council arrived at Hatfield, to offer their homage to her as their rightful sovereign. There was no longer room for doubt or mistrust. The long-persecuted daughter of Anne Boleyn fell upon her knees, and, whilst the hall resounded with shouts of

"God save Queen Elizabeth!"

Her lips murmured in reply:

"O Domino factum est illud, et est mirabile in oculis nostris!"

"It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes!"

For several days the new sovereign remained in retirement at Hatfield House, although, from the hour her accession was officially announced to her, she entered at once upon the duties of her queenly office.

ESSAYS.

No. CXC.—POPULAR SONGS.

IN our verdant and halcyon youth, when passing through a secluded street in a provincial town, we often paused in a perfect stupor of amazement before a sturdy figure in tattered naval habiliments and with a wooden leg. Such a volume of sound could only come from the lips of a tar. It was the sea-lion out of his element, growling and roaring in dismal cadence. As we listened to the portentous utterances, we sometimes gathered some obscure references to a battle or a storm, and a consequent shipwreck; but generally the uproar was meant in honour of the exploits of one "Bill Jones," "Off the coast of Guinea land." A cat with claws was alluded to, and then came the exhortation that in those days used to stir more hearts than young ones. It was:

Up, up, all hands, and die like men.
Command or death! Shout, shout hurrah!

This adjuration was invariably responded to by a shower of pence, for which the maimed tar would always say: "Bless your honours, may you never be on a lee shore, like poor Jack!"

Then there was a little romance in the entertainment which rendered it exciting—for who could refuse to pity the sorrows of a sailor who had fought and bled for his country; but after time had brushed the dew from many an early impression, we soon discovered that the tattered clothes, the wooden leg, and the man were all cheats—the eulogist of the mutinous Bill Jones had never been, as a modern song has it, but had rather been thrown on the shores of credulity by waves black as midnight, and teeming with every impurity. But we also made another and more gratifying discovery: the English people had a collection of popular songs which they prized highly, and considered the perfection of sentiment clothed in music. And as this light broke more brightly on our imagination, we unhesitatingly subscribed to the opinion of that shrewd Scotchman, when he declared that if he wished to rule a people body and soul, all he would require would be to be appointed sole maker of their songs. Within our own experience we have found this opinion amply sustained. The Chartist songs convulsed the empire, and the Corn-Law Rhymers created the furor that sustained the Anti-Corn-Law League in its operations. In the present day our song-writers are the greatest revolutionists that ever appeared in the country. Their emigration songs are absolutely undermining the foundations of British society. So that, as the mood suits, and the subject affords room for some good-natured criticism, we will, with our readers' permission, glance at a few of the characteristics of our popular songs. When the grim "Bill Jones" flourished in the jaws of a sea sailor, and gaping crowds were invited "to drain a bowl and shout hurrah!" to his manes, the style of the songs that were popular differed very widely from the majority of those now in circulation.

On the waves of the white-crested main;

We are referring to a period of fifteen years ago, and may as well explain that when we use the phrase "popular songs," we mean those songs that the people universally accepted—not to the classic music of the concert or opera. Well, fifteen years ago, or thereabouts, Dibdin had not been forgotten. All the men, from thirty upwards, exulted over the gallant deeds of our immortal naval heroes. Braham had made the "Death of Nelson" a household word; and almost every aspirant to musical honours attempted the "Bay of Biscay." The praises of "Harry Bluff" thrilled through the strong British heart:

In peace and in war Harry Bluff was the same;
So true to his love and in battle so brave!

There was no maudlin sentiment there; it was sterling homage to the thorough English seaman, and consistent with the character of the hero who, when the foe thought he had struck—

'Tried out avast!
And he did like a true British sailor!

Then there were "Wapping Old Stairs," and a score of others of the same class, but all breathing a sentiment of devotion, duty, or love. These naval songs are part of the history of England; and it would be folly on our part to say anything eulogistic of them, beyond indulging in the avowal that they always did, and we are certain always will, command our unbounded admiration.

The next class of compositions was not so numerous. The army had done mighty things, but the appreciation of them had not expanded into the enthusiasm which rewarded the deeds of Howe, Jervis, and Nelson. A nation can only have one love. With England that was the navy, and it sufficiently accounts for the paucity of the musical honours paid to the army. But the army has been unfortunate—it never had a ballad writer. The compositions that obtained any popularity were not of English growth. The modern song, "The Standard Bearer," is frightfully lackadaisical. It is the song of a love-sick minstrel—not a warrior. Yet its extensive popularity shows that if the British army had been blessed with a Dibdin, we should in this day have had a collection of military songs unrivalled for breadth, spirit-stirring energy, and pathos. Nevertheless, at the time to which we have referred, the "British Grenadiers" always obtained applause, and that celebrated monody on the death of Sir John Moore, which commences so beautifully—

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corse to the rampart we hurried—when well recited, was sure to draw tears from other eyes than those of beauty. "The Soldier's Tear" was also very popular; it is so still with ladies in whom early associations have not all been drowned in the cares of wedded life. The "Dashing White Sergeant" was also an immense favourite.

If I had a bean for a soldier would go,
Do you think I'd say no? Oh, no, not I!

The archness and vivacity of this composition are still appreciated; but to be well sung, the lady should be young, pretty, spirited, piquant, and—dare we say it—should never have sung—

When I heard he was married!
When I heard he was married!

The love songs of sterling merit that in that day ngered in the public esteem, were nearly all Irish, Scotch, and Welch; but "Sally in our Alley" had not yet been banished, although "Meet me by moonlight" had, for sentimental lovers, rendered the orb of night more popular than that of day. It is a sure sign of mental decay, when poets place the grand passion under the cold rays of the moon, instead of the bright ones of the glorious, life-giving sun. Commend us to the taste of Burns, in his

Oh, my love is like the red, red rose,
That's newly sprung in June—

not to his moonlight rambles. The moon is not half so just to either party as the sun.

Among the graver songs were, "The Mistletoe Bough," "The Brave Old Oak," "The Old House at Home," &c. Glee were also in fashion, and we have frequently heard the compositions of Purcell, Calcott, Arnold, and Handel excellently sung by working men in the large towns in Lancashire. As to the comic songs, we never admired them; for we never could see in what respect they were entitled to be called comic. Their humour consisted, and still consists, in coarse allusions; but they were not so degrading then as they are now. That vile parody on Shakespeare's "Seven Ages of Man," which concludes with an unmeaning, ridiculous chorus of

Hey down, ho down, derry, derry down, was about an average specimen of the kind of comedy in song tolerated by the fast young men and women of fifteen years ago. And when we mention that the melodies of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales were at that time all in high repute, we think we have given a pretty clear description of the popular taste of the fathers, mothers, and old bachelors of the present generation.

Fifteen years is not a very great gap in Time; but it is wide enough to be the grave of smooth foreheads, peachy cheeks, bright eyes, and young hopes; and we sincerely regret that it has been so capacious as to have swallowed up the last vestige of the manly tone, the delicacy, sincerity, and purity of the ballads of England. The songs of fifteen years ago had the merit of being vigorous and unaffected. They were loyal to the best emotions of the heart. If they did sometimes pander to the worst passions, they did it so offensively that they disgusted even the vicious; and it should be observed, as a palliating circumstance, that they always apologised for their wickedness. This is not the case in the present day. Vice stalks forth unblushingly.

But not to anticipate. Ballad-writing has degenerated within the last fifteen years. When the English opera was banished from the stage, a mountebank Yankee usurped the vacant throne. Instead of "Love in a Village," we obtained "Jim Crow!" The antics of a nigger obtained the applauses which had previously been showered on a Stephens, a Paton, and a Braham. Other novelties succeeded—novelties!—heaven preserve society, when the effusions of emasculation are welcomed as inventions—we say other novelties succeeded; and among them, that execrable drama, "Jack Sheppard," with its invitation to thieve—"Nix my dolly, pals, fake away!" This translation of a Spanish gipsy song very soon became, as theatrical managers express themselves, "quite the rage." The negro melodies multiplied—the comic trash grew more profane—the sentimental nonsense more dismal and puling—and, as the sound, manly and womanly-hearted English drama and opera declined, the present class of popular songs crept into public favour.

Let us see what they are. The task is not very difficult. We dived into a dark shop the other day, and for sixpence obtained some two or three hundred "Songs of the Million," and after wasting upon them a precious hour, were enabled to ascertain that they ranged themselves under no less than six distinct heads—viz: The Sentimental Song, the Comic Song, the Emigration Song, the Public-house Song, the Street Song, and the Song of the Drunkard and the Profligate.

The latter class of songs is so abominable, that a bare recapitulation of them would sully our pages. The most licentious ages of Greece and Rome never produced such shocking abominations—such devilish perversions of modesty—such blasphemous outrages on human nature, law, order, and morality. And yet they are openly sung by bacchanals to bacchanals in concert-rooms licensed by magistrates, and in taverns kept open all night—where youth and age meet to "drain the flowing bowl" of maddening liquor, strengthened by copious draughts of festering depravity. We dare not proceed further, but must express our surprise at the young men of this day—the young men who have grown up under the most beneficent dispensation ever accorded to mankind—we say, we are surprised, astonished, and grieved, that young men, so well educated, so clever, and so energetic, should lend their countenance to these disgusting haunts of infamy. Cannot they exhaust their exuberant spirits in clearer places, or on meritorious objects! Why the prize-ring is a respectable place compared to the filthy concert-rooms. A manly set-to with the gloves braces the nerves and hardens the muscles. Three hours in a stifling concert-room, drinking British brandy, and giggling at the obscenities of a greasy-faced satyr in a white neckcloth, is as good as ten nails in a man's coffin. Thank Providence the young women do not, in any number, frequent these hells. Some proprietors, out of sheer shame do not admit human beings in petticoats and bonnets. We cannot call those of the sex who do go women—but others do, and the consequences to these unfortunates and society may be imagined.

But this will not bear examination, and we gladly pass on to the Street Song. Alas—alas! how quick this world of ours turns round! Everything keeps moving on until it goes quite out of sight.

The sham sailor and "Bill Jones" are no more. The wooden leg that in days of yore moved many a heart, has been chopped up for firewood. Even the sham weavers have been extinguished. We never now see a man in shirt sleeves and a white apron, with a tidy woman and three ravenous-looking children—castaways in this happy land; gipsy brats, like the deceased Bill Jones's commander, "fearing not heaven nor the other place"—we say, we never now hear this band of impoverished peripatetics warbling:

We're all the way from Manchester,
And we have got no work to do.
No work to do!

No—"they are gone from our gaze!" The new police—an excellent body—have made them move on, as honest people do, without being requested. But the vagabond fraternity survives. They haunt poor neighbourhoods, and in the dusky eve one of them may be detected in a suit of rusty black, and a pale, gin-soddened face, thrilling the hearts of sensitive servant-girls with that chivalrous modern ballad—

I'll not beguile thee from thy home,
For me thou shalt not friends resign:
[This line is given with magnanimous energy.]
Or exiled from thy kindred room,
In poverty and grief to pine.

Oh, no, no, no!

Too dearly do I love thee!

[Immense pathos, and the cook in tears.]

Three sixpences are rained from as many top windows, and the interesting rascal, after paying a casual visit to an adjoining temple of "blue ruin," glides, thief-like, into another back street, and the same farce is repeated. But the Street Song—the veritable appeal to "kind Christian friends"—has been ignored. The police have voted it a nuisance, and the performance is only casual, and conducted in bye-places, which the police have no instructions to remonstrate.

Not so with the Public-house Song. It flourishes amazingly. We do not mean the song of the salaried singer in a concert-room—but the harmony of friends, who cordially agree with a modern song-writer, that

A glass is good, and a lass is good,
And a pipe is good in cold weather;
The world is good, and the people are good,
And we are all good fellows together!

In these pipe-and-glass coteries, "The Bay of Biscay" and "The Death of Nelson" are still patronised—but only by the "heavies"—the "steady flics"—the men who clear off the week's score as punctually as the brewer's agent calls for cash for divers barrels of "heavy." Heavy, indeed! for it weighs down whole families, and whole streets of families. The strong man sinks under it; the weak woman wallows in its inky streams; the neglected, unwashed children, having nothing better to do, live on it, shrieking for bread. Bah! This is not the age of sentiment. That went out long ago. No doubt the new police ordered it to "move on!"

But the public-house song is generally convivial. Only hear a dozen rough voices, under the inspiration of "heavy," chorusing

Oh, vive l'amour, cigars and cognac,
Hurra—hurra—hurra—burrah!
With these we'll bivaouac!
Hurra, hurra—with these we'll bivaouac!
Hurra, hurra—with these we'll bivaouac!

and then fancy, if you can, that this is the age of mechanics' institutions, free libraries, cheap literature, railways, steam navigation, and electric telegraphs!

The shrewd Scotchman was right when he said he could lead a people by their songs; but he omitted to add which way. Now we think the songs in vogue at present are leading the people the wrong way; and we invite the attention of every discriminating mind to the character of the selections from our investment of sixpence, culled con amore; and as anybody can do the same by taking the same trouble, we shall not be charged with any prejudice in the matter. Read the comic songs of the day. What trash! You must find the fun—the point, as it is called—just as Sancho Panza attempted to find a pea in his pea-soup! Par exemple. The scene of the following is supposed to be a London eating-house; and thus, to the tune of "The Miseries of a Lord Mayor," the ballad-monger doles forth his jokes:

Let travellers boast of, and try to make most of Far countries, their dishes, their exquisite feed;
For good accommodation—oh, England's the nation,
Where rhino can buy everything that you need.
This city of wonder, boasts trades out of number,
No matter the line, altogether they souze;
So just give attention, and quickly I'll mention
The humorous calls of a slap eating house!

SPOKEN: Waiter! waiter! Coming, sir, coming. What is your bill of fare to-day, eh? Beef, roast and boiled, pork, veal, mutton, ham, greens, spinach, and potatoes. Oh, is that all—well, bring me a penny worth of pudding. I say, Bill, that's a strong order—I suppose he is living on his means. I means to say, sir, you are an insulting puppy! Order, order—lay down. Waiter, where is the mutton I ordered? You have eat it, sir. Eat it—nonsense. Fact, sir—I saw you devouring it. Eh—it's all owing to my absence of mind. Waiter, let's have a pint of heavy. Yes, sir, but I hope you will think light of it if I ask you for the tip first. What do you mean, sirrah? Why, sir, it is a rule to pay the money first for liquor. Oh, then, as there is no rule without an exception, I shall resist that early demand. Hello! he! you haven't paid your score. Why the fact is, I just found I was low in the exchequer, and was running home for the cash. That is very fine, but it don't do here, cos I'm low in my prices, so tip. Then, poetically speaking, I must leave

My pocket bandanna,
For I'm minus a tanner.

Well, I have no objection to a crown's worth of silk for a sixpenny plate. Waiter, a go of wool here. Yes, sir—but you must not reveal such language here—recollect you are not at Cann's. What do you mean, old Licklish—do you want to injure my feelings? No, by no means whatsoever howsumdever. I say, Portkake, what d'ye ax for that 'ere plate of trimmings? Three-pence to you. You don't ax enough—won't you take fourpence? So all the day long, sirs, things right and things wrong, sirs, You must always expect in a grubbery house.

And this vulgar balderdash is called comic, and the author's name is duly paraded—and fools grin at it, stamp their feet, and cry "Bravo!" Then there are the senseless "nigger" melodies—the unmistakable productions of the school which introduced "Jim Crow," and enabled long-legged T. D. Rice to make a fortune by cutting capers for half an hour before the footlights. First, we have "Who's dat knocking at de door?"—a lame and impotent description of a negro hall. Then there is "Uncle Ned." Uncle Tom must have been his nephew—for we are told he died on a cold frosty morning, in the odour of sanctity, and forthwith everybody is earnestly requested to Hand up the shovel and the hoe—

Lay down the fiddle and the bow:
There's no more work for poor old Ned—
He's gone where the good niggers go.

Where is the pathos here? A nigger is a nigger, and a white man is a white man—and no more can be made of either; and why all this bald sentiment over the decease of a black, who, in intelligence, was not far removed from an ape. As well might an old lady go into hysterics at the death of the nasty cur she had so tenderly nursed. Blacks are pets just now. There was a time when every lady of fashion had her black footman. Are we to have it again? But the mania must die out—and the sooner the better; for snivelling will never break the chain that holds the black race in bondage to the white man. When the black man at home, in the plains and valleys of Africa, acquires a knowledge and appreciation of freedom and the usages of civilisation—then, and not till then, will the black man abroad—whatever may be his condition—be placed upon an equality with the white man.

After the negro songs, both serious and comic, we come to our sentimental songs. And what in the name of common sense are they? Chiefly about love: they show love to be the most treacherous, the most unforgiving and unnatural of passions. The "Write to me," and "Yes, I will write to thee!" are painfully lackadaisical. Contrast the promise in the latter with what Burns wrote on the subject:

But fare thee weel, my only love,
And fare thee weel awhile;
And I will come again, my dear,
Though 'twere ten thousand mile; and then say whether song-writing has not degenerated. Again we have "Will you love me then as now?"—the flimsiest of flimsy—and the "Beautiful maid of my soul," in which the despairing lover exclaims that he has often met her "On the waves of the white-crested main." Rather insecure footing, even for a pair of desperate lovers. But all modern love songs are of the same stamp. The lover in these songs, instead of following up the pursuit, sits down in a corner and cries, "Thou art gone from my gaze like a beautiful dream," or raves about "Seeing her dancing in the hall, and heeding him not." That certainly is snivelling run to seed. Again—if we come to those of a more pretentious class, we are presented to "My Beautiful Rhine," which ends with a "dori-o dori-o"—a sort of wild Indian whoop, or something between an Irish howl and a maniac's shriek. The "Shells of the Ocean" and "Let us be happy together," breathe a better tone, but they want vigour and breadth of purpose. They fail to make a deep impression on the heart. Being superficial, they only provoke temporary emotions. And the same may be said of all the modern English ballads. Slight in texture, they are only intended, like a cheap garment, to last for a season. The songs of Henry Russell may be an exception; but when he has gone, nobody will interpose, and entreat even his tree to be spared. The emigration songs have a more practical character. "I'm Sitting on the stile, Mary," is pathetic, and "Cheer boys, cheer," has some vigour in it—but its popularity will not endure. Written to stimulate emigration, when the emigration mania is over it will be laid on the shelf, and speedily be forgotten. Indeed, the same fate awaits all the modern songs; and in drawing attention to their lightness, their gossamer, thread-like texture, we must avow the conviction that productions so ephemeral in their character must operate mischievously. They popularise opinions that had better be suffered to die in quietness—padding to morbid idiosyncrasies—and, as in the instance of the emigration songs, unsettle the habits of our industrial population—and so materially disturb the harmony of our social structure. The melancholy by which the gravest are tinged is atheistical. It destroys confidence in the future, and, by thus blighting hope—the soul of all human energy—ill prepares those who lamely submit to adverse circumstances—those who whine when they should work—either for the exigencies of the future in this world, or a proper frame of mind for concluding the last scene of all with dignity and composure.

SCENE IN A BUDDHIST TEMPLE IN CHINA.

At midnight I was awoken by the deep booming of the large drum, like subterranean thunder; and knowing there was a midnight mass, I put on my slippers and followed the sound, which proceeded from the lower temple. Entering by one of the side-doors, I took my place in the back-ground, where, unseen, I could perceive the ceremonial by the dim light of the altar, which just allowed one or two of the nearest idols to be visible, and cast pencils of light into the broad shadow of the temple, most parts of which were buried in gloom. The deep, hollow, but not loud roll of the huge drum, was answered by a gong from a distant part of the temple; the strange clanging serving at the same time to awaken the attention of the gods and to call together the worshippers.

There was the very essence of melodrama in the tone of the instruments, the gloom of the building, and the imperfectly seen monsters who lowered over the scene. Silently as spectres, from the dark aisles the yellow-robed priests glided in, some prostrating themselves, others standing with statue-like immobility, with clasped hands, and eyes bent to the ground. There was a silvery tinkle from a bell, and a chant ascended from all parts of the building, two or three hundred priests at the same time approaching the altar, and standing in an attitude of reverence. The chant swelled and subsided as the drum and gong monotonously tolled, and two hollow-sounding wooden instruments, shaped like the human cranium, were struck with sticks, to mark time. The chant ceased or varied at intervals, the priests rising and prostrating themselves, advancing to the altar in parallel lines, or in procession, till the service was completed. A more awe-inspiring scene I have seldom witnessed; and I should scarcely at the time have been surprised to hear the god answer in thunders, like an ancient oracle, to the fervent but fantastic appeal of his adorers.

It is a great misfortune that we have so little information regarding the motives of the priests and worshippers, their habits and mode of thought, the meaning of their peculiar ceremonies, and the attributes of their numerous deities. I have vainly endeavoured to obtain information: most of the Europeans I have met with seemed to be as ignorant on the subject as myself.

The Chinese themselves are incapable, generally, from their ignorance, and most of the priests know as little as the laymen—reciting prayers mechanically in Pali—a dialect of the Sanscrit—a language of which they do not understand one word; going through ceremonies with a punctilious devotion, without comprehending their object, and spending a whole life in mortification and penance, for they know not what. Great magical powers are ascribed to the adepts in Buddhism by the vulgar; and many of the priests have a reputation for necromancy—for the knowledge that could compel the services of invisible spirits—and for the power of ubiquity. This, however, is pretty much confined to the vulgar; the priests having no power in the state, and but little moral influence of any kind. Their religion, in fact, appears to be only used for superstitious purposes, and for worldly objects. No Chinaman addresses a god for any purpose but the good of his body—to propitiate any mischievous intention regarding his property—to avert sickness—and to protect him from magic, and all unknown or unseen dangers.—Power's Recollections of China.

UNCLE TOM'S COMPANIONS, A SUPPLEMENT TO UNCLE TOM'S CABIN. By J. Passmore Edwards. E. Farrington, 2 Bath Street, Newgate Street.

This book takes rank with Mrs. Stowe's latest production, 'The Key' to her remarkable revelations of the horrors of negro slavery. Its contents not only prove that—

Woolly locks and dark complexion
Cannot alter nature's claim;
Skine may differ, but affection
Dwells in white and black the same—but tend to stimulate the Christian sentiment against the unnatural ostracism to which so vast a number of our poor black fellow-creatures are degraded. It is a volume of facts, well digested, well written, and cannot fail to do good service to the sacred cause of liberty and civilisation, for the dark as well as the fair man.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. E. R.—The amount of the rent has nothing to do with the character of the tenantry. Having taken the house under a verbal agreement, and paying the rent quarterly, makes you a yearly tenant.

W. R. Y.—A yeomanry regiment may be compelled to do duty in any part of the United Kingdom. That is one of the conditions under which the yeomanry cavalry are allowed to assemble in military array.

ST. CLAIR.—There is no history of Russia. There are many works extant purporting to be histories of that country, but they are entitled to as much credit as the 'Lives of the Saints,' or 'Robinson Crusoe.' Up to the commencement of the seventeenth century Russia, had no literature, no science, no civilisation. She was in a lower condition than England was under the Heptarchy.

TROUBLESOME.—The Chinese Junk was brought to this country as a speculation. It was exhibited at New York before it arrived in the Thames.

WILL SIDELER.—Calling a man a swindler is a libel—but in an action to recover damages to carry costs, special injury must be proved. As all such vulgarities tend to a breach of the peace, the utterer may be summoned before a magistrate and bound over, &c.

JO.—The frock coat is a part of the undress costume. Gentlemen who go to balls should be in full or evening dress—namely: black body coat, white vest and cravat, and black trousers. Light boots are allowed.

MARK WILD.—We stated the law correctly. We said that "Cousins, according to the law of England, being strangers in affinity, a legacy from one to the other is chargeable with a duty of ten per cent." Your quotation from the Stamp Laws—viz.: "To brothers and sisters of the father or mother of the deceased, and their descendants, five per cent." refers to legacies to a brother, a sister, or a cousin—not from a cousin to a cousin.

A LADY.—The patronage of her Majesty can only be obtained by transmitting full particulars of the book or proposal to the Lord Chamberlain. For a concert, the names of all the parties engaged in it, both as promoters and performers, the place of meeting, the prices of admission, &c., should be sent.

A. Z.—To dry straw and chip bonnets black: Boil them in strong logwood liquor three or four hours, occasionally adding copperas, and taking the bonnets out to cool in the air—and this must be continued for some hours. Let the bonnets remain in the liquor all night, and the next morning take them out, dry them in the air, and brush them with a soft brush. Lastly, rub them inside and out with a sponge moistened with oil, and then send them to be blocked.

ADAM GORDON.—We dislike what are called politics. Real politics is not yet a science. What are called politics are purely ephemeral—"They come like shadows, and so depart." The fall and rise of administrations are events of limited importance, and have very little practical influence on the present and future condition of the country. Yet it is these politics—or, in other words, squabbles and contentions for power in the state—that mostly engage the pens and support a vast army of writers, who, in a moral sense, are no better than mercenaries—for editors, like barristers, advocate the cause for which they were first retained. We being without the pale of politics, have nothing to do with this literary profligacy. Writing for and to the people, whenever we have had the opportunity, we have always elected to refer to vital questions rather than to abstract ones—to facts, not to fictions, or the dogmas of the economists; in a word, to the politics that arise out of the present and create the future condition of the country.

SAMUEL JONES asks us whether we think emigration weakens the love we ought to feel for our native land. We reply, that it totally destroys it. Respect is not love. And what feeling can a man have for the land of his birth, when he leaves it under the conviction that that country is his home in which he can procure a living? We ought not to quarrel with such a sentiment, if suggested by stern necessity; but as emigration under present influences is more a mania than a necessity, we must indulge in the regret that the foundation of all patriotism is being undermined by mercenary desires to get rich in a hurry. Love of country is the preliminary of all the other affections. It is the first step taken towards civilisation, because it is an indication of a settled industrious population. Gipsies love no land in particular, and what are they? The vagabond Arabs of Europe. And as it takes many generations to create and solidify the affection which, under a national aspect, includes love for 'The Old House at Home,' the roof-tree of ancestors, and the cosy fire-side round which the blessed domestic virtues are gathered, those who endeavour to weaken the hallowed parting incur a fearful responsibility. It is easier to destroy than build.

J. MARTIN.—Gold is only a medium. It is not wealth, per se; and we must say we incline to the doctrine of Hume, "that an influx of the precious metals gives great encouragement to industry during the interval which elapses before the prices of commodities are adjusted to the increased quantity of specie." This is a wise remark, for it is in the nature of money—whether as gold, silver, or any other medium—to be drawn into contracted channels. The result of the recent discoveries in California and Australia will be that England will become enormously rich, but the mass of the people will not be largely benefited. Indeed, we think the more gold there comes, the more will the rich become richer, while the poor, with swelled ranks, will remain poor, and the adjustment of the conflicting claims of labour and wealth, so earnestly desired by every profound statesman and practical philanthropist, be adjourned sine die. The laissez-faire principle will of course achieve another triumph, but it will be at the expense of the emancipation of the national sentiment as regards industry and the plodding pursuits that lead to wealth. It is the duty of a country to get wealth, but gold alone is not wealth. The products of industry are wealth, and gold is an excellent medium for their diffusion. At present this is lost sight of, and all prudential considerations are drowned in an insatiable, fevered avarice.

M. H.—You do not comprehend the true meaning of the terms speculators and speculation. The men of steady business habits lay deep and securely the foundations of success; but it is the men of suggestion and enterprise that improve upon and extend that success. Speculators, as they are termed, are the men who enlarge and create markets for industry. Knowing best how to employ time, capital, and ability, they seek out and explore new fields of industry. They study well the value of money. They know that £1000 turned over every four months, at 10 per cent. profit, will amount, in six years, to £5559 18s. 4d. And knowing this, they embark in speculations which look wild to the dull and uninitiated, but which really are based on sound calculations, and are to the wide realm of industry what a lively circulation of the blood is to the system. They serve to brace the nerves of the empire, as well as point out to its people new spheres of action, new enterprises, new engagements: and so prevent the whole mass from becoming torpid, or falling into that unequivocal symptom of decline, a state of indolence, the result, too, of safety, or too implicit a reliance on the laissez-faire principle. To this class the country has been indebted for those extensions of the national commerce which have occurred during the past forty years—for the adoption of those improvements and inventions in the arts and sciences, which, within the same period, have been turned to profitable purposes—and, above all, for railways, and ocean steam navigation.

LOUIS.—The last war with France was not altogether caused by political differences. The jealousies and exigencies which arise out of commerce had a great deal to do in provoking it. Commerce instinctively dreads physical force. France at that period was not a commercial country, because it did not respect commerce; and, disdaining a commercial friendship with England, and detesting and thwarting England whenever it could—in the American war, for instance—made England one of its bitterest enemies. Old grudges exasperated the mutual dislike; and, consequently, when France took Europe by storm, it was only natural that England—quite as much in defence of its commerce as for the maintenance of the balance of power as determined by treaties—should take arms and use its utmost efforts to drive back and confine France within its ancient boundaries. With such an animus on both sides, the contest that ensued was inevitable. It came. English gold and English valour fought France to retreat upon herself; and with the concluding battle at Waterloo, France received a signal chastisement, and a glorious opportunity of developing its industrial and mechanical energy. The principles of peace were vindicated, and a new era in the condition of society inaugurated. Europe, weary of the din of arms, and half-blinded by the smoke of battle, paused awhile to recruit its exhausted strength; and when quite refreshed, prepared itself for the reception of a new order of things, new modes of action, new thoughts, new impulses, and new and more practical tendencies.

LUKE.—The conversion of the Chinese to Christianity would be no small matter. The Nestorians, in the fifth century, penetrated into those remote regions, and established a church in Northern China, which endured through eight centuries; and it is supposed only fell at last through the machinations of the Jesuits. Buddhism, in its external forms, bears an extraordinary resemblance to Christianity. And we may mention, that its introduction into China is not so ancient as is generally imagined. It was in the first century of our era that this revolution occurred. In one form or another it is the religion of all the East. The principal idol in Thibet is Muha-Mooney, or the Great Philosopher; in Burmah it is Guadma; in Japan, Amida Buti; in China, Fohe—all representatives of the same personage. But Buddhism, like every other religion that has existed, has been corrupted by gross idolatries. The original Buddha was no doubt a religious reformer, like Manes, Zoroaster, Mohammed, Luther, &c. He began to preach about 2700. After his death he was deified, just as the Pope, years ago, manufactured saints. The principal tenet of the religion is the substitution of an incarnation of the divine energy, in some deified hero or sage, for the Creator of all things. The Buddhists believe that there is one God, but so completely abstract in his essence, that he is not the object either of worship, or hope, or fear—that he is even destitute of intelligence, and remains in a state of profound repose, except at times when, united to energy, he becomes possessed of volition, and creates worlds. Here is good solid ground to work upon—for, as the Chinese accept the doctrine of incarnations, the idea of the principle of Christianity would not be repugnant to their capacities or religious tendencies. Indeed, there is every prospect of China being Christianised, and its gates thrown open to the world. The leaders of the rebellion now raging in the heart of that vast and obscure empire, have proclaimed Jesus Christ as their chief apostle—or, as Buddhists phrase it, the incarnation of the Deity.

A CREDITOR.—Imprisonment for debt was an invention of the Romans. Among the Jews, in case the debt was not paid, the creditor might first seize the hereditary land of the debtor, and enjoy its produce until the debt was discharged, or at least until the year of jubilee; secondly, his houses, and thirdly, in case the houses and land were not sufficient to cancel the debt, or if it so happened that the debtor had no property of the kind, the person of the debtor might be sold, together with his wife and children, if he had any. His cattle and furniture were also, of course, liable for his debts; but in no instance do we ever find that it was allowed to incarcerate a debtor within four stone walls—and so have utterly denied him the slightest chance of redemption. No; he was told that he might purchase his liberty by his industry and economy. His labour was recognised as property, and although every form of slavery is repugnant to modern sense of right, it must be conceded that, in their treatment of poor debtors, the "eye for an eye and the tooth for a tooth" doctrine was more humane than that adopted in subsequent ages. They did not utterly crush the debtor, or shut out from him every prospect of relief; but allowed every insolvent to serve for a period, the duration of which was under his control, either to repair his misfortunes or amend his errors.

FIDELMENT writes a curious letter. She informs us that her "papa does his duty towards God and man, but she feels sad—very sad—in being truthfully compelled to say, he believes in witchcraft, fortune-telling, &c.; and, were one of the family to be ill without any apparent cause, he would at once attribute it to an 'evil wish' of some wicked person, and fly to a planet-ruler, for advice and direction. She often tells her father that all this is both sinful and untrue; but he maintains that the Evil One has agents on earth, and that we must apply to astrologers to counteract such agency." Of course his daughter is too shrewd to believe in such nonsense, but her father's credulity annoys and distresses her. No wonder—for not only is he the dupe of his own imagination, but of the greatest vagabonds and impostors to be met with. His pocket may suffer now, but the mischief may arise after his death. Supposing his will were to be disputed on the ground of insanity. Why, his whole estate might be frittered away in litigation, and his children left beggars. Our correspondent must reason with her father, and tell him that his conduct savours strongly of infidelity. Providence does not work out its ends by means of cheats and deceptions. But she must do her spitting gently, for such pagan superstitions are generally deeply rooted. Her first plan would be to place a few of the popular exposés of witchcraft and magic in his hands.

DEAD HEART.—Who can minister to a mind diseased? You are labouring under a morbid affection. Your grief for the loss of your mother is natural—but may it not be excessive? It must be, when you talk about retiring to a nunnery. Such weakness is flying in the face of Providence. Turning nun is about as bad as being a suicide. Houses of detention are for criminals and lunatics—not for people in the full consciousness and habit of rectitude and the enjoyment of health. Time will soften your sorrow. As the months glide away, the angel face of your mother will become to your imagination more spiritualised, and you will begin to think of her as one not here, but gone where you will begin to go when the hour comes, and the grimy phantom wills it. We should advise you to occupy your mind with some study, go frequently into society, and, if possible, spend the summer among friends at a distance or by the sea-side.

H. B.—In denouncing one corporation, you have made the mistake of including the reformed in your sweeping category. Your appreciative power is defective, and we must inform you that the corporations of England rank among the earliest and best of our national institutions. They are entitled to a large measure of credit, for their share in the gradual formation of the national character. In every age they were the great assertors of the independence of the subject, the founders of cities and boroughs, where industry and the useful arts found shelter and encouragement, and the people gently weaned from the savage pursuits of war. From the twelfth to the close of the seventeenth century, they may be said to have been the cradles of political freedom. Since that period, up to so late as 1835, they had degenerated from their primitive character, and become nests of speculation and corruption. The Municipal Reform Act, except in one flagrant instance, remedied all that, by placing all corporate affairs more directly under the supervision of the constituencies in our cities and boroughs. The single exception was that of the city of London, the mismanagement of whose affairs is so notorious, that, as at present constituted, it is a scandal and disgrace to the whole country.

H. S. M.—Government does not voluntarily establish Schools of Design. The plan on which the "governmental department of practical art" proceeds, is not the initiatory, but the co-operative. There must first be shown a desire, and a need felt for a school of drawing in a locality. Then there must be a committee of gentlemen, able to direct and control, and willing to devote their time and attention—to see to the proper and effective carrying out of the undertaking—to be responsible for the providing of suitable premises, with all the necessary fittings, gas, benches, &c., and other conveniences—or a private individual, fulfilling these same conditions. Then the government provide a master, and guarantee his salary, conditionally that the half receipts of pupils go towards the re-payment of that salary—the other half towards the expenses of the establishment. Costs and examples to students from abroad are also supplied at half their cost—thus meeting the matter half way—so guaranteeing an interest in the proper maintenance of the schools. On this principle, the institution in Wilmingdon Square, of which we have given an engraved illustration, was established. So that the government only contribute towards, instead of bearing all the expense of these schools.

BARTON.—Every inhabitant of a country, not being a criminal or pauper, has an interest at stake in that country; and of necessity should contribute towards its maintenance and security. The difficulty is, how and in what proportion that contribution shall be exacted. Shall the many, whose means are humble, pay the most—or the few, whose means are ample? Indirect taxation, being essentially on articles of general commerce and consumption, must necessarily be borne by the many; but direct taxation, which would seize on permanent and steadier sources, would fall on the vested interests and accumulations—consequently would have to be borne by the few. Now, it has always been the opinion of sound economists, that taxes should be levied on property—and as labour is property, of course it would have to be equitably assessed. But the most obvious property would of necessity be the first to be rated—and properly so: for in reality it is merely the representative of the labour, and the accumulations of the whole community. Land being the most permanent, and, from the labour bestowed on it, the most valuable property of the nation, should be the first to be taxed: therefore it has been held, that as a land-tax is the most ancient, so it is the most just of all taxes. By the same rule, a house-tax would be just; so would a tax on domestic animals, on carriages, on joint-stock companies—even a poll-tax would be justifiable. But so long as the principle of taxation remains unsettled, and revenue is collected indiscriminately from every conceivable source, the true theory of direct taxation cannot be established. It must always clash with, contradict, and render indirect taxation more inconsistent and odious.

A. G. (Coventry).—The heart of this empire is not sound. In the church, the law, and politics, there are fierce and bitter dissensions, and their consequent resentments. Our materiality is also chronically affected. Ireland is being rapidly deserted—the last days of its Celtic population are close at hand, unless its landlords borrow an idea from the Chinese, and ask the legislature to prohibit emigration, except under stringent conditions. And England, notwithstanding its amazing prosperity, has still its two millions of paupers, its half a million of vagrants, its bands of thieves, its countless masses of uneducated men, women, and children, its bigotry, its sectarian broils, its senseless political animosities, its endless conflicting claims, its rampant selfishness: These are heavy set-offs against the gold-fever and the glories of free-trade, and ought to convince us that, as a nation, we are only in the beginning. The end is in the dark, threatening future; but if the beginning is only permanently to advantage the few, it will not require any extraordinary powers of vaticination to perceive some glimpses of the end.

[HENRY ASHTON AND ELLEN IN THE RECTORY GARDEN.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER CXV.

And looking into eyes where, blue
And beautiful, like skies seen through
The sleeping wave, for me there shone
A heaven more worshipped than my own.
MOORE'S LOVES OF THE ANGELS.

THOSE who have loved—and dull indeed has their existence been who have never experienced the absorbing, elevating passion—will imagine far better than we can describe the joy of Henry Ashton, at once more pouring forth his gushing feelings, the melodies of the young heart, into the willing ear of Ellen. The past—the cruel past—which had so severely tried them, appeared like some hideous dream—a cloud which for a moment had obscured the horizon of their happiness, then left it bright again. What brilliant prospects of the future did he not draw, as, with his arm encircling her yielding waist, they wandered once more, side by side, in the rectory garden.

As the tender flower whose delicate leaves have been weighed down by the dank dews of night, expands again at the first kiss of morning, so did the soul of the long-persecuted girl shake off the icy feeling—the dark forebodings and hopeless agony—which had oppressed it. So perfect did her present joy appear by the contrast, that more than once she mentally asked herself if it were real, and raised her timid glances till they encountered the ardent gaze of her lover, fixed upon her with manly pride and affection—a gaze which covered her still pale cheek with roseate blushes, or recalled to her lips

A smile as pure as e'er was given
By a soul redeemed, just winged for heaven.

If Ellen's heart tasted this deep, calm happiness—a happiness which virtue only knows—what were the transports of our hero? He felt like some captive who had passed hopeless years in a dark, solitary dungeon, restored to light and sunshine; or the shipwrecked mariner, who finds himself cast upon his native shore, in sight of home, wife, children, friends, instead of the bleak and unknown coast his terrors painted to him.

This feeling of happiness was not confined to the lovers alone. From the windows of the library, which overlooked the garden, the worthy rector saw and blessed them. Several times he rose from his great easy chair to assure himself the scene was real: it was the only recompense he required for his fatigues, and the interest he had taken in their welfare—his heart would not deny him that.

"She is speaking of her uncle," he said, as he observed his adopted son kiss a tear from the eye-lid of his ward. "If it is permitted to the dead to watch over those they love on the earth, how must his good and noble spirit rejoice at witnessing the happiness he has created!"

So saying, he took up a volume of divinity, and began to read. But it would not do: his thoughts insensibly wandered to the garden, and his eyes from the page of the erudite writer to the window from which the graceful forms of the lovers were visible. The sight of them was like a gleam of sunshine to his old heart.

Henry and Ellen had much to communicate to each other. They wept tears of tender admiration and regret at the death of the noble, devoted Walter Mowbray, whom our hero persisted in regarding as the lost heir of his benefactor: a conviction which was strengthened when they reflected on the coldness, the utter want of heart, which had existed between the gallant youth and the scheming, hollow man who styled himself his father. The supposition was not an unnatural or improbable one; for who, from such a stem, would look for such a flower.

"How proud his father would have been of him!" observed Henry, with a deep-drawn sigh. "He had the qualities to win the love of all who knew him. There is one fair girl," he added, "fair and good almost as yourself, to whom life is now a blank!"

He alluded to Therese Colonna.

"I shall never meet with such a friend again!" he continued, with a sigh.

"Not as gifted, perhaps—not blessed with a mind like his, which, pure and tranquil as the lake embosomed in some verdant dell, reflected back the image, the thoughts and feelings, the noble dreams and aspirations of your own nature, Henry!" answered the fair girl; "but one as true, as faithful, you at least possess!"

Her lover regarded her for an instant with an inquiring glance.

"Joe Beans—poor faithful Joe!" she added.

"True!" replied our hero. "I was ungrateful to forget him. He was the companion of my childhood, Ellen; the depository of my boyhood's thoughts and feelings. He is true as the impulse is to nature—but not like Walter. There was a refinement in his soul which polished all who came in contact with it!"

Whilst they were thus conversing, the honest rustic had been slowly approaching the house. His heart failed him at the sight of our hero, whom he began to look up to with a vague sentiment of respect and dread. The poor fellow felt that something, he knew not what, had drawn a yet stronger line of demarcation between them. He had lost his confidence in himself—their minds were no longer equal.

To do Henry Ashton justice, he did not perceive it.

As Joe approached the spot where the lovers were standing, they were both struck by the subdued and humble air of the poor fellow. It was like that of a faithful hound at fault, expecting to be chidden.

By a simultaneous movement they both extended their hands towards him, but the heart of Joe was too full to take them.

"I want to speak with thee, Master Harry, a bit," he said, at the same time doffing his cap, with rustic gallantry, to the young lady.

"In good time, Joe! we were just speaking of you and your fidelity!"

"Of me?" repeated his friend; and his eyes sparkled with delight at the thought of being remembered by them at such a moment—but instantly became clouded again, as he reflected that he was the bearer of what might possibly prove disagreeable intelligence.

"But I bea'n't faithful," he said; "I have broken trust!"

"Broken trust!" repeated our hero; "surely you have not suffered yourself to be prevailed on to release—no, no—I wrong you in entertaining such a supposition even for an instant! Your prisoner is —"

"Still in the belfry tower," interrupted the young man, at the same time giving him a look which in former days used to be a signal between them when planning some boyish frolic in presence of the worthy farmer and his dame. Henry understood it in an instant, and, after leading Ellen to a seat, he returned to the spot where the speaker was standing.

"Now, Joe," he said, "what has occurred?"

"Your rival, Master Harry, is dead!"

"Dead?"

"It wor all my fault—indeed it wor!" exclaimed the rustic. "Constable, sexton, Ralph and I watched him all night in the old tower—the night wor a rough one!"

"But the prisoner—the prisoner?" impatiently demanded our hero.

"The Indian woman came, and made such a piteous moaning, and looked so miserable, like—entreated in such humble words to be permitted to see her foster-son, I think she called him—that somehow I could not refuse her. The fault was all mine," he added; "every bit on it mine—so you must only blame me, Master Harry!"

"I do not blame you," replied his hearer, gravely; "though perhaps I ought to have expected more caution from you!"

"I was cautious," continued his friend; "before I let her into the tower, we searched her: not a knife, or cord, or any means of mischief could we discover; besides, we were present all the time they were together!"

"And yet you say he is dead?"

"Can't understand it," said Joe; "I neither saw blow nor weapon, and yet he is dead! The only mark is a small scratch upon his neck, which must have been made by the black devil's nail; for I can take my oath she had no instrument to do it with—not even a bodkin!"

Our hero suddenly recollected that the Otomac Indians often poison the thumb-nail with the juice of the ourari, the slightest scratch of which causes death. Raleigh, who mentions it, calls it ourari: from the experiments of Verehan and Munter, it would appear that it does not kill by mere external application, but only when absorbed by living animal substance, the continuity of which has been severed; neither does it belong to the class of tetanic poisons: its action destroys the muscular power, and so causes death, although the involuntary function of the heart still continues.

Like most women of the East, he knew the ayah to be well skilled in poisons, and doubted not but he had rightly guessed the means she had employed to save her foster-son from an ignominious death.

"Heaven forbid, Joe," he said, extending his hand, "that I should blame you for listening to the pleadings of humanity—the voice of your own heart! No precautions could have prevented—no knowledge, such as you possess, could have forewarned you: he is dead, the memory of his evil deeds dies with him!"

"And you forgive me?"

"I have nothing to forgive—human resentment ceases at the grave!"

These few words restored Joe Beans to his self-respect, and removed a weight from off his heart: never in his life had his intelligence been so completely at fault as in the death of Meeran Hafaz. In his simplicity he was inclined to attribute it to magic.

"And does thee understand it, Master Harry?"

"I comprehend it," was the reply.

"Egad, I believe thee knowest everything! Greek, after all, must be a rare thing!"

Like the good farmer and his dame, the honest fellow attributed the mental superiority, and whatever else he could not understand in the conduct of our hero, to his having studied Greek with the worthy rector.

"You had better see Dr. Orme," continued Henry Ashton; "you will find him in the library; in a few moments I will join you!"

Joe had learned from his own love passages a certain amount of tact, and felt that his presence was no longer desirable. He therefore left his young master to break the intelligence to Ellen, and, with a lighter heart than he brought with him, directed his way towards the house.

As the young man advanced to the spot where he had left the orphan, he saw from her anxious look that she half-divined the intelligence. Taking her hand in his, he gazed fondly upon her features, and whispered in her ear:

"When you pray, Ellen, there is one who will have need of intercession at the throne of mercy: and whose lips so likely to be heard as yours, whom his mad passions have bereaved of a revered parent."

"Meeran," she faltered, "dying?"

Her lover remained silent.

"Dead?"

He gently kissed away the tear that accompanied the word. Had the generous spirit of her murdered uncle beheld it, it would have smiled upon the pearly drop—pure as that which angels are supposed to shed, when they witness the errors and sufferings of poor humanity.

"Heaven pardon him!" she said; "he has sorely tried my heart!"

Her lover struggled for a moment with his feelings, but the nobler impulse of his nature prevailed; and he pronounced "Amen" to the prayer, as he led her towards the rectory.

Although much shocked, Dr. Orme was not surprised at the intelligence of the savage fidelity of the Indian nurse, and the death of Meeran Hafaz. In his long life of retirement, books had not been the only objects of his study—he had learned to analyse and peruse that more mysterious page, the human heart.

A note was immediately dispatched to inform Colonel Butler of what had occurred, and requesting that active magistrate to take the necessary steps.

That same day a letter arrived from the Duchess of Devonshire, informing our hero that Lady Mowbray and herself arrived two days previously in London. It added, that the unhappy victim of so much treachery and deceit here up-against the shock of her husband's death with more firmness than could have been expected from her bruised and tortured spirit; one hope alone sustained it—that of again embracing her son.

How strong, how beautiful is the feeling of maternity in the breast of woman! Age cannot wither it—it dwains in the heart of the young mother with the first smile of her infant, and expires only with the life of her which it spreads a charm.

On the return to the rectory, Dr. Orme referred to the letter of the duchess. He had weighed the affair in his mind, and decided that Lady Mowbray ought at once to take up her abode at the abbey—and by such a step challenge the opinion and inquiry of the world.

"Right, sir!" said his adopted son; "you are always right!"

"I am glad you think so!" said the rector, with a smile; "since my next advice may interfere with your wishes; I am certain that it will with your feelings."

"With mine, sir?"

"Yes; you must start at once for London: duty, affection to the living and the dead, demand the sacrifice—which, painful as it is, I am certain you will make. I will give orders to place Carrow in a fit state to receive her."

Henry looked towards Ellen, as if to read in her eyes the answer he should give.

"Go!" she whispered; and the tremulous sound of her voice and slight quiver of her lip showed how deeply she felt the sacrifice. "Not even the shadow of a reproach must rest upon our hearts! Go, Henry—I will pray for your return!"

Honour, gratitude, duty, all impelled him; yet it was not till after a severe struggle that he decided upon obeying the united wishes of the rector and the orphan. After such an absence—so many sufferings—it seemed hard to part. True, the image of Meeran no longer rose like an ill-omened shadow between him and his affianced bride; but love is the most ingenious of tormentors: it conjures a thousand ills and dangers when separated from the object of its choice.

"I will go!" he said, with a deep-drawn sigh; "but never till this hour did the path of duty appear so rugged and so strewn with thorns."

It was arranged that the speaker should start the following morning, and accompany Lady Mowbray and the duchess back to Carrow.

When the faithful housekeeper heard of the intended visit of the wife of her late master to the abbey, she declared that, let who would receive her, she would not set a foot within the walls while she remained. It was not till after a long explanation from Dr. Orme that she consented to change her resolution. Like the rest of the world, she deemed Lady Mowbray the guilty, not the deceived and outraged wife of her late venerated master.

There was one person—and one alone—to whom the absence of Henry Ashton was a source of relief—the Khan: it postponed the meeting and the explanation he had so many causes to dread.

When our hero arrived in London, he found that Colonel Mowbray had made application to the Chancellor to recover the guardianship of Ellen, and had instructed his solicitor to commence proceedings touching the estates of his late brother. The will was to be disputed upon the grounds of insanity and undue influence. Under these circumstances, he wrote, by the advice of the duchess, to request the presence of the rector and Ellen.

The trials of the lovers were not over yet.

When Joe Beans returned to the prison-chamber in the belfry tower of Carrow Church, he found the ayah, who had carefully arranged the body of Meeran Hafaz, crouching like a thing of sorrow at the head of the corpse. Her tears—and it was no slight anguish which could draw them from her iron nature—fell fast upon the features of her foster-son, which even in death retained their characteristic expression of pride and resolution.

The heart of the poor fellow smote him, as he saw the desolation of the Indian woman in a strange land. He was touched, too, by her fidelity, and began to offer well-meant expressions of consolation and pity.

"Pity!" replied Zara, with fearful calmness; "think you I live for pity?"

"For repentance, I hope!" replied the sexton, who, with the constable and Red Ralph, had remained during the absence of Joe, to watch.

"Could repentance wash out the past—recall the life-blood to his cheeks—the hope to his young heart—I would repent—endure through all eternity the fakir's living death, and bless my bed of torture—but that cannot be! He is dead!" she added, wildly; "the pride of his mother's heart—the light of these sad eyes—with none to weep for him—none to mourn, or honour his remains, except the Indian nurse!"

"What did 'ee kill un for?" demanded Ralph.

The ayah disdained reply—for she felt that her reasons were past their comprehension. But she cast a glance upon the forward boy, which caused him involuntarily to retreat behind his companions—it resembled that of a roused tigress.

"Where is the man," she asked, addressing herself to Joe Beans, "who called himself the friend of my poor boy—who shared his wealth—the subtle plotter—the prudent devil who contrived this mischief?"

"Mean you Colonel Mowbray?" said the rustic.

"Are there two such men?" replied the ayah, bitterly.

"He has started for London."

"No matter!" she answered; "he cannot escape his doom! Why should I think of him, when the ashes of the last descendant of India's princes require my care? I must forth," she said, starting to her feet with sudden determination, "to prepare the balm and spices!"

"You cannot leave!" exclaimed the constable, barring the passage between her and the door.

Zara smiled contemptuously, and extended her hand.

"You are my prisoner—at least till the inquest is over, and the surgeons have examined the body! In my mind, Master Chettleborough," he added, addressing the sexton, "it bea'n't a natural death! There be something like witchcraft in it!"

At the allusion to what she considered the profanation of the body of her foster-son, Zara forgot her revengeful purpose, which, after all, would have fallen on a poor, simple fellow who was but performing his duty.

"Never," she murmured to herself—"never shall the hand of the scorned touch it! Zara will balk their impotent malice!"

As the resolution formed in her brain, she cast her eyes around the chamber to consider the means of accomplishing her purpose. It was taken in an instant.

"When will this thing take place?" she demanded.

"Most likely to-morrow, before the crowner's quest," replied the sexton.

This was enough: she had the night before her—sufficient time to mature her plans.

"And now," she said, addressing Joe Beans, "I have a favour to request—the last I shall ever ask!"

The young man looked doubtfully. He remembered how she had baffled his vigilance the preceding night.

"It will not cost you much," she continued, "to grant it. I sue because I have no wish to command it."

"Command it?"

"Ay, command it!" she repeated. "I am armed with that your coward natures shrink from—death! Leave me with the dead. I would watch the remains of him I nurtured at my breast—perform the last rites due to his memory and his race! The first step which for six hours shall cross this threshold, shall never re-cross it living! Fools!" she added, seeing that they were still undecided whether to refuse or grant her wish; "have you so soon forgotten the fate of him you were set on to guard?"

"She bea'n't no human thing!" observed the sexton, with a shudder. "I have been familiar with the grave all my life, but this woman is more terrible than the grave!"

The constable was of the same opinion, and both declared that they would keep watch in the chamber below; but that no inducement should prevail on them to remain in the same place with the corpse of the young Indian and its terrible guardian.

"Cowards!" exclaimed Joe, "then I must remain alone!"

"Doan't 'ee, Mr. Beans! doan't 'ee!" said Red Ralph, pulling him by the skirt of his shooting coat. "I told 'ee when I fust see'd her at Cromwell House, that the black 'ooman wor no good!"

The deliberations of the speakers were broken in upon by a loud knocking at the lower door of the belfry. All four descended to ascertain the cause, leaving the ayah alone with the body of Meeran. No sooner was the Indian woman disembarassed of their presence, than she raised the remains in her arms as tenderly as a mother would have lifted the corpse of her first-born child, and, with a strength few would have imagined her capable of exercising, carried it up the ladder which communicated with the bell-chamber above. As soon as she had accomplished this she drew the heavy ladder after her, and let down the trap-door—a precaution by which all communication was sundered between the upper and lower parts of the belfry tower.

The bell-chamber, like most similar places in country churches in England, had for years been used as a receptacle for the various odds and ends—such as worn-out grave-planks, broken pew-panels, and old hassocks—which accumulate with time. With these Zara hastily constructed a species of pyre between the massive oaken beams which supported the great bell of Carrow. When, after considerable labour, she had accomplished her purpose, she placed the inanimate remains of her foster-son upon the pile, and, loosening the veil which hung at the back of her head, prepared to spread it as a covering over him.

"Not yet!" she sobbed; "not yet! One moment to human love—to human weakness! So," she said, apostrophising the corpse, "they would profane thy remains—like the ravenous jackal, insult the dead! Never! never! Farewell," she added, "if there be a land in which the spirits, freed from the trammels of the flesh, meet and commune, thy nurse shall soon rejoin thee! Thy funeral pile shall have a living victim! If Zara betrayed, she at least will perish with thee!"

With these words she leant over the dead, and imprinted a kiss on the pale but still haughty brow of Meeran Hafaz. Then, taking up two pieces of wood, which she had purposely selected, she began rapidly to rub them together, in the Indian fashion, in order to procure fire wherewith to consummate the sacrifice. Although the process was a tedious one, her strength never flagged. The dry wood began slowly at last to smoke and emit faint sparks—which the ayah no sooner perceived than she commenced the death-song, which she continued to sing till they burst into a bright blaze.

"At last!" she exclaimed, with a smile of triumph; "at last!"

Without a moment's hesitation, or betrayal of weakness, she firmly mounted the pile she had so laboriously reared, and, taking the head of Meeran in her lap, applied the torch. The wood being for the most part rotten and extremely dry, it was soon in a blaze.

"Burn!" she said, as she continued to fan it with her hands, "till of the living and the dead no vestige shall remain save their mingled ashes! Pride of my soul! light of my eyes!" she continued, addressing the body; "thy nurse has not strewed thy pile with the precious spices and the balm of India; but it shall yield a more costly perfume than rajah's pyre ever gave—the incense of a devoted, faithful heart!"

Voices were heard below, entreating her to descend—to let down the ladder. They were those of Colonel Butler, Joe Beans, and the sexton, who from the churchyard had witnessed the smoke and flames issuing through the boarded windows of the bell-chamber. Zara heeded them not, but with a calm air, unmoved by the scorching flames which had already enveloped her person, continued her lament over the remains of her foster-son, till her voice became choked. Even then her eyes continued to gaze upon him. The last look which fell upon the features of Meeran Hafaz was one of love, devotion, and agony.

Long ere the villagers could arrive with assistance, the desperate act was accomplished: both were ashes.

CHAPTER CXVI.

Revenge—the attribute of gods. They stamped it
With their great image on our natures.

VENICE PRESERVED.

LIKE many desperate gamblers, who have lost and are bankrupts alike in character and fortune, Colonel Mowbray, by the advice of his better half—alas! that a bad, evil-minded woman should be termed the better half of man—resolved to risk everything upon a last stake. Although the guardianship of Ellen was indisputably vested in Dr. Orme, his mode of exercising it had violated a standing order of the Chancellor's, who was one of the greatest formalists that ever sat upon the woolsack, and was likely to decree that the orphan should be restored to the care of the guardian he had appointed, before he would consent to hear any petition upon the subject. The precious pair both calculated that if they could obtain possession of the person of their victim only for a day, they might make what terms they pleased with the rector and her friends; added to which there were the law's delays, and the chapter of accidents that might arise.

The return of Lady Mowbray to England promised to be a source of greater embarrassment to her unworthy brother-in-law than even the will of Sir William or the guardianship of his niece.

Whilst proceedings were pending, the time approached for the trial of Will Sidelar—and Henry and the rector were compelled to leave for Norwich, as their evidence would be required on the occasion; but this time our hero left the object of his affection with a less saddened spirit: he left her an inmate of Devonshire House, under the protection of the generous duchess, and the affectionate care of the widowed Lady Mowbray, around whose heart the orphan had already twined herself.

For awhile we must leave them, and pursue the current of our narrative.

We feel assured that our readers have not forgotten Mat Cows, the hangman, whom we left slowly recovering from the effects of the very severe injuries he had received on the night of the warren's escape from Newgate. Although neither a very amiable nor interesting personage, Mat stands out in relief, like a streak of red light in one of Martin's strangely fascinating pictures—the very terror which he inspires, invests him with a dark and dreamy interest.

"Well, Mat," said one of the keepers—the same who had been so cleverly imposed upon by the liberality and pretended piety of old Davids—"have you heard the news?"

"Is he taken?" demanded the vindictive little wretch, raising himself with difficulty upon one arm from the bed in the infirmary where he was lying.

The turnkey nodded in the affirmative.

"Ha!" exclaimed Mat, with a chuckling laugh, which sounded something between the hiss of a serpent and the whine of the hyena. "I was sure he would be—for I have dreamed of it every night; and my dreams generally come true! When will he be back?"

"Not at all!"

"Not at all!" repeated the executioner, with a look of disappointment; "what do you mean? They can never intend to let such a villain escape: he has half murdered me, robbed me, compelled me to pay a substitute to perform my duty! Well, well," he added; "I tell you that the crown itself won't be safe, if they don't protect the hangman!"

"I believe you," said the gaoler, who was not singular in his opinion—since most of the judges of the land shared it with him.

"Do speak out!" continued Mat, with impatience, which was displayed more particularly in the clenching and opening of his hands than by word or look. "I can't bear suspense—it's worse than certainty! Ask any of my subjects," he added, "if they don't find their minds much more comfortable after they are condemned than whilst they are kept in doubt."

"Well, then," continued his visitor, "I will tell you. Notice has come to the governor, from the Home Office, that Will Sidelar, the prisoner who lately escaped from Newgate, has been re-taken, and committed to Norwich Castle by the magistrates, to take his trial for the murder of a Sir William Mowbray. So, you see, as he was only here upon a charge of attempted murder, and they have got him upon one for a murder actually committed, they have a right to keep him!"

"Then he won't be brought back to Newgate?"

"No!"

"Then I will go to him!" exclaimed Mat, with a look of dogged determination. "I once officiated for Lane—the name of his brother executioner at Norwich. 'One good turn deserves another!' He must return the compliment."

"What do you mean?" demanded his visitor.

"That I should not rest in my bed," replied Mat Cows, savagely, "if any one else were to hang him!"

"But you are ill!"

"I shall soon be better!" growled the ruffian. "I feel I shall: the news you have brought me has done me more good than all the doctors' stuff I have taken!"

"Don't be foolish, Mat!" said his visitor; "revenge is a luxury which poor men can't afford!"

"Can't they?" chuckled the hangman, with a cynical smile; and he thought upon his wife and her paramour; "somehow they do contrive it! When does the trial take place?"

"In ten days!"

"And who tries him?"

"Lord Chief Justice Shark."

"Then he is sure to hang!" exclaimed Mat, with savage joy. "I would not give a rope's end for his chance of escape! I have often watched the old man in court—noticed the working of his brows, and the twinkle of his cold, grey eyes—as he has seen the prisoner entangled deeper and deeper in the meshes of the law. It's my belief," he added, "that if he had not been made a judge, he would have put up for hangman!"

The official laughed heartily at the graphic description of the distinguished personage of whom they were speaking, who was known amongst his brethren of the coif by the soubriquet of the "Hanging Judge!"

Mat Cows kept his word. Five days before the opening of the assizes, he started by wagon for Norwich. Little did his fellow-travellers dream that the decrepid, quiet little man, who whiled away the tedious hours of the journey by merry tales and jests, was the dreaded finisher of the law—the being to whom outraged society delegates the awful privilege of taking the forfeit life of his fellow-creatures!

Although the court-house, as may be supposed from the interest created throughout the county by the murder of Sir William Mowbray, was densely crowded, the executioner contrived to find a seat in one of the galleries, in a direct line with the felons' dock. He had come with the evident intention of enjoying himself; for in the little basket beside him were a paper of sandwiches, and a bottle of his favourite beverage—gin-and-water. Could he have added a pipe, his felicity would have been complete.

Johnson, the gaoler, and his assistants, brought the prisoners into the dock several minutes before the judge had taken his seat upon the bench, with the very proper feeling of gratifying the public curiosity by the sight of them.

Sidelar—upon whom every eye was fixed the instant he made his appearance—looked round the court with a bold, hardened stare. The confidence of his lawyer had given him hope: the man of law did not think it probable that a jury would be found to condemn him on no other evidence than that of poor old Martin, whose mind at times was still apt to wander, and whom he had instructed counsel to treat as a madman. The only awkward circumstance was the prisoner's confession; but as that extended no further than acknowledging that Meeran Hafaz had tempted him to commit the crime, he fancied it might be got over.

The character of the judge he considered as the principal danger: he seldom summed up in favour of an acquittal.

The moment the warren made his appearance in the felons' dock, Mat Cows fixed his eyes upon him with a look of intense hatred. There was something at once fearful and mocking in their expression—they seemed to say: "I shall have you yet!" No sooner did the prisoner catch his snake-like glance, than the bold, confident look was exchanged for one of hopeless fear. Cold drops of perspiration started on his brow. Almost every one present noticed his agony and terror; but none suspected the cause. His tormentor nodded and smiled, and enjoyed his confusion highly.

"Here—here!" said Sidelar, beckoning his lawyer to him.

The gentleman left the table, where he was busily occupied in giving instructions to the counsel.

"What is it?" he whispered, impatiently—for he did not feel over-pleased at being brought thus publicly in such familiar contact with a person in the equivocal position of his client.

"You see that man?" said Sidelar between his teeth, at the same time pointing to his quondam acquaintance.

"Yes."

"He must be removed!"

"Removed!" repeated the astonished lawyer. "Upon what pretence? Is he a witness?"

"No."

"Then, my dear sir, it will be impossible to remove him, unless, indeed, he misconducts himself—when of course it will be at the discretion of the judge or sheriff. Really this is not the time to trouble yourself or me about such fancies!"

"I tell you he must be removed!" continued the prisoner, with yet greater earnestness. "I can't be tried if he is here—I won't! The very sight of him drives me mad!"

"But why he in particular?"

"It is the hangman!"

Exhausted by the agitation the sight of that respectable functionary had caused him, the speaker covered his face with his hands.

The man of law raised his glance, and regarded Mat Cows attentively. The little man returned his gaze with steady, imperturbable gravity: he had a great respect for members of his profession: they were the best friends he had, he used to boast.

"Hem! ah! indeed! rather singular!"

"Horrible—horrible!" murmured the murderer.

"My dear sir, I must confess that the circumstance is a little unusual," replied the lawyer; "but do not let it affect you. In the hands of a clever counsel, like my learned friend Sergeant Gork, whom I have engaged to conduct the defence, it may be made available. I see—touching appeal to the jury—thrill of horror in the box—sympathy of a crowded court! Unlucky, though," he mentally added, "that the crown side have the right of a reply!"

It was unlucky, as the sequel proved.

During the trial, the warren steadily averted his gaze from his enemy: it was only when some important point—favourable or otherwise—was cited in evidence, that his glances occasionally met, and then only for an instant—for the countenance of the hangman wore its invariable sarcastic expression.

The indictment having been duly read, and the prisoner called upon to plead, he answered:

"Not guilty!"

"Hem—hem!"

"How will you be tried?"

Sidelar replied, with the usual formulary:

"By God and my country."

"God send you a good deliverance!" answered the clerk of the arraigns, in his usual matter-of-fact tone, as he handed the indictment and sundry other papers to the judge.

This time, instead of the "hem," a faint chuckle was heard in the crowded court; none knew, save the warren, whom it proceeded from: he felt that it was from his enemy, Mat Cows.

The servants having duly deposed to the finding of the body of Sir William, Martin, the groom, was at last called. In consideration of his age and sufferings, the judge ordered him a seat. The old man entered the court leaning on the arm of Joe Beans.

Dr. Orme, Colonel Butler, and our hero, who were seated on the bench, fancied that they detected a wandering expression in the eye of the witness, and doubted whether the crowded court and the novelty of the scene might not confuse his scarcely recovered recollection. They were mistaken: never was his intellect more clear—his memory more perfect. At his own request, Joe—previous to starting for the city—had taken Martin, at an early hour, to visit his favourite place of meditation in the stables, as the old man used to say he could reflect and think better there.

Deliberately and distinctly he gave his evidence, and clearly identified Will Sidelar as the murderer of his master. The countenance of the learned Sergeant Gork looked blank as he heard him; whilst that of the hangman, on the contrary, became hideously redolent of smiles.

The evidence being concluded, the learned sergeant commenced his cross-examination for the defence.

"How long have you known the prisoner at the bar? Look at him, sir, and recollect you are upon your oath!"

"Man and boy nearly fifty years, I should say!" replied Martin.

"You were formerly fellow-servants?"

"Yes."

"And rivals?"

"Yes."

"Rivals!" repeated the sergeant, with an air of considerable satisfaction at having elicited that important admission. "You hear, gentlemen of the jury, the witness admits that they were formerly rivals! I thought I should arrive at the truth at last!"

Although there had been neither hesitation nor wish to conceal it, the man of law chose to make a point of the admission, as if it had been wrung from Martin by his tact.

"Now, sir," continued the sergeant—"and again I must remind you that you are upon your oath—and painful as it is, I feel it to be necessary—but where the life of a fellow-creature is at stake, I shall never shrink from my duty. What was the cause of the prisoner's dismissal from the service of the late Sir William Mowbray?"

"Perhaps," said the witness, with reluctance, "you had better inquire that of the steward!"

Here Sidelar whispered a few words in the ear of his lawyer, who was standing close by the dock. The worthy gentleman instantly made his way to the table, and endeavoured to attract the attention of the sergeant by pulling the sleeve of his gown. But Gork, fancying that he had obtained a point, paid little attention to the intimation. It was his forte to browbeat a witness, and he fancied that he had found an occasion to display his peculiar powers.

"I shall do no such thing, sir!" he said. "Pretty idea, indeed—that a witness is to dictate to counsel what questions they are to put, and to whom! The gentlemen of the jury," he added, turning and addressing the box in one of his most insinuating tones, "will doubtless know how to appreciate your answer! I repeat it—why was the prisoner dismissed from the service of the late Sir William Mowbray?"

"For drawing a knife upon me in a quarrel," said the witness, mildly, "and wounding me!"

The reply produced a most unfavourable impression against the prisoner throughout the court, and excited a sympathy with poor old Martin, who evidently had not wished to bring his own injuries to press upon a fallen man. A faint chuckle was once more heard. The sheriff commanded silence. Again the eyes of the hangman and Will Sidelar met: the latter already felt that he was a doomed man.

"Ha! hem!" uttered the man of law. "Very generous, no doubt! We all have heard of affected generosity! Have you any witnesses of this most extraordinary fact?"

"Yes."

"Name them?"

"Mrs. Jarny, the housekeeper at Carrow, and Nicholls, the butler," said the groom; "besides the evidence of the surgeon who dressed my wounds. I see the gentleman in court," he added. He pointed, as he spoke, to Dr. Martineau, who was seated upon the bench.

"I think, brother Gork," said the learned judge, leaning over his desk, "that it would be better for you to abandon that line of defence!"

The sergeant coloured deeply: he felt that he had involuntarily prejudiced the case of his client.

Again there was a chuckle.

"Silence!" said the sheriff, looking angrily around.

All that ingenuity could suggest to shake the evidence of Martin, or confuse his recollection, was in vain essayed by the man of law; but the old man stood the test. Only or twice, indeed, he raised his hand to his brow, as if suffering from extreme pain, and paused before he answered; but when the answer came, it was firm and clear. Nothing could move him.

"You admit," said Gork, making a last effort, "that you have a vindictive feeling against the prisoner at the bar?"

"None!"

"Not for his having rivalled you?"

"No! The girl we both loved is dead! Her body was found in the river below Carrow Point!"

"Nor for the wounds which you say he gave you?"

"Still less," replied the old man; "on my own account, I can forgive him the injuries he has done me! My lord," he added, feeling for the arm of Joe to assist him to rise, "from childhood I was the servant of the noble family of the Mowbrays. I ate their bread—I hope with a grateful heart! I was trusted, respected, and, if a poor fellow may presume to say so, almost loved by them! I would have died to prove my gratitude! It has been the will of heaven that I should live to serve them! Will your lordship permit me to ask one question?"

"Certainly!" said the judge, not a little struck by the speaker's venerable appearance and untaught eloquence.

"Has your lordship perceived, in the manner in which I have given my evidence, any desire to tamper with the truth?"

"Not in the least!"

"Go on, sir!" said the witness, addressing Gork. "I am ready—quite ready, now—to answer any question you may propose."

"Excellent!" whispered one or two of the counsellors, who highly enjoyed the discomfiture of their learned brother.

"My lord," said the sergeant, bowing respectfully towards the bench, "although the question and answer are somewhat unusual, I rejoice that this little episode has taken place, since it gives me the opportunity of setting the animus of the prosecution in its true light."

"You forget, brother, that the prosecutor in this case is the crown!" observed his lordship, gravely; "which, in a case of murder, cannot be supposed to entertain any animus favourable or otherwise to the prisoner."

"You, my lord, have doubtless observed, as well as myself and every other member of the bar, that the grave proceedings of this day have been several times interrupted—grossly interrupted, I may say—by an unseemly mirth, which has doubtless surprised your lordship as it has me. But that surprise will be changed into indignation, my lord, when I inform you that the interruption has proceeded from no less a person than the hangman, who has been brought down—purposely brought down—to confuse, terrify, and annoy my unfortunate client, whilst on a trial for his life!"

"That's a lie, my lord!" exclaimed Mat Cows, starting from his seat. "I ain't been brought down; I came of my own accord!"

After the confusion had a little subsided, the speaker was taken into custody by one of the officers of the court.

Every glance was directed towards him—but he bore it unshrinkingly.

"What is the meaning of this indecent interruption?" demanded his lordship.

"I ain't made no indecent interruption!" replied Mat; "none whatsoever! I knows better, my lord!"

"What brought you here?"

"Friendship, my lord!" said the hangman; "prisoner and I were very intimate in Newgate—weren't we, Will?"

The prisoner shuddered.

"I think, my lord," observed the counsel for the crown, "that I can throw some light upon the subject. The unfortunate man at the bar lately escaped from Newgate, where he was confined upon a charge of attempting to commit a murder upon the person of a respectable gentleman, the lawyer of the late Sir William Mowbray."

"Another murder?"

"Yes, my lord," continued the learned barrister; "in the event of an acquittal upon the present charge, an officer is in waiting to take him into custody upon the previous one."

Mat Cows smiled and chuckled.

"Sit down, sir!" said the judge, with a half-amused, half-angry air; and no more interruption!"

"Certainly, my lord!" said Mat; "we know how to behave on these occasions!"

Lord Shark looked for an instant intently at the speaker, as if to discover whether the we, which caused a titter amongst the members of the bar, had been intended as a piece of peculiar impertinence or not; but Mat's countenance remained unmoved.

Despite the very eloquent pleading of Sergeant Gork, the evidence was too strong: the jury, after a brief hesitation, brought in a verdict of "Guilty."

Once more, and for the last time, the chuckle of the hangman was heard; but before the order "which the sheriff gave to take him into custody could be acted on, Mat Cows had left the court.

In passing sentence, the judge held out no hope of mercy. The prisoner, stupefied and overwhelmed with terror, was led from the dock by the gaolers.

That same evening our hero, Dr. Orme, and Lawyer Elworthy returned to London.

The news of the warrener's condemnation was speedily known at Carrow. Many rejoiced—none pitied him. When Red Ralph heard the news, he danced and grinned for joy: he had long promised himself the pleasure of seeing the execution of his enemy.

Joe Beans, who witnessed his unseemly mirth, shuddered and reproved him: his nature was too manly to rejoice at the sufferings even of a wretch like Will Siderer,

In the good old hanging days of George III., but four-and-twenty hours were by law allowed between the sentence and the execution of a murderer; although the humanity of the judge, or the contrivance of the sheriff, by arranging that the trial should take place upon a Friday—as in the present instance—gave the condemned wretch the respite of one day—Sunday. To the warrener the boon was an additional torture—not an act of mercy: he had so many hours longer to endure the load of life.

On his return to his cell, he stormed and cursed; his despair and execrations were fearful; even the turnkeys who watched him, accustomed as they were to scenes of misery and despair, were unnerved by his fearful blasphemies, which drove the respectable chaplain, who visited him soon after his condemnation, from the cell, in terror and disgust.

"Such a case, I fear, is hopeless!" said the venerable man, to Mr. Johnson, the governor, who had accompanied him.

"Not so," replied the experienced official; "return to-morrow, reverend sir: such passions generally exhaust themselves. To-morrow you will find him as eager to receive your consolations as to-day he is reckless and insolent. It is your cold and sullen criminals that die the hardest."

The event proved that the speaker was right.

THE CHAMOIS HUNTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

AWAY to the Alps!

For the hunters are there,

To rouse the chamois,

In his rock-vaulted lair.

From valley to mountain,

See!—swiftly they go—

As the ball from the rifle—

The shaft from the bow.

Nor chasms, nor glaciers,

Their firmness dismay;

Undaunted, they leap

Like young leopards at play

And the dash of the torrent

Sounds welcome and dear,

As the voice of the friend

To the wanderer's ear.

They reck not the music

Of hound or of horn—

The neigh of the courser—

The gladness of morn.

The blasts of the tempest

Their dark sinews brace;

And the wilder the danger,

The sweeter the chase.

With spirits as strong

As their footsteps are light,

On—onward they speed,

In the joy of their might:

Till eve gathers round them,

And silent and deep—

The bleak snow their pillow—

The wild hunters sleep.

DRESS THE INDEX OF CHARACTER.

BEING comfortably seated in my easy chair (I hope you know the delight of a pet chair, destined to receive you after the business of the day, reader), having vigorously poked the fire, and felt the influence of its bright, cheerful flame, I feel disposed to be confidential. Dear reader, I have a weakness: an irresistible habit of tracing peculiarities of character in peculiarities of dress, and of weaving little prophetic webs, touching the victims of my observation. One of our greatest historians says, "Dress is characteristic of manners, and manners are the mirror of ideas." Aided and abetted by this wholesale view of dress, I am surely justified in applying it individually; and may therefore confess, without fear, that, as I lately found myself in the somewhat mixed society of a railway station platform, I caught myself passing sentence upon sundry personages—great and small, handsome and ordinary, interesting and common-place—after the mature observation contained in about one second of time.

Among those who more particularly arrested my attention was a young man, with very thin-soled cashmere boots, tipped at the toes with leather an inch and a half high; with very tight-fitting French kid gloves, of the most delicate primrose—one of which, by-the-bye, was merely held in a hand, on which figured two immense rings; with a watch-chain which might have bound Hercules, without a shadow of a doubt about keeping him in safe custody; with coat-sleeves which would have enabled him to kidnap and conceal two babies with the utmost facility (had such been his wish); and with a neck-tie—reader, I acknowledge my descriptive powers fail in the sublime task of giving the faintest idea of it. Judging from its length of ends, and magnificence of fringe, it must have belonged to his maternal grand-parent, in whose days scarfs were worn (by ladies), possessing extremities of a very wonderful combination of colours. The great problem contained in this article of dress was, by what means the prodigious length of end could stand out so straight and stiff; and my suggestive powers alternately gave to paste, glue, and wire the credit of the marvel; but to this hour there remains a consciousness of sad ignorance touching this interesting article. Every moment was the eye of its wearer glancing at his own apparel, and at intervals of about two minutes he sauntered past a window in which was a reflection of himself, and, at every glimpse, there was a little arrangement of his neck-tie, hat, or coat-collar. Nobody likes to expose his evil passions; and, for this reason, I shall skim slightly over my immediate antipathy to this dandy, and how anxiously I watched parties laden with luggage, in hope of seeing some particularly heavy one step on the tips of those exquisite cashmeres. My estimate of his character was soon made, and as I again glanced at him to verify my opinion, a touch of sadness came over me, and dispersed my indignation to the winds. For what can be so mournful as to see man—glorious, strong-minded, brave-hearted man—sunk down to a mere caricature; his high capabilities and resistless energy lying dormant, and no stronger desire in existence than to make his outward man look like a fop? Plainly, as if given by a pen of iron, I saw the story of guilty nothingness, of a space in the chain of intellect, of an aimless, powerless mass of matter, wherein should have shown forth the image of his Maker. I saw, in what should have been the bright flame of laudable ambition, an eager desire merely to have his apparel admired. Where should have been that Godlike virtue, an interest in every fellow-man, there was the mean and idiot worship of self, and self only. Where should have been sympathy and love and self-denial, there was a dark cavern, where the spirit of self-gratification swayed its consuming sceptre. The rays of futurity seemed to approach me, and I felt he would charm the eye of a parent-neglected, ill-educated, silly woman, who would see in foppish elegance, who would imagine his weak, lisping voice to be indicative of tenderness, and be tempted to unite her destiny with his; little dreaming his attraction was her fortune; his idol himself. I saw the holiest ties profaned—the most solemn promises violated—the most ardent professions forgotten—and the dandy sauntering in the parks in the extreme of fashion, while at home was his heart-broken wife hastening to her last long home.

Another who attracted my notice formed as great a contrast as it is possible to conceive. His coat was not only of the roughest material, but minus a button, and displaying proofs of not having recently come in contact with a brush. As he paraded the platform with a careless, almost contemptuous step, a nearly new but unbrushed hat was occasionally lifted from his head, and a well-shaped hand thrust through a luxuriant, but rough crop of dark hair. A somewhat faded woollen scarf was twisted so untidily round his throat, as to suggest the probability of its being flung on. His buttoned leather boots (pointed at the top, as if in defiance of fashion) did not shine so brilliantly as they might have shone. In all this, I read the most supreme contempt of the opinions of others, and a prodigious amount of self-confidence—I had almost said conceit; an idea that everybody around him was an "owl" or a "goose," and a determination to show, to the utmost of his power, how little he valued the remarks or opinion of the world. I perceived that he congratulated himself upon his total freedom from pride: when the real state of the case was, that he had about ten times as much as my poor would-be Adonis; for while the latter knew he required something besides the inner man to procure notice and admiration, the former had a towering consciousness of possessing such a degree of excellence as to be able to spare even the usual attraction of neatness; perhaps even deeming he required some little countercharm to the fascinations his virtues would form. Although there was the lofty brow and the lighted eye of intelligence, the silent hints of his apparel told me that there was a canker-worm at the root of inner knowledge—that valuable acquaintance with self, without which man runs daily into error. This canker-worm was pride, the demon which cast angels of brightness from the city of pearly gates and jasper walls, into the regions of darkness and despair. I thought of the future. I thought I saw him in sickness and sorrow, but with no kind friend to smooth his pillow, no gentle hand to press the fevered brow, no sympathising eyes awaiting anxiously the answers to their inquiries. And why? Because careless indifference, or sovereign contempt, had marked the previous manner of the sick man, and a high wall of division had thus been built by his own hands between himself and friendship; and he who bestows insolence in the day of health, must expect to receive neglect in the day of disease; for there are few so noble as to obliterate from memory a life of impertinence, and extend the golden sceptre of mercy to the offender in his first moment of need.

With firm step, but gentle manner, another passed me; in whose attire was such a perfect combination of manliness and neatness; such a happy medium between roughness and smoothness; such an exquisite distance both from the tragedian and comedian; such a happy compromise between every colour of the rainbow, and the mere unrelieved sombre black; such a middle way between ostentatious plainness and flourishing dandyism; such an absence both of disorder and of bandboxism, that I nearly caught myself exclaiming aloud: "There's a well balanced mind!" No towering pride, no cringing servility, no mercenary ambition, no pretended contempt of comforts, no delight in the society of the riotous bacchanalian, no sympathy with the long-faced recluse. I saw that he did not look upon himself as too good for intercourse with his fellow-men; but at the same time felt that he was made for nobler purposes, and possessed qualities capable of acting for himself, and of aiding those who needed advice, guidance, protection, and help. I felt that his mind did not merely grovel amid the phantoms of human happiness and perfection, but soared up far higher than the wings of the dandy or the self-conceited were capable of carrying them—and by thus looking upon brighter and more glorious objects, could form a due estimate of himself, both as a frail, fallen creature, and as a being destined to future and eternal greatness, through the perfection of another. [HINDOO TEMPLE AT HALWAD.]

HINDOO TEMPLE, HALWAD.

OUR illustration this week, of ancient Indian architecture, is that of a Hindoo temple, situated at Halwad, a city in the province of Gujerat, now a heap of ruins. It stands on a bed of granite, watered by numerous streams, clear as crystal, which nourish a luxuriant vegetation. But the hand of time has fallen heavily upon it. The walls of the town, like its palaces, are mouldering to decay. Along the banks of the moat are the tombs of many a Moslem warrior. But the palace, the walls of which once resounded with the voices of ambitious courtiers, is tenantless, and the durbar, supported by massy pillars, is as silent as the grave. Many of the mausoleums in the cemetery are costly temples, composed of hewn stone, with statues of gods and heroes in battle.

Halwad, however, although formerly a place of great importance, both in Hindoo and Mahomedan history, is now a heap of mouldering ruins, a refuge for bats and owls, and the haunt of the wild beasts of the desert. Its aspect strikingly corresponds to the prophetic denunciation respecting Babylon. "Wild beasts of the desert shall lie there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures, and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs (apes) shall dance there, and the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their houses, and dragons (alligators) in their pleasant places."

The ancient Hindoo temple is by far the most picturesque and interesting object in the place. Our artist has depicted it as a proud monument in the centre of a deserted city, and from the figures in the foreground would carry the mind back to the period when the processions, the Moorish squadrons, with their crowded spears and glittering sabres, matchlock-men in groups over the gateways and on the city walls, and a turbaned throng covering the space below, appeared on the scene, and shewed what Halwad was in the sixteenth century. All this rude grandeur has now vanished, but a temple of very ancient but uncertain date remains, as if in scorn of all the revolutions and changes of which it has been the dumb witness.

The temple dedicated to Mahadeo forms a square, and a succession of domes of different dimensions, supported by pillars, compose a grand colonnade round the interior area. Its appearance is grand and massive, but evidently a copy of one of the temples in the celebrated caves of Salsette and Elephanta. Its cavern-like aspect is indisputable.

From the frequency of the emblem of Buddha—a human figure with uplifted hands—and the artistic display of Elephant heads—importing that the temple, following out the Hindoo idea of the world, is supported on the backs of those monarchs of the jungle—we should incline to the opinion that it was founded by the Hindoo sect called Jains. Most certainly they abound more in the province of Gujerat than in any other part of India—and that gives a colour to our suggestion.

The Jain theology is unquestionably a remnant of Buddhism, the ancient religion of India, grafted on the Hindoo mythology. It is a pure theism, strangely blended with Hindooism; and of all the religions in the world, in its practices and discipline presents the nearest approach to some of the forms and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church. The idols are intended to represent saints and martyrs. The system, no doubt, originally was pure enough—if a mixture of truth and error can ever be said to be pure—but now it is disgraced by scandalous idolatries. Their altar-pieces are generally bas-reliefs in marble, containing sometimes twenty-five figures, all of men sitting cross-legged. Sometimes there is one considerably larger than the rest, and represented as a negro. This the priests look upon as an emblem of the divinity, and consider the rest as the different bodies he had assumed at different epochs, when he had become incarnate to instruct mankind. But on the Jain altars in Gujerat are four statues of sitting men. They are of white marble, with eyes of silver, which gleam in a very dismal and ghostly manner, in the light of the solitary lamp which burns before them, aided by the yet dimmer ray which penetrates through narrow apertures in the vaulting. The worshippers, chiefly women, fall down before these idols, and offer them flowers or sugar-candy. But in India, the different worshipers of the sun (Surya), of Buddha, of Krishnu and Bala Rama, the Hercules of the Greeks, form a medley more discordant, and classes of beliefs in the aggregate more obnoxious to moral and mental improvement, than is presented by any other countries, whether ancient or modern.

And now, having in the course of these articles afforded our readers some graphic pictorial descriptions of the architecture of those mysterious races of beings—the aborigines of India, the Hindoos, and of their conquerors, the Arabs and the Moguls—we will, with the reader's permission, take our stand beneath the eastern portico of the temple at Halwad, and, directing our gaze across the Gulf of Cambay, fix it upon Surat, which we all well know was the place where the first mercantile establishment of the English East India Company was founded. That was in 1615, when the Great Mogul "sat high on a throne of royal state;" and as the charter of that same company is this year being violently discussed in the British Parliament, we think we cannot more appropriately bring these descriptions of India to a conclusion than by rapidly sketching

THE RISE AND PROGRESS OF BRITISH INDIA.

William of Malmesbury relates, that our own sagacious Alfred the Great sent a mission to St. Thomas's, on the coast of Coromandel, about the year 883; and in the Saxon Chronicles we are further told that the English monarch, having heard that the Christian missionaries in India were in great distress, dispatched Sighelmus, one of his favourite priests, to convey his alms to the monks of St. Thomas's.* Having executed his commission, he returned to England, after an absence of several years, bringing with him a considerable number of precious stones, which he deposited in the Church of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, of which see he was created bishop, as a reward for his services. In consequence of the splendid account given by Sighelmus of the trade, opulence, and luxuries of the East, we are, moreover, assured that Alfred caused several ships to be built and equipped for the especial object of embarking in the Indian trade; and that, having lent these ships to a few adventurous merchants, they performed some successful voyages to the ports of Syria and Egypt, whence they returned richly laden with Indian produce. This commercial intercourse so happily begun, appears to have terminated after the death of Alfred.

Subsequent monarchs cared more for war than commerce; for, from the death of the only really great prince that ever swayed the destinies of the Saxon race to the time of Henry VIII., England was supplied with the commodities of the East by the Venetians and Florentines. But when the discovery of the passage round the Cape of Good Hope threw the Indian trade into the hands of the Portuguese, and Lisbon became the great emporium for the productions of the East, the merchants of London imported them from that city on their own account, and conveyed them to the Thames in their own ships.

At this period the English mind began to awaken to that speculative spirit, which is the living principle of all commercial pursuits. The nation was seized with an avidity to participate in the Indian trade; and accordingly, in the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII., and Edward VI., the search for a north-east passage, and subsequently a north-west passage, which should supersede the Cape of Good Hope route, commenced; and, as regards the latter, was continued down to 1835, when poor Sir John Franklin, and the brave men under him, sailed on their disastrous voyage.

Sir Francis Drake was the first practical English navigator; and after he had demonstrated the practicability of crossing the Pacific Ocean in almost any direction, he was followed by many other navigators, who all of them, concurring in the facility of trading with the natives of Hindostan, created a powerful inducement among the London merchants to engage in the eastern commerce. They began to speculate on the great advantages to be derived from it; but as they had not capital enough to carry it on by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, on a scale sufficiently large to afford them a chance of successfully competing with the Portuguese, they resolved to adopt a more prudent line of conduct, and to endeavour to revive the trade with Syria and Egypt. A memorial was accordingly presented to Queen Elizabeth, in the year 1594, signed by a number of the most influential merchants—in which the national benefits likely to arise from an eastern trade are exhibited in the most favourable light; and in which, therefore, her majesty is earnestly supplicated to make overtures to the Turkish government for entering into a treaty of commerce, whereby her majesty's subjects should obtain such privileges as would enable them to open a trade with the merchants of Syria and Egypt, on the solid grounds of reciprocal advantages and entire confidence.

The doctrine of free trade, it appears, was appreciated in that day. The Queen cordially responded to this proposal; and after some negotiations with the Turkish emperor, the merchants of England obtained the privileges they sought. The trade thus opened with Syria and Egypt continued to be conducted, with unabated spirit, for many years after the establishment of the East India Company.

But this branch of commerce proved insufficient for the newly-developed energies of the English merchants. They wished to compete with the Dutch and Portuguese in India itself; and in carrying this laudable suggestion into effect, they were assisted by George Earl of Cumberland, and a number of gentlemen of fortune. A company was formed, and on the 31st of December, 1600, Queen Elizabeth put her finger on the seal on the charter of the "East India Company." This charter was granted to George Earl of Cumberland, and two hundred and fifteen knights, aldermen, and merchants, constituting them a body corporate and politic. The original capital was £72,000, divided into shares of £50; and the first fleet sailed from Torbay on the 2nd of May, 1601.

The speculation proved fortunate, as did also all the subsequent ones—with one solitary exception—undertaken during the ten years following. In 1611 an English fleet defeated a Portuguese armament off the coast near Surat; and this victory made such an impression on the Great Mogul, that although he had previously refused, he no longer hesitated to allow the English to establish factories at Surat, Ahmedabad, Cambaya, and Yoga. The firman authorising this first establishment of the English on the continent of India, was received on the 11th of August, 1612. In 1614 James I. sent Sir Thomas Roe as ambassador to the Great Mogul, and he having obtained a confirmation of previous grants, it may be received as the fact, that at this period were laid the first foundations of the present colossal power of England in India.

In 1640 the permission of the Hindoo sovereign* of the territory to erect a fort at Madras was obtained.

But the most important settlement was effected a short time before this. Accident led to the formation of that settlement in Bengal which has since proved the source of all the English power in India. It appears that a physician, whose name was Boughton, had proceeded from Surat to Agra, where he had the good fortune to cure the daughter of the Emperor Shah Jehan of a severe illness. For this, among other rewards, he received the privilege of carrying on a free trade. He went to Bengal, and there his abilities obtained him equal favour from the nabob of that country, who extended the privilege given to him personally to all his nation. On the payment of 3000 rupees, a licence was given for an unlimited trade without payment of customs, and a factory was established at Hooghly, by the company's servants at Surat.

The civil wars in England now intervened, and the existence of the East India Company as a corporation appears to have been annihilated. But the charter was renewed by Cromwell, in 1657, and by Charles II., in 1661. The island of Bombay had been conceded to this king on his marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, as part of her dowry; but the gay monarch, finding it an incumbrance, ceded it to the company, who in 1687 made it the supreme seat of government. In 1667 appears the first order of the company for the importation of tea. After some differences with the Great Mogul, provoked by the misconduct of some of the company's servants, during which the French formed an establishment at Pondicherry, the company became ambitious, and laid it down as a determinate rule that dominion was to be acquired. Trading on sufferance they had found hazardous, and therefore they determined to acquire territory. Accordingly, in 1698, after making the most abject submission to the ruling powers, they obtained a grant of Calcutta, and constructed a fort called Fort William. In 1707 this was constituted a third presidency. In 1707 the company were threatened with an innovation. A new company was brought before the British legislature, and three petitions for a free trade to India were presented from the merchants of London, Bristol, and Liverpool. It was urged that at this time foreigners possessed at least a third of the stock of the company. The result, however, was a fresh triumph on the part of the directors, who from that time had their exclusive privileges renewed until 1832, when the trade was thrown open.

In 1744 war broke out between England and France, and as the hostilities extended to the colonies, India became one of the theatres of the struggle. The pursuits of commerce now yielded to the occupation of arms; and the strange spectacle was presented of two European nations combating with each other on the shores of India, aided by different native princes of the country. These chiefs, impelled by a short-sighted policy, thus sacrificed their permanent, for the attainment of momentary objects of hatred or ambition. For it was early in this contest very obvious that, whether the troops of England or France prevailed, the native allies must become dependent on the conqueror.

In this war the English would inevitably have been worsted and expelled from India, but for the genius and daring courage of one man—Robert Clive: who, as our readers are well aware, was sent out to India by his parents as a punishment. His brilliant capture of Arcot proclaimed him a soldier; and in all the subsequent operations in the Carnatic he so distinguished himself, that he speedily attained the rank of colonel.

After a hollow truce had been formed with the French and their allies, some events which had taken place in Bengal led to reprisals, which thenceforward made that country the principal scene of the English adventures in India. Every one is familiar with the tragedy of the "Black Hole of Calcutta." Clive and Admiral Watson were at Madras when they heard of it, and vengeance was resolved upon. On the 2nd of January, 1757, the troops of the infamous Suraja Jowla were driven from Calcutta; and on the 23rd of June, in the same year, the Battle of Plassey was fought, and the prestige of the British arms thenceforward confirmed on the continent.

In the Carnatic, on the 5th of April, 1761, the French had not a single military post, nor one fort or territory left in all India. The genius of Clive had rendered the company supreme. In diplomacy he excelled as much as he did in war. Combining the subtlety of the Hindoo with the sagacity of the élite of the European races, he was perfect in the arts of finesse and stratagem. Many of his acts on moral grounds were indefensible; but as conquerors must inevitably consult either expediency or ambition more than rigid principles, it must be conceded that Clive was one of the greatest men England ever produced. His government of India was brilliant, and the native population were better cared for, than they had been for centuries. He not only enlarged, but consolidated the British empire in India; and as such a brilliant memory as his requires no panegyric, we would here direct attention to the circumstance that, when he left India for the third time, our hold upon that vast territory was vice-like. The great British Indian empire was then dawning. On all sides from the ocean we were advancing to the Himalaya Mountains on the north, and the rugged passes of Cabul on the west.

India, geographically, is wedge-like in form. Imagine, then, on the left and about the centre of this wedge, Bombay; on the right, but lower down, Madras; and higher up on the same side, in the very thickest part, Calcutta; and that from all these points the British were advancing to the centre and top of the wedge—and you have an idea of India when Clive left it for the third and last time.

Warren Hastings was the next governor whose administration was worthy to succeed that of Clive. He advanced across the top of the wedge, while, with consummate daring, he waged war with Hyder Ali in the Carnatic, at the bottom. He aimed at Delhi, the capital of the Great Mogul, then inextricably involved with the Maharrattas—a nation of soldiers of fortune—Dugald Dalgetty to a man. The Nabob of Oude fell before his keen-cutting scythe, and the Great Mogul himself became a tributary of the British. Lord Wellesley followed up the policy of Clive and Warren, and, after the fall of Tipood Saib, the whole of the peninsula of India fell under the British sway. Generals Wellesley and Lake routed the Maharratta forces in several pitched battles, and by the advance of the latter on Agra and Delhi, the doom of the Mogul empire might be said to have been sealed. Under subsequent governor-generals the British power gradually extended itself to the north and north-west, until at last it stretched from the Ganges to the Indus, and from Cape Comorin in the south, to the kingdom of Nepal in the north.

The year 1818 witnessed this extraordinary consummation; for in that year Lord Hastings issued his celebrated proclamation of the supremacy of the British government over the whole of India. The wedge protruding into the Indian Ocean had changed hands. Mussulman and Hindoo had fallen alike before the armies and diplomatists of a joint-stock company, whose heads were in London. Since, the British have crossed the Indus, and annexed the Punjab, invaded Cabul, and on the east dismembered Burmah. Such a prodigious revolution has been accomplished in little more than two centuries. The control over the sovereignty and destinies of India by the British is the greatest marvel of modern times. There is nothing equal to it in the whole range of history. After eight centuries of uninterrupted war and anarchy, the inhabitants of a distant island have restored to this devoted country the blessings of external security and internal repose. So mighty and rapid a change in the condition of an eighth of the human race has no parallel, whether we consider the comparative numbers of the conquerors, or the means by which it has been achieved. Never, since conquest began to desolate the earth, was an empire of such magnitude acquired with so small an effusion of blood. The acquisition of India by Great Britain cost fewer lives than were destroyed by the Spaniards in South America in a single year. In rapidity, as well as extent, the conquest is unexampled. After many centuries had elapsed, the Mogul power was imperfectly established throughout the territories nominally subject to the Emperor of Delhi, which did not include the whole of the peninsula. Nor will the first conquests of Mahomedanism bear a comparison with the British conquests in India. In the course of a century the caliphs had extended the faith of Islam over Syria, Asia Minor, Persia, and Egypt; but those countries scarcely contained fifty millions of inhabitants, and it is a remarkable fact that, in the present day, the nations subject to Mahomedan rulers do not form an aggregate population equal to that which now acknowledges the British sceptre.

But, above all, the conquest of India by Britain is distinguished by its unquestionably beneficent character. To the nations themselves the destruction of the Mussulman power—a foreign and despotic yoke—was a national emancipation from the most degrading yoke. And notwithstanding all the crimes committed by the British in the first stages of their great mercantile adventure, the acquisition of Bengal cost fewer lives than were lost in a single expedition of the Mogul princes. But, above all, it must be acknowledged by the sentimentalists, that in the destruction of a predatory system, which was converting the finest provinces into wildernesses, and the forced maintenance of peace among belligerent chieftains, the British government has performed a splendid act of justice, policy, and humanity, which has fairly earned for it the high character of a conservative and beneficent power, whose supremacy has been a blessing to the great mass of the people. Much, however, remains to be done. The machinery of the government requires improvements as well as repairs. The supreme earthly direction of upwards of a hundred millions of human beings is a solemn responsibility. The bare idea fills the mind with awe! And now that the British legislature has been called upon to determine what the future of India shall be, we must confess to an apprehension which we fervently trust will be found to have been wholly groundless.

But whether the company be continued, or the executive of the empire be intrusted with a larger share of authority, the physical, moral, and intellectual condition of the people of India ought not to be lost sight of in the excitement of discussing political forms, or that indifference which betrays itself in the absence of active sympathy for the wants and distresses of even the unfortunate of the home subjects of her Majesty Queen Victoria.

DO HUMAN HEARTS BREAK?

It is strange that such a question, at this age of the world, should be still an open one. And yet such is the fact. Fiction writers and philosophers, physiologists and metaphysicians—each as it answers their whim or turn—assume an affirmative or a negative,—and still the problem remains to be solved.

For my own part, I would not seek unnecessarily to upset the opinion of any. I have, of course, my own notion on the subject; and until something occurs within my own experience calculated to shake it, I intend to hold it. That experience is now somewhat extensive for I am an old woman, and have had my share of pleasures and of sorrows. During my past life, indeed, the great human river which has swept past me has left but few traces on my memory compared with its extent, but these again are marked there in a way which will not admit of their being readily obliterated. It may be that the re-production of a few of the scenes in which I have taken part, and of the actors in them, may at least amuse the reader, if they do not aid him in solving the problem with which I have started.

It is now a long time since I was wont to feel the day pass over me heavily, if I heard not the well-known tap of Harriet Elphinstone at the door of my dwelling. Even in that tap one could detect something of poor Harriet's disposition. The latter was of the most gentle kind, and to the few with whom she stood on terms of intimacy, it was well known that gentleness did not constitute her only virtue. With no one was she, through her short career, so gentle or so loving as myself; and now, though, as I have already stated, many summers have come and gone since we last mingled our thoughts, I have her as vividly before me as she was when I—but I am anticipating.

We were school-girls together—fellow-romps never for Harriet's shyness, and a tacit respect which her demeanour never failed to inspire on the part of others, prevented that. To having been light-hearted in my girlish days, even to the extent of challenging the frequent remonstrances of our joint guardians, I candidly plead guilty; but, notwithstanding the dissimilarity, we were the most inseparable companions in the establishment, where, nearly about the same time, both were placed for instruction. I was the younger by about two years; and this fact, coupled with her sedateness, led me to regard her as a sort of mother, and to take a gentle chiding at her hands—a freedom which I would by no means allow to another. Nor did the feeling so originating, terminate with our school-days; and much anxiety, if not misery, has been spared me, by a counsel as sweet as it was sincere. They were happy times, those school-days; and, despite all that has been written by the wise and learned, there are often formed during those days friendships lasting and innocent, untinted by any of the bitterness which is sure to mingle, more or less, with after attachments. While I remained at school, the intimacy between Harriet and myself continued undiminished; and although some time passed away before we again met one another after our first separation, our meeting then demonstrated that it had been no evanescent sentiment on the part of either.

Her father belonged to that class of traders with which the metropolis has at all times abounded—who, while others around them rise rapidly into wealth, or, by over-grasping speculation, pull down ruin upon their families, pursue the even tenour of their vocations, and look forward to the day when, by perseverance and economising their slowly-hoarded profits, they may be in a position to provide respectably for all those whose interests are dear to them. Mr. Elphinstone, even in his weaknesses, was no exception to his class; and, like the rest, the term "respectable" included for him all that was good and desirable on this side of the grave. He had the misfortune to lose his wife soon after she had given birth to her second child—a son—and while Harriet was still in her third year. Of course, the isolated man of business, when—as was his delightful duty for years—he inculcated upon the minds of his children those lessons which his never-failing kindness and their respect for him led them heartily to imbib, never once overlooked the value of "respectability"—in reality as well as in appearance. To do, or say, or even appear otherwise than in such a light, was regarded by them as a crime of the highest magnitude; and often have I been tempted to feel half amused at my friend's consternation, when some trifling circumstance would lead her to imagine for a moment that she gave rise to an opinion at variance with that cherished notion. Even those sentiments which supply in the social relations the place of virtue in moral economy, may sometimes be carried to excess; and such, I often fancied, was the case with her. However that may be, the feeling referred to rendered her incapable of any of those little acts of meanness which are regarded by too many of our sex in a half-amiable light, until the world has taught them the bitter lesson, that "all is vanity." Charles Elphinstone I never saw; but while at school I have frequently perused his letters to his sister—and, from their tone, couched as they were in the loving, open terms of a boy-brother's affection, I have no doubt that his mind was of the same stamp with Harriet's, dashed with a boldness and a taste for the romantic to which hers was an utter stranger.

* By this term it must not be understood that at this time there was in the peninsula of India an independent Hindoo sovereign. He was merely a tributary of the Great Mogul—a rajah—in that day a term in meaning equivalent to the Turkish pacha.

About six months previous to the date of my leaving the place in which I had spent so many happy hours, in the company of my charming friend—whose person even then bore promise of exceeding beauty—Harriet was summoned to town, for the purpose of taking leave of her brother, who had procured an appointment in India, in the first place, and then to take upon herself the duties of superintending her father's household. The first was a painful ordeal, in the outset of life, for one so affectionate in nature; the last was a position of some trial for a creature so young. However, the first pang of one had subsided, and she had fairly entered upon the other—she was, as she modestly put it, “endeavouring to learn how to act”—when I received her last letter in England. I was myself about to proceed, in company with some relations, on a lengthened continental tour, and I had the assurance of leaving my only companion—whose fate in life had, since our parting, become deeply interesting to me—as happy as could be expected. To none of my immediate friends were she or her family known, save by the prattle about school affairs in which I used to indulge during holiday-time; and during three years I received but two letters from her—the last, indeed, a sad one: and I shall never forget the circumstances under which it reached my hands.

Three years sometimes embrace within them the principal period of a human life. With myself, I know a briefer space of time has comprehended events of such personal magnitude as to make all the other incidents of life sink into insignificance. With my friend such was the case, too; and the letter to which I have alluded first gave me an idea that one may live an age in less than a life-time.

It was a delightful evening at the close of June, and I had just returned, after enjoying a walk with one whose presence had awakened feelings in my breast that even then bid fair to throw all my childish attachments into abeyance. You will smile, perhaps, gentle reader, at an old woman's “confession”; but even so—the fact is just as I have stated it. My spirits were more than usually buoyant, and I was at peace with the world. Of all I had read or imagined of human misery theretofore, no cloud remained to fling its shadow over my existence, when my friend's melancholy epistle was handed to me. It was brief, indeed, but it contained a volume. A few weeks before its date her father, already drooping from the effects of toil incurred in his endeavours to prop up a failing business, had received intelligence of the sudden death from fever of his only and idolised son, in a foreign land, far from any who might soothe his latest moments. Unable to bear up against this new and unexpected visitation, the old gentleman had resigned his breath; and my poor Harriet was left alone in the world, under the protection, as she put it beautifully herself, of “Our Father in heaven!”

Few persons, not afflicted with extreme sensibility, will be able to form an accurate conception of how completely my view of worldly accidents was affected by the recital. Where but a moment before all was sunshine, now all was gloom; and when I called to mind the goodness and the gentleness which were the characteristics of my friend's disposition, I could not help feeling that 'tis not the unworthy alone who suffer—and I wondered. I had not then learned the beauty of the consolation involved in the passage, “Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth,” and I fear I was still too worldly to revert to it in a tribulation which, however nearly it approached myself, left so many of my day-dreams unexploded. That I sympathised deeply with the stricken one is true; and this sentiment I endeavoured to portray to her in language as consoling as I could command; but I had a sense, while shaping out the terms in which I should address her, of the barrenness of the comfort which this world can supply.

I have already said that, at the period of our first parting, Harriet gave promise of great beauty of person; and from what I afterwards saw of her, I am enabled to judge of what she must have looked and been when, full of energy, hope, and happiness, she presided at her father's table. That such a being, placed in such a position, should create a sensation within her own circle, was the most natural thing in the world; that an impression should be made in some quarter was, too, most probable. More than one of those who enjoyed the hospitality of the father, sought it that they might share the society of the gifted but retiring daughter, and the selection lay in her own hands; for they were all equally eligible—as the world is pleased to apply the term. That selection she did make; and as, from her own silence solely, I was unable to watch her career for a considerable period, the results of that choice were not communicated to me till I had them from her own lips, when chance once more flung us together.

In a small village about thirty miles distant from the metropolis, the lot of him with whom my fate in life was mingled led me, thirty years since, to take up my residence. That spot I never have quitted, save thrice; and my absence on all these occasions has been brief. I was not long in becoming acquainted with all the villagers. My duties led me to visit them in their dwellings, and the rector's lady was soon spoken of among them as one would be who had lived all her days among them. There was one exception to the circle which claimed my acquaintance there; and at this circumstance I felt in some degree annoyed. The extreme house on one side of the only street which constitutes the village, was at that time a cottage, with considerable pretensions to beauty; and the care which had been taken in arranging and trimming the woodbine with which the porch was overhung, bespoke a taste superior to that which could be expected from any rustic. Into this house I had not ventured to intrude. The tenant was described to me as “the lady”; none knew her name. It was then midsummer; and in the previous May, as I was informed, the nameless stranger had taken up her abode there, having rented it for the season. She was described to me as a tall, worn-featured, and genteel person; respectable in attire, and graceful in her movements; about middle life, and unsocial in her habits. To such an extent did she carry the latter quality, according to the version of my informants, that I should be certain to offend her if I presumed to leave a message at her door. She was attended by a little girl, who was as uncommunicative as her mistress; and out of whom the grocer's wife—the greatest gossip for miles round—had been only able to draw the information that she herself had been a neglected child, picked up by her mistress in the streets of London, and that the latter was a “wery hangel!”

“My dear Frederick,” said I, during the evening on which this description was conveyed to me, “what do you think of trying to introduce me to this lady?”

“Ridiculous, my dear! The lady may not even belong to the church; and then, how should I undertake to bring it about?”

“True. But something tells me that this lady has need of such consolation as the intercourse with society above the rank of those around would afford her; and I long to see her.”

“Be patient,” replied Frederick, “till to-morrow; and if the lady attends service, I shall certainly attempt some method to have you brought together.”

This was Saturday, and on the next morning I was standing at the gate of the small churchyard, even as I am wont—but with feelings oh, how changed!—to stand there new on like occasions, when I observed the peasants, who were approaching, make way respectfully for a tall figure, wrapped around in a mantle of black silk, with a bonnet of the same material, and leading by the hand a little girl of some ten years old. It struck me in a moment that this was “the lady;” and although I felt pleased at the promised satisfaction to my curiosity, I could little anticipate the many happy moments to which that interview has led. Even at the distance which I was placed from her, when I at first observed her advance, I could perceive that there was in her carriage that air which attested the correctness of the title bestowed upon her by the villagers; and as she drew nearer, something within me whispered that she was not altogether unknown to me. When she came close to where I stood, notwithstanding the period which had elapsed since I last gazed upon those features, and clasped that hand, I could be no longer in doubt that I stood in the presence of my old friend Harriet Elphinstone! The agitation and the recognition were mutual, and in another moment we were locked in an affectionate embrace.

Sitting by my own quiet fire-side, or strolling through the walks in the garden of the rectory, with the arm of one thrown around the waist of the other—even as of old, in girlhood's happy hours—I learned from the lips of my beloved friend the story of her after sorrows.

If ever there was a creature born to be loved and to love in return, it was Harriet. Among those who aspired to her hand, however, was a young man, an assistant to her father at his business—and to him had she yielded her whole heart's affections. The affair had been kept secret from the old gentleman during his life-time; but the state of his affairs at the period of his decease, rendered it necessary that some one thoroughly acquainted with them should be intrusted with their superintendence. Of course it was a double source of gratification to the orphan-girl, to find that the person of her own choice should be steward, as it were, of her fortune, and she felt double confidence in the issue. He proved, however, unworthy of all. Too late it was discovered that, under the cloak of a sedate exterior, he carried the heart of a gambler and libertine; and finally he decamped, leaving the over-trusting girl deceived and penniless. With the wreck of her father's effects she had managed to purchase a small annuity—very small indeed—and retiring with little Sarah—the child who had given such an accurate account of herself to the grocer's wife—she had resolved to seek a quiet spot, in order that she “might die in peace.”

Whatever of comfort it was in my power to bestow was cheerfully afforded. Our sympathy was the most valuable item, and this she had from our very hearts. Nevertheless, did she rapidly droop, and we could not help observing that some cause beyond the reach of the doctor's skill, slowly but surely was taking from us one in whose fate our interest had now become all-absorbing. At length she was unable to return even a single visit; and soon afterwards I took up my abode at her cottage, where I remained for three weeks her attendant, and then had the melancholy satisfaction of receiving and attending to her last trifling requests.

There is a small green mound, marked by no stone, almost beside the little pathway which I traverse as often as I enter the village church. There are other spots in that same graveyard, which to me are sadly dear to look upon; but as often as I gaze upon that one, and have dropped a tear to the memory of my early friend, I cannot help wondering that the question should still be doubtfully asked—“DO HUMAN HEARTS BREAK?”

A FESTIVAL AMONG THE NEGRO ABORIGINES OF SOUTH AFRICA.

ABOUT mid-day Chik came, in great excitement, to tell me that Nangoro was on his way to me: so I smartened things and made ready for him. There was a body of men walking towards us, and in the middle of them a very fat old fellow laboured along: he was very short of breath, and had hardly anything on his person. This was the king himself. He waddled up, looking very severe, and stood in the middle of his men staring at us, and leaning on a thin stick very neatly shaped, that he seemed to carry about as a sceptre. I hardly knew what to do or what to say, for he took no notice of an elegant bow that I made to him, so I sat down and continued writing my journal till the royal mind was satisfied. After five or six minutes Nangoro walked up, gave a grunt of approbation, and poked his sceptre into my ribs in a friendly sort of manner, and then sat down. He could, I believe, understand Damara well enough, but he persisted in making Chik interpret for me into Ovampo. Nangoro had quite a miniature court about him; three particularly insinuating and well-dressed Ovampo were his attendants in waiting; they were always at his elbow, and laughed immoderately whenever he said anything funny, and looked grave and respectful whenever he uttered anything wise, all in the easiest and most natural manner. I gave Nangoro the things that I had brought as a present for him, regretting excessively that I could spare him nothing better. In fact, all my gilt finery was but little cared for by these people. It would look as outré for an Ovampo to wear any peculiar ornament as it would for an Englishman to do so. The sway of fashion is quite as strong among the negroes as among the whites; and my position was that of a traveller in Europe, who had nothing to pay his hotel bill with but a box full of cowries and Damara sandals. I would have given anything for ten pounds' worth of the right sort of beads; half of that value would have made a really good present to Nangoro, and franked me into the good graces of all his people. As it was, he was rather sulky, for it is considered a kind of insult to an African chief to visit him, and make use of his country, without commencing acquaintance by sending a tribute. He insisted upon my giving him a cow which I, or rather John Allen, had with me, besides the ox I had presented him with; and as there was no help for it, the cow went. We then had a short conversation; he looked at our guns and made us shoot with them, chatted a little, and then left us, saying that we were free to buy and sell with his people as much as we liked. Immediately crowds of the Ovampo, who had been gathering during the interview, poured down upon us, laughing and talking, but taking the greatest care not to annoy us in any way. They were a merry set, and all of them dressed, or rather ornamented, very tidily. They wore a great quantity of beads and rings, but scarcely anything else, except a kind of cartouche-box, in which they kept a tuft of hair for painting and powdering themselves. The ladies were buxom lasses, having all the appearance of being good drudges. Their hair was worn short in front, but spread out behind into a broad fan. They were decidedly nice-looking; their faces were open and merry, but they had rather coarse features, and shone all over with butter and red pigment. They seemed to be of amazingly affectionate dispositions, for they always stood in groups with their arms round each other's necks, like Canova's graces. They hummed sentimental airs all day long, swaying themselves about to the tune, and completely ruined the peace of mind of my too susceptible attendants. I began to buy corn and beans from them; the women brought small baskets full, often only a handful each, and were paid in beads. I had brought a bar of iron, half an inch thick, and four feet long; that procured me 100 pounds of corn at once. Timboo was the most successful bargainer: he sat in the middle among the beads, and twenty or thirty corn-selling damsels crowded about him. He was in his glory, chaffing and chattering in a most original patois all the day long.

Every night Nangoro gives a ball, to which the élite of Ovampo-land have a free entrée. He kindly sent me an invitation by Tippoo, that one of his three courtiers under whose protection we had been especially placed. As soon as night sets in, the guests throng together from all sides, and as the country is full of palms, one member of each party generally picks up a dried, broken-off branch, and lights it as a torch. It gives a brilliant flame, and the effect of the many lights on every side is particularly pretty. I went, about eight o'clock, down the sanded walk, between quickest hedge-rows, that leads to Nangoro's palisading. When we had entered it, we turned to the right, into the dancing-court, which was already filled with people, who talked and flirted just as though they were in an English ball-room.

There was a man with a feeble guitar, or banjo, in one corner, and a powerful performer on the tom-tom in front of him. The first dance was remarkable as a display of dexterity, though I hardly think of elegance; it was undertaken by twelve or fourteen gentlemen, all the others looking on. The dancers were ranked in double files, and dos-a-dos; they then “passéed” from side to side with a tripping, operative step, but a wary and cautious eye. Every now and then one of the performers spun suddenly round, and gave a most terrific kick right at the seat of honour of the gentleman whom he then found in front of him. This was the dance; there was a great deal of dexterity shown both in delivering and avoiding the kick, which, when successfully planted, hit with the force of a donkey's hoof. I observed that the three courtiers danced very well and very successfully—indeed I would not have found myself dos-a-dos with Tippoo for any consideration. The ladies applauded the dance most vociferously. After this came a promenade: we were all jammed together into a compact mass, and then stepped round and round the court, to the sound of the tom-tom, tapping the ground with our feet in regular time. Dance number three was for the bushmen, a large kral of whom lay close by Nangoro's palisading; they are his body-guard. This dance was entirely mimicry, either of animal steps or anything else they liked, and then a grand promenade closed the evening. I saw only thirty or forty of Nangoro's wives there. I suppose that the others, being old, did not dance. They wear a copper armband as a sign of distinction.—Galton's Explorations in Tropical South Africa.

SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION
IN DUBLIN.

SEVRES PORCELAIN VASES, CONTRIBUTED BY THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH.

THE manufacture of porcelain is now one of the most important, both in England and on the continent. During the Exhibition of 1851, the articles exhibited were singularly elegant, rivalling in taste the classic productions of Greece and Rome, and in quality considered as approaching the far-famed productions of the Chinese. The Dublin Exhibition shows that this department of blended art and science has been amply sustained in its brilliant reputation. And following out the plan of familiar instruction intended to be embraced by these illustrations, we may remark that, as in all the great porcelain manufactories of Europe, the particular process in use is kept a secret, we may mention that it is to China the world was originally indebted for a knowledge of this beautiful article of luxury and utility. The peculiar excellence of the Chinese porcelain made it long an import of considerable value, and gave its name to the finer kinds of pottery in use among ourselves. In the present age the porcelain of the Chinese is not much in demand, owing to the poverty, the dull sameness of their forms. Their designs are wretched, and we believe we are correct in stating that the productions of Sevres, Dresden, and other places, have completely ignored their popularity. But as the Chinese mode of manufacturing porcelain is the basis of all the modes practised in Europe, we cannot do better than describe it, which we shall do very briefly.

The two sorts of earth which are most used in the formation of their porcelain, are called kao ling and pé-tin-tsé; the first, a kind of soap-stone mixed with a small proportion of mica; the other a granite in which quartz greatly predominates. The whitest pieces of each are always preferred. The pé-tin-tsé is reduced to powder, thrown into a vessel full of water, well stirred up, and then left to settle. A thick cream rises, which is skimmed off, and poured into another vessel filled with water. This process is repeated till the cream ceases to rise; and that thrown into the second vessel is allowed to remain untouched till a crust is deposited below, and the water above is quite clear. The paste thus formed is dried in moulds, and, before it is completely hardened, is cut into cakes, having nearly the shape and size of a brick, which are sold in the market for so much per hundred. The kao ling receives its name from a hill near King-teh-chin, where it is found in large masses, under a stratum of red earth. It is subjected to the process just described, and is formed into cakes like those of the pé-tin-tsé. For the purpose of making porcelain, these earths are mixed together in different proportions, according to the degree of fineness required: for the best sort in equal quantities; for the second best, four parts of kao ling are added to six of pé-tin-tsé; and for the worst, one of the former to three of the latter. A greasy kind of chalk, called Hwashe, is sometimes substituted for kao ling, after having been prepared in a similar manner: the porcelain thus made is whiter and more transparent, but more brittle and expensive than the other. Shé-kao, a kind of gypsum, is likewise sometimes used; but it is not so hard and tenacious as kao ling.

The mixture, when properly worked up, is thrown into a pit, well paved and plastered with a hard cement; it is then trodden down till it has acquired a sufficient consistency. From this mass, portions are taken and spread upon large slates, on which they are rolled and kneaded till every vacuity and rough substance has been completely removed. The vessel is then formed—if spherical or cylindrical—by a wheel, and is delivered to a second workman, who adds the rims, feet, and other ornaments; a third shapes it on a mould; a fourth pares its edges; and after passing through twelve or more hands, it is at length fit for the furnace. Figures in relief, spouts, handles, &c., are not formed at the same time as the vessel, but cemented on when nearly dry; the seams being so nicely pared and smoothed as not to appear at all. When sufficiently hardened, the vessel is given to the painters, each of whom has his peculiar province: one to trace circles round the edges, another to draw the landscape, a third to sketch the figures, and so on, till the last applies the colours. Each piece is then put into a separate case, at the bottom of which there is strewed a bed of fine sand, covered with a layer of powdered kao ling. These cases are next placed in the furnace, resting on a floor of coarse sand, and piled one upon the other: first, those containing the coarser wares, then the finer, and, lastly, the finest in grain and colouring, which are nearest to the mouth of the oven. Just room enough is left between the piles to allow a passage for the flame; but, as they have no means of regulating the heat, it often happens that the whole is spoiled and converted into a shapeless mass. The cases are put into the furnace, and removed when necessary, by means of a kind of iron ladle, with a long wooden handle.

Blue and white are the ordinary colours; red is one of the most esteemed and expensive; and gilt figures on a black ground are in great request. The gilding is formed by mixing gold-dust, water, and sugar well together; and it is laid on by a hair pencil, first dipped in clear gum-water, and afterwards into this mixture. When the vessel has been taken out of the furnace, the gilding is polished with fine-grained, moistened sand.

The colouring processes adopted in the great European manufactories are various, and peculiar to the locality. At the imperial factory of Sevres, in France, this art seems to have attained its highest point. The colouring of the three vases of which we give illustrations is really magnificent. The first is in the style of the Renaissance, and is remarkably elaborate. It is distinguished for the well-balanced proportions of the neck and the foot, and for the novel manner in which the body is ornamented. The large vase is Raffaellesque, exhibiting light and graceful scroll-work, festoons of flowers, and other graceful ornaments peculiar to this style. That which follows is much more massive in its general features, and more minute in the details of its decoration. As works of art, they cannot be too highly appreciated. They are not servile copies of the Greek and Roman models. And when we say this, it is only praise justly due to the artistic talent of our versatile neighbours. Dull people ask, Of what use are beautiful vases? Of what use? Why, they please the eye, and gratify the mind. They do more: they, inter alia, show us that there is no article but which, in its manufacture, may be treated artistically, even in the smaller utensils of life—such as china-ware, delt, glass, and other similar vessels. Even the invention and exquisite taste of the Etruscan people of old, has not really abridged the power of art to find new forms of beauty. Viewing this fact through a practical medium, only let each one think how the same principles of taste which designed these costly splendours, may be applied in the adornment of his own home—in all, even its smallest accompaniments; and let the softer sex, whose peculiar province it is to shed gracefulness and purity of taste over the world's society, particularly remember, that true taste, grace, and beauty do not require costly materials; but depend for their effect upon the idea, and the clearness with which that idea is expressed. Let those who ask what use art is to manufactures, put these and kindred questions to their own common sense, and they will readily acknowledge that art lends beauty, enchantment, and civilisation to the human race.

As in 1851, the foreign exhibitors of articles in which the designs show cultivation and fine mental and moral taste, have still a very great advantage over our native artists. But considering what little the British government has done for art, and how recently that little has been doled out, this is not to be wondered at, when we know how assiduously and affectionately art is cherished on the continent.

In many of the German states, institutions for industrial instruction are in a highly efficient state. The pupils reared in them are in constant demand, and are esteemed above all others. In the Trade Schools and Polytechnic Institutions of Germany, it is estimated that 13,000 men annually receive a technical and scientific training; and in schools attended by the working classes during their leisure hours, upwards of 20,000 operatives are systematically studying the elements of science and art. In the capitals of the German states there are central institutions of the nature of industrial universities, the object of which is to teach the principles of science and art applicable to production, preparatory to their being afterwards practically followed out in the operations of the factory and the workshop. The importance of these technical colleges is recognised by even the smallest of the German states, which support them at considerable expense. In the institution of Carlsruhe (Baden), with its museums, laboratories, and workshops, there are 330 pupils, whose training is superintended by 21 professors and teachers. The Central School of Arts and Manufactures in Paris annually educates 300 pupils in applied science and art, and exhibitions in connection with it exist in 29 departments, for the instruction of poor but meritorious artisans in the provinces. The pupils of this school readily find employment on leaving it, and 500 of them are known to be holding posts of importance in various parts of the world.

CAST-IRON VASE FROM COLEBROOK DALE FOUNDRY.

The iron and coals of Britain have been appropriately termed "vast magazines of power warehoused and ready for use." And undoubtedly they are; for without them we should never have risen to the first rank among nations. To iron the obligations of the nation are immense. It supplies us with the weapons of warfare, builds our steam-engines, fits up our workshops, makes our tools, enters largely into the construction of our dwellings and public buildings; and in its latest adaptation to useful purposes, facilitates ocean steam navigation. Iron is unquestionably the most useful of the metals which man, by his industry, obtains out of the bowels of the earth. It is the chief agent employed in the development of civilisation; and, as our selections from the Great Exhibition suggest to us that we should be as communicative as possible on every subject, we think we cannot do better than inform our young readers that iron as used is not a simple metal like gold, but a manufactured article employing large capital, much skill, and a great amount of labour. It is procured from ironstone, which prevails chiefly in South Wales, Scotland, and the midland counties of England. The process may briefly be described; but owing to the manufacturers continually adopting improvements, it varies with the district. But generally the modus operandi is as follows: The ironstone first undergoes a process called calcining, which is performed in kilns similar to those used for burning lime, or in order that the sulphur and other foreign matters combined with the ore may be discharged. The coal used is coked. The limestone is generally used in the state in which it comes from the rock. When this operation has been performed, the furnace is brought into requisition. This is a circular building, tapering like a cone, usually from forty to sixty feet high. After the furnace has been thoroughly heated and dried, it is filled with coke and set on fire at the bottom. When the fire has made its way through this body of coke, a quantity of calcined ironstone, with limestone, is placed on the coke—a small quantity of coke is then taken from the bottom of the furnace, which causes it to sink at the top, and the space is filled up with fresh coke, with the addition of calcined mine and limestone. This process is continued till such time as the furnace becomes one continued stratum of coke, ironstone, and limestone. When this is the case, the bottom part is shut up, leaving a hole for the introduction of the blowpipe, and another for the cinders to flow off. The blast is now applied, and continues blowing from eighteen to twenty hours, by which time a quantity of iron collects in the hearth, and when full is let off into moulds, the furnace being kept filled with materials, as before. This is the first stage of iron making, and the article thus produced is called pig-iron. This is taken to a place called "the finery," where a strong blast is used. Here the pig is smelted with coke, in a low fire, and when brought into a very fluid state, is let off into moulds. After this the

These bars go to the foundry, either to make cannon, cylinders, pistons, boiler plates, rivets, screws, or castings—heavy and light. Our illustration shows that iron may be made to contribute liberally to the manufacture of articles of taste as well as utility. This cast-iron vase is a contribution to the Exhibition by the celebrated Colebrook Dale Foundry. The stand is very neat, and the vase, with its bold stag's heads, elaborate in design as well as ornamental in appearance. It will certainly support the fame which the Colebrook Dale Foundry has long since acquired for the production of decorative subjects in iron; and we believe that this particular one may vie with any of the pretty vases they exhibited in Hyde Park, in 1851.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Welcome, O queen! as much as heart can think;
Welcome again as much as tongue can tell;
Welcome to hearts and tongues that will not shrink!
God thee preserve, we pray, and wish thee ever well!
CITY WELCOME TO QUEEN ELIZABETH.

THE death of Queen Mary placed the Catholics of England in an embarrassing position. Not only was the strength of the kingdom in their hands, but every place of confidence and importance was filled by members of the ancient faith. Some foresaw the downfall of the church, and the re-establishment of the reformed religion; others predicted civil war; and not a few desired that the young Queen of Scots should be proclaimed queen—founding her right to the crown on the supposed illegitimacy of Elizabeth. Fortunately, however, for all parties, these attempts were prevented, and the peace of England preserved, by the good sense and loyalty of Dr. Heath, the Catholic Archbishop of York, and Lord High Chancellor of England. That distinguished prelate proposed an assembly of both Houses of Parliament, that they should at once proceed to the palace, and there and then proclaim Elizabeth as queen—a proceeding which at once rendered her title indisputable.

Rapin, with that dishonest spirit which characterises his history, has foully belied this patriotic conduct of the Catholic Chancellor; but the journals of the House of Lords still exist to prove the falsehood of his assertions. Holinshed and Heyward have equally preserved the speech he made on the occasion.

The proclamation was first made, in presence of both Houses of Parliament, at the doors of Westminster Hall. The new sovereign was proclaimed "Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith;" but not supreme head of the church.

The ceremony was afterwards repeated in the City, by the Duke of Norfolk and the Lord Mayor and aldermen.

Whilst these rejoicings were taking place in the metropolis, Cardinal Pole, the Catholic primate, expired of a malignant fever, which carried off no less than thirteen bishops in a few months—a mortality which considerably lessened the influence of the Catholics in the Upper House of Parliament, and rendered the changes which were shortly afterwards introduced in the religion of the realm much more easy of accomplishment.

After having held her first council at Hatfield, in which she appointed her long-trying friend and counsellor Secretary of State, Elizabeth, attended by a noble retinue of lords and gentlemen, set forth for the metropolis. Her journey was one continued ovation: the population of the towns and villages came forth to welcome her.

As the royal train approached Highgate, many of the bishops, attended by their clergy and office-bearers, who had been awaiting her arrival, knelt by the road side.

"What would these men?" she demanded of Cecil, who rode a little behind his mistress, on her left hand.

"Gracious queen," replied the new minister, bowing to the bow of the saddle; "they are a deputation of the prelates and clergy of the realm, come to proffer their allegiance to your majesty."

"Which we are pleased to accept," said Elizabeth, with a cheerful smile; "rise, my lords," she added; "we thank you for your love and loyalty with all our hearts!"

In further token of her favour, she ungloved her right hand, which was of marvellous whiteness, and extended it to the bishops to kiss.

Bonner, the worthless Bishop of London, was the last to approach. The queen fixed her eyes sternly upon him, and deliberately drew on her glove, thereby intimating that he alone of the prelates was excluded from that honour. Considering the position of the new sovereign, it was boldly and royally done, to mark her abhorrence of the foul persecutions and cruelties he had been guilty of. Abashed by the silent but humiliating rebuke, which was doubly mortifying from having been given in the presence of the principal nobility of the realm, Bonner withdrew to his mansion near Farringdon Street—part of which still remains—the locality in which it is situated being known by the name of Bonner Lane.

A little further on the road towards London, the Lord Mayor and aldermen met the procession, and conducted the new sovereign, amid the acclamations of the people, to the Charter House, where she remained, holding councils and receiving addresses, for several days.

On the 28th of November the queen took possession of the royal apartments, or lodgings, as they were quaintly called, in the Tower. Elizabeth rode on horseback, dressed in purple velvet, having Lord Robert Dudley, as Master of the Horse, on her right hand. On reaching the Tower, her majesty, it is recorded, fell upon her knees, and returned thanks to Almighty God for deliverance: in her prayer she compared herself, not over modestly, perhaps, to Daniel in the lions' den.

It was duly debated in council whether or not the oath of supremacy should be exacted. But Elizabeth and her advisers were far too cautious to proceed at once to abolish the ancient faith. At the funeral of her sister, mass was said, the queen being present. After the ceremony, the Bishop of Winchester—an intemperate prelate, but a man of irreproachable morals—ascended the pulpit to preach the funeral sermon.

He commenced by a review of the life of Mary, and her death. He next alluded to her successor as a lady of great worth, whom all true Englishmen were bound to obey; but added the following disparaging and most uncourtier-like phrase:

"MELIOR EST CANIS VIVUS LEONE MORTUO."

(A live dog is better than a dead lion.)

The rest of the sermon was equally disparaging to the queen.

No sooner did Elizabeth hear herself compared to a living dog than the temper of her father, Henry, rose within her—for although the discourse was in Latin, she perfectly understood it. Her temples became flushed—for she keenly felt the insult to her, both as a woman and a sovereign. Turning towards Lord Robert Dudley, who was standing behind her chair of state, she whispered a few words in his ear—they were brief and decisive.

"Send Norfolk to me!"

Her favourite—for the Master of the Horse, it is shrewdly suspected, even at that time, was her lover—ventured to remonstrate. He foresaw her design, but the dark cloud upon the brow of the lion queen—as she has not unaptly been styled—warned him that he was treading upon dangerous ground.

"God's death, Dudley!" she exclaimed, interrupting him; "art thou, too, turned fool or traitor? Must we speak, even to thee, our pleasure twice? Send the Earl Marshal to me!"

In a few moments the duke, who at that period was a very young man, stood respectfully before her, holding the staff of office in his hands.

"You heard that mitred traitor?" said the queen.

"Would I had not, gracious madam!" replied the youthful noble; "his zeal has outrun his discretion!"

"Say rather his loyalty!" interrupted Elizabeth, bitterly; "but priest though he is, he shall find my sceptre is not a staff! If I cannot wield my father's sword, my enemies at least shall find that I know how to support the dignity and prerogative of his crown! As he descends from his preaching, arrest the knave!"

Cecil, who guessed what was taking place, cast an imploring glance towards his royal mistress—who met the mute appeal by a decided frown. The new secretary did not care to risk her favour by further interference. The duke, having received the order, withdrew.

The Catholic party saw, with surprise and dissatisfaction a party of the buff-coats drawn up round the pulpit. They more than guessed the purport.

As the bishop descended, the Earl Marshal extended his staff towards him; and, bowing low, declared that he was his prisoner.

"Prisoner!" repeated the prelate, scornfully; "upon what charge, my lord duke?"

"Treason!"

"And by whose order?"

"Mine—priest!" answered Elizabeth, in a clear, resolute voice, from her chair of state. "God's death! dost think we are of that patient, yielding stuff, that every knave may trifle with our dignity! If the living dog," she added, bitterly, alluding to his sermon, "be better than the dead lion, it is that it can use its fangs!"

"Madam!" said the bishop, firmly, "I am a prelate of the holy Catholic Church, which, thank heaven, is still by law the established religion of the realm!"

"We know it!" answered Elizabeth, with contemptuous indifference. "We also know that the same authority which made it so, can unmake it! Away with him to the Tower!"

"Bishops have their privileges!" continued the prelate.

"But none to insult their sovereign!" replied the queen, with ready wit; "since the Divine founder of the Christian faith expressly says:

Rebder unto Caesar the things which are Caesars.

Honour, obedience, and respect are due to princes," she added; "thou hast forgotten them! My lord duke, look to your prisoner!"

"Beware!" exclaimed Dr. White; "the arm of the church is strong!"

"Stronger than the sceptre?"

"Yes!" replied the prelate; "the sceptre's sway extends but o'er the body—that of the crossier over the souls of men! Let but a hand be laid upon my person, and here, proud woman—here in the face of all thy court, and in thy dead sister's presence—I cancel thy share in the inheritance of heaven, release thy subjects from all allegiance to thee, and pronounce upon thy head the awful curse of Rome!"

"Our royal father braved it, bishop," answered Elizabeth, with a satirical smile; "and he died King of England. We fear neither Rome nor Rome's curse a rush, when conscious of the integrity of our own heart and purpose! See if curses will break thy bonds, or release thee from the Tower, where, as I am a queen, thou shalt sleep this night, after thy most traitorous discourse levelled against allegiance and good government!"

Several of the Catholic nobles began to intercede for the Bishop of Winchester, assuring her Majesty that, despite his indiscretion, he was both a learned and a pious metal, which is very brittle, is broken into small pieces and thrown into an air furnace by the workmen, called the puddling furnace. Here it is exposed to a violent heat until it melts. The men now keep stirring it about, and expose it to a current of air, by which means it loses its brittleness and becomes malleable. When sufficiently worked, the mass is divided into separate pieces, and subsequently passed through rollers worked by steam power, which give them the shape required—generally that of bars, technically called "merchants' bars."

man, and well-affected to her person; but the queen repeated her commands, in a tone of voice and gesture which reminded her hearers so much of her imperious father, that they felt there would be danger in disobeying her.

"Be it so!" said the prisoner; "I am ready to seal my faith to Rome with the blood of its servant!"

"No!" exclaimed the queen, tartly; "we may punish an insolent traitor, but we make no martyrs: mercy is the sign of the true church, which abhors bloodshed and cruelty! We raise not an intemperate fool, or mischief-seeking knave, to the dignity of the crown of martyrdom; such cruelty we leave to Rome and its ministers!"

Despite the murmurs of many present, the prisoner was immediately removed from the church, and the queen retired to the palace.

Shortly afterwards the oath of supremacy was exacted. Many who refused to take it, were deprived of their offices and places at the council board. Amongst others, the Archbishop of York, from whose custody the great seal was removed to that of Nicholas Bacon, who at first bore only the modest title of my Lord Keeper.

CHAPTER XXXV.

A crown, the bright reward of ever daring minds.
SHAKESPEARE.

NOTWITHSTANDING the decided step which Elizabeth had taken in resenting the insulting conduct of Dr. White, the Bishop of Winchester, it was resolved in council to proceed cautiously towards the secret aim of the new sovereign—the restoring of the reformed religion: to bring about which, the queen displayed consummate tact and ability. Her first open secession from the Catholic church took place on the morning of Christmas Day. She went to the Royal Chapel in great state, accompanied by the great officers of her household and ladies of honour, but withdrew at the conclusion of the gospel.

This was prudently, as well as cleverly done—for if it had been received with marked disapprobation by the people, it could have been easily explained away by saying that her majesty had been suddenly taken ill. As it was, her conduct was hailed with approbation: the horrors perpetrated by the Catholic party during the reign of her sister, had set the nation generally against their church. The seeds of persecution generally bring forth sweet and bitter fruit: sweet to those who suffer for conscience sake; bitter to those who illustrate their faith by deeds of cruelty, instead of mercy.

Her next step was to issue a proclamation, commanding that, from the first day of the ensuing year, both the Litany and Gospel should be said or sung—not only in the Royal Chapel, but in the churches throughout the kingdom—in English: an ordinance which gave great satisfaction to some, and was highly disapproved of by others.

It is uncertain how far in her zeal the new queen might not have been induced to proceed, had not one important consideration restrained her—her coronation. The Cardinal Pole, primate and Archbishop of Canterbury, was dead. Dr. Heath, Archbishop of York, positively refused to place the crown upon her head, as supreme head of the English church. The remaining prelates—and there were not more than half a dozen who had survived the pestilential fever which had thinned the ranks of the hierarchy—not only declined to perform the ceremony, but refused to consecrate any new bishops, unless they were persons examined and selected by themselves.

It is singular to mark the superstition of the age. Elizabeth, who rejected the dogmas of Rome, could not divest herself of her belief in astrology and alchemy. Before she fixed the day for her coronation, she consulted the famous impostor, Dr. Dee. During the greater part of her life, that impudent charlatan exercised the most unbounded influence over her—the source of which was his having, by a happy guess, predicted the short life and reign of her sister Mary.

An arrangement having been brought about at last with Oglethorpe, Bishop of Carlisle, to consecrate her, Sunday, the fifteenth of January, was at last fixed upon for that important ceremony; the day preceding being the recognition day.

The new queen left the Tower in her robes of state, seated in a chariot hung with crimson velvet draperies and cloth of gold, having a canopy borne over her head by six knights. Never did the maiden monarch display more tact than upon this occasion. In her progress she had a kind word for most—a smile for all. Flowers were scattered on her path, and pageants enacted at every step. One of these, in Gracechurch Street, was the most remarkable. A huge rose tree was erected at the sign of the Eagle. In an immense white rose was seated Elizabeth's paternal grandmother, Elizabeth of York; next to her her husband, King Henry VII., stuck in a huge red rose.

Proceeding from the stem upon which were these two personages, were two more roses—Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn—from whom proceeded a third branch, in which Elizabeth herself was seated, crowned and robed, in regal state. The entire pageant was decorated with white and red roses—emblems of the once regal houses of York and Lancaster.

A Scriptural pageant, performed by children, next met the gaze of the queen. Some verses were recited, of which the following specimen may suffice to show the taste and style of the poets of the period:

Thou hast been eight times blest, O queen of worthy fame!
By meekness of thy spirit when care did thee beset—
By mourning in thy grief—by mildness in thy blame—
By hunger and by thirst, when right thou couldst not get.

By mercy showed, not proved—by pureness in thine heart—
By seeking peace alway—by persecution wrong;
Therefore trust thou in God, since he hath helped thy smart;
That as His promise is, so He will make thee strong.

In another pageant Truth presented her Majesty with a Bible, which she graciously received and kissed.

At Temple Bar were Gog and Magog and a troop of children, who, in the words of the chronicler, sang to their sovereign a sweet song, the last words of which were not without a peculiar signification of the wishes of the citizens, and an encouragement to proceed in the work of the reformation.

Farewell, O worthy queen, and as our hope is sure,
That into error's place thou wilt now truth restore,
So trust we that thou wilt our sovereign queen endure,
And loving lady stand from henceforth evermore.

That night Elizabeth slept at Whitehall, from which place she proceeded, at an early hour the following morning, in her barge, to Westminster, where she robed herself in a mantle of crimson velvet, faced with ermine, with a train and surcoat of the same rich material.

On approaching the church, she was met by one solitary bishop—Oglethorpe—who wore the mitre and vestments of a Catholic prelate; indeed, it is said they were borrowed from the persecuting Bonner for the occasion.

After being presented by two noblemen to the prelate, who gave her the patten and chalice to kiss, she returned to her chair of state, where the coronation oath was administered to her, in which she swore to maintain the Holy Catholic Church.

The Protestants explain the charge of perjury which the Catholics have brought against this queen, by alleging that, at the time Elizabeth took the oath, she considered the church she was about to found, or had already partially established, as entitled to the appellation of Catholic. The Church of England retains it to the present day.

After the bishop had anointed her majesty, she retired with her ladies of honour to change her dress; on which occasion, she petulantly observed: "that, say what they would, the oil was only common grease, and had an ill-favoured and distasteful smell."

On her return, the prelate placed the crown upon her head, girded a sword upon her loins, and the abbey rang with the shouts of "God save Queen Elizabeth!"

At the sacrament, her majesty received the eucharist, but did not communicate, as Protestants do, from the cup. Only one Catholic sovereign in the world is permitted to communicate under both kinds—and that is the King of France on the day of his coronation—an honour conceded to him as the eldest son of the church.

Sir Edward Dymock, as champion of England, made the usual challenge to all who disputed the title of the new sovereign to the crown: who, in the proclamation made by Garter King-at-arms during the banquet in Westminster Hall, styled her majesty:

"The most high and mighty princess our dread sovereign Lady Elizabeth, by the grace of God Queen of England, France, Ireland, defender of the true ancient and Catholic faith, most worthy Empress of the Ossade Isles, to the mountains Pyreneë."

At the very time the new sovereign assumed thus publicly the style and title of defender of the ancient Catholic faith, and swore by oath to maintain it, she had written not only to the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, but to the principal Protestant princes of Germany, to assure them of her adherence to the reformation, and propose an alliance offensive and defensive between them.

In her astute policy, she directed Carne, her ambassador at the court of Rome, to announce her accession to the reigning pontiff, Paul IV., at the same time charging her minister to assure him that it was not her intention to offer violence to the conscience of any of her subjects.

Never did the court of Rome commit a more signal error than in the present instance. The Pope, a proud and despotic prince, instead of conciliating the new sovereign, who was firmly seated upon her throne, informed the ambassador that he could not comprehend the right of the illegitimate daughter of the late king to reign—that he considered the young Queen of Scots, the descendant of Henry VII., as the true heiress of the crown—but that if his mistress would renounce her pretensions, and submit her claims to his judgment, she should be treated with mercy and indulgence.

This reply broke the last ties which had induced the Protestant queen to tamper with her convictions. She instantly recalled her minister; but Carne, having been threatened with excommunication by the pontiff, if he ventured to obey her orders, chose to remain, and lived and died a dependent upon the bounty of the papal court.

It had long been a custom for the English sovereigns, on the event of their coronation, to release certain prisoners. One of the Protestant nobles, the morning after her coronation, as her majesty was proceeding to chapel, knelt and presented a petition to Elizabeth.

"What is this?" she demanded.

"The humble petition, gracious madam," replied the noble, "of four most notable and praiseworthy men, who for years have been most unjustly held in captivity by their enemies."

"Without our royal warrant?"

"Even so, madam!"

"God's death!"—her usual oath—exclaimed the queen, "how name you the gentlemen? We will have no such injustice in our realm! Their names, my lord? their names?"

"Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John," replied the petitioner; "hitherto imprisoned in the Latin tongue!"

Elizabeth smiled at the conceit, and answered that, before she decided, she would inquire whether the worthy persons themselves desired to be released: a reply which was thought favourable to the Protestants.

ESSAYS.

NO. CXCI.—THE LAST WATERLOO BANQUET.

IN the evening of the 18th of June, 1852, the Duke of Wellington held his last Waterloo Banquet. Although a festival, it was an occasion to be remembered. The warrior himself presided. His fourscore and three years announced themselves in his snowy head and withered features; but the old fire shone in his eyes, and his calm smile was as pleasant and confident as ever. In the joy of the hour he heard not the rustle of the ebon wings of the executor of Providence at his side. None present saw the awful shadel! Every pulse beat well—and every soldier felt some of the gaiety that in days of yore had made the tedious march endurable, and the midnight bivouac chatty and agreeable. The rich wine flashed and danced in the blaze of light that fell on costly plate and bronzed visages, as the aged veteran—with a fatherly look to the Prince Consort on his right—proposed the health of "her Majesty the Queen." On fourteen eighteenth of June had the same toast been proposed by the same lips—and this was the fifteenth and last time. He was never again to hear the loyal response of his ancient comrades—never again to lead off the chorus with his hearty old English "hip—hip—hurrah!" And then—"The memory of the brave who fell at Waterloo," drunk in solemn silence, must have been singularly affecting; for, as time had crept on, that memory had waxed dimmer and dimmer. Thirty-seven years make a great gap in a century. It is the aggregate generation among all nations. But in that aged throng, hearts still throbbed at the recollection of the stirring deeds of 1815, and their owners could, with melancholy earnestness, think tenderly of the men who had fallen by their sides in the cause of valour, honour, and country.

Alas! in 1853, another memory has to be added to the throng of the departed great. The memory of him who directed the splendid valour which hurled into the irretrievable ruin his mad ambition had provoked, has to be placed on the muster-roll of the dead! Although he does not sleep among those who lie where his memory is the greatest of all those who contributed to the glory of that startling 18th of June—startling, because it was more than a day of victory—it was a day on which mighty interests and mighty destinies, pending at noon, were fated to be settled and adjusted ere the last streak of sweet sunlight was to vanish from the field whereon the embattled hosts of France and England were struggling in the mad fury—the indomitable savageness—of life-devouring, insatiate war!

"The greatest nor the worst of men"

"Ardennes waves above them her green leaves, Dewy with nature's drops,"

So in our festive hours, as we honoured "the Duke" when alive, let us remember him when dead. "The memory of Field Marshal Arthur Duke of Wellington" carries with it a national as well as mournful sentiment; and in recurring to that last banquet which the illustrious deceased gave in commemoration of his most dreadful battle, we may be allowed to bring him before the mental eye as he sat surrounded by his companions in arms, giving and receiving honours. The memory of those who fell in the strife has been drunk by them: we can fancy the host proceeding to pay tribute to individual merit. How curt and soldierlike are his eulogies. Duty was the string in the harp of his praises. The acknowledgments are delivered in the same spirit, and, as temperance was the habit of the Great Duke, as the clock struck ten, behold him on his threshold, grasping hands and smiling good nights to those he was soon to bid good-night to for ever. The last guest has vanished, and as he pauses on the landing, he gazes on the placid face of him whom Canova has chiselled with such marvellous fidelity. The marble and the man. The dead and the living. What is there about the statue to arrest his attention? He has seen it thousands of times before, but now he looks upon it with melancholy interest. Conquered and dead, dead and conquered, but the upset throne has righted again; and, behold, a descendant, on that same 18th of June, 1852, swayed the destinies of France. Probably the old man asked himself of what use was Waterloo. Was it a battle fought in vain—a mere spilling of blood, to enrich the plains of Belgium? Was the prostration of one Napoleon but the preliminary to the elevation of another? Busied with speculations like these, and his mind full of reminiscences of the brightest day in his warrior life, he has entered the Waterloo Gallery, and there, amid the trophies of the past, he gazes around him in silent abstraction. The shield that records his achievements arrests his attention, and his eye glides round from Assaye to Waterloo—he sinks into a seat, and, like a tired soldier, dreams of the past.

Once more he is in the field with harness on his back and brave hearts at his command. The hip, hip, hurrah is that of battle. The wine is rich red blood, and no stint of it. War is a liberal host. Death presides at this banquet. Hark! The roar of a hundred guns. What, does he think to wake us up? Steady, boys—steady—they come! The sulphurous canopy overhead darkens, the thunder belched by sacrilegious rage bellows over the once peaceful plain, and the serried hosts of France advance to the charge. In vain. The island heroes, like their cliffs, spurn back the tumultuous eries. Again they come—and it is man to man, horse to horse, to the music of death-whistling balls, and hoarse shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!" "Britons strike home!" They do strike home. All through the long, weary hours of that 18th of June, they are doing nothing else but striking home. On one side it is, "Charge, generals, charge!" on the other, "Steady, boys—steady!" "The good time coming" was then in the dim, dim distance; and the pounding goes on from rainy morn to dewy eve—and still that inflexible man cries out, "Steady boys—steady!" At length help comes. Ney leads—the bravest of the brave. "Up guards, and at them!" The foe staggers—the avalanche of red coats hurled upon them crushes them to the earth; and then, as a maddening "hip, hip, hurrah!" rings over the plain, the Duke waves his hat; and now it is "Charge, boys—charge! advance the whole line!" and the battle is won.

Yes! Waterloo is won; and that old man, trembling on the verge of eternity, asks himself, "Why won? why fought?" Why won? Because that indomitable man—that modern Hercules—had fouled the stable he had once cleansed; made fortune his footstool, instead of his pillow. Why won? Because the might and majesty of France had perished in the snows of Russia, and the whitened carcasses of hundreds of thousands of brave men were an offence in the sight of Providence. Why won? Because Tamerlane had gone out of fashion, and the world was glad to be rid of a man who had plunged his greatness in the Stygian darkness of an ambition that had degenerated into vulgar avarice. Why won? Because Napoleon, playing tricks with destiny, had exhausted the prestige of his power, and warred with fate, just as that vain-glorious Ajax shook his fist at the lightnings, as if they would not flash in despite of all the demi-gods that ever looked earthly-majestical beneath the high arch of heaven. Why fought? Because England was in the thrall of a mania. Bound 'prentice to the continental sovereigns, she could not run from her indentures; and so, like a faithful servant, she served out her time, and on the 18th June, 1815, tossed her cap to the sky, amid a hurricane of musket-balls, grape-shot, nine-pounders, and hissing, fizzing rockets. But the battle's won, and the route is Paris. There the great Duke holds his festival. He is the greatest in the great throng collected within its walls, and the assassin marks him for his own. But fate had willed that he should not fall by a mortal hand! A fourteenth of September smiled grimly on the frantic attempt. A king arrives in Paris—fit representative of an extinct era—and the mission of Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington, is accomplished. He never more will mingle in the battle; for him henceforth armies are but pageants. As he sits brooding in that magnificent dining-hall of Apsley House, he thinks he hears again his invincible troops cry, "Home, sweet home!" and the bands take up the strain; and once more he treads the soil of England, never to leave it again as a warrior. As the shouts of the multitude ring in his ears, and the sovereign and the senate shower honours on his head, the memory of Waterloo comes upon his brain, like a hot thrill after a long calm. He thinks that Britons need not blush for Waterloo; and that exultation over that brilliant success was but natural. Had he been beaten, no efforts would have been made to have softened his disappointment, or mitigated his humiliation. It was a victory—an overwhelming victory! for it marked the extinction of one political era, and the commencement of another. It was the starting-point in all subsequent advantages; it removed a barrier to the national progress, and prostrated a Colossus who regarded men but as machines to work out his gigantic purposes. It opened the door to freedom, and to the full, strong hope of the complete emancipation of the continent from the despotisms that swathed up every kingdom and state in dense black clouds of political bondage, and material depression. This has not yet been realised; but the future promises well. The soil of tyranny is always volcanic. Let but the earth heave, and thrones topple down like piles of cards. But Wellington thought little of this. He was more a soldier than a patriot. He fought for his country—for the land of the brave and the free. Hip—hip—hurrah, for Old England! "Charge, boys—charge!" The exhortation was not needed. Famed Waterloo—

The thunder-clouds close o'er it, which when rent,
The earth is covered thick with other clay,
Which her own clay has cover'd, heaped and pent
Rider and horse, friend, foe, in one red burial blent.

But the charge has been against another, oe, and the battle has been on other ground. England has exclaimed, in accents louder than the roar of battle—

What are monuments of bravery,
Where no public virtues bloom?
What avails in lands of slavery,
Trophied temples, arch, and tomb?

And, so exclaiming, charged right gallantly into the very heart of a territory in which riches were heaped in splendid profusion.

The years 1815 and 1852! The difference between them now flashes over the mind of the aged soldier, as he contemplates the past; and to his still piercing eye, there is revealed an abundance of glory worth a thousand Waterloos. He sees his country striding into the luxuriant realms of art, industry, and commerce. Behold her shaking from her feet the dust of centuries, and purging her moral atmosphere of the mists that had gathered there, during a war of twenty long years! First commerce reared its head; and, like an unleashed hound, sped away with the game in view. The seas were guarded by the genius of peace; and over them, like birds released from a dreary imprisonment, flew the stately ships of merry England. Commerce in the East was extended—the west again opened its arms affectionately to the mother country—and Europe, mild and sad, at the close of a sanguinary struggle, hailed the meteor flag of England in her ports as the sure sign of her deliverance. At home the manufactures were amazingly multiplied. Stately buildings, affording employment to thousands of the population, arose all over the land; and to stimulate industry, the resources of art and science were called into requisition. The age of inventions commenced, and machinery enabled the inhabbitants of a little island at one extremity of the world, to not only successfully compete with nations more powerful in numbers than itself, but to establish its authority over oceans and continents, and extend its empire among the largest, the most barbarous, and the most savage of nations. Commerce and Manufactures, like twin sisters, thus having gone on hand-in-hand, their ally and best friend, Knowledge, also kept their company. Education became a national sentiment, and where the state was at fault, the people themselves supplied the deficiency. Self-improvement became an universal maxim—and how it has been adopted, let 1852 itself speak.

Then and now, thought the Duke, 1815 and 1852. Why, in 1815 the people had no locus standi—they were ignored by the ruling institutions. A few decayed and corrupt boroughs supplied the House of Commons with members, venality flourished in high quarters, and the great mass of the people were steeped to the lips in ignorance. In the year when Waterloo was fought and won, in England there were only schools for the rich; the poor were left to prey and be preyed upon by ignorance. Crime stalked through the land unblushingly. The habits of the people were coarse and brutal. The brutalities of the prize-ring filled up the measure of their holidays. As a consequence of all this, they were discontented, and, the government said, disorderly. They held meetings, at which they vociferously applauded the violent declamations of agitators; and when—as in Manchester—they were interfered with by a brutal yeomanry, and denied the privilege of assembling to confer upon the means of redress, the midnight torch was brandished all over the country, and the incendiary wantonly and wickedly revenged the wrongs of his class on property. The gallows then was a fixture in every assize town; and the gibbet yet lingered to scare the traveller with its ghostly remains of some poor wretch. Indeed, England then, and for some years afterwards, was anything but a pattern nation. The rich were too rich, and the poor too poor. The middle classes were only beginning to assert their supremacy. They had not yet, as a body, acquired the franchise. How different was it on the 18th June, 1852. The population of Great Britain had been increased by a third, a constantly abiding mass of seven millions had been added to the population. Every corner in the land had been brought into rapid and constant communication by means of railways; the electric telegraph had been invented to outstep Time; the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans had been bridged by steam; our commerce had been doubled, and our mechanical power of production multiplied indefinitely. In short, in its aggregate aspect, the nation, like the Great Duke's Peninsula army, was in a position "to do anything or go anywhere." Internally it was as healthy as in appearance. Incendiarism had disappeared. No political agitators disturbed the country; there were no Peterloo riots, or unlawful interferences by the magistracy, to inflame the resentment of the uneducated. Crime was less frequent, and much mitigated in character. The gallows only presented its hideous front at fitful intervals, and then only to bring the sons and daughters of Cain to condign punishment. Murder is now the only crime punished by strangulation. And if to all this be added the qualifying—the god-like circumstances, that poverty was more contracted, industry more diffused, intelligence more active and more widely circulated, and the people nervously anxious for mental and moral development—the contrast between then and now was presented to the mind of the Duke in bold and eloquent characters. Waterloo was not fought in vain, nor did that old soldier gather four-score and three years in vain. As

"The ceaseless shade
That round the world doth sail," hovered round thy venerable form on that 18th June, 1852, thou, perchance, might have had a presentiment that thou hadst held thy last Waterloo banquet. But as those on the brink of eternity have a far-seeing vision, we do believe that as thou cast a parting look on thy bossy shield, and gave an inner glance to the world as it was, thou felt thankful that thy span of years had been extended over one of the most brilliant periods in the history of mankind.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

TO REMOVE SULPHURIC ACID STAINS.—The red spots caused by sulphuric acid upon black cloth may be removed, if perceived in time, by applying carbonate of ammonia, which neutralises the acid. Nitric acid stains cannot be removed, as it not only decomposes the dye, but imparts a peculiar yellow tinge to the fibre of the wool.

A NEW POISON.—We have been informed by several pharmacists in Manchester, that red chromate of potassa is, in all probability, extensively resorted to for secret poisoning since the sale of arsenic was placed under legal restrictions. Externally, it has been long known to cause ulceration of the hands, as may often be witnessed at print works. Its internal action has not been investigated; but it is thought to cause mortification of the extremities. It is not improbable that the chromic acid may be reduced in the system.

RAPID FILTER.—A patent has just been sealed for the invention, by Mr. Bardwell, of a rapid filter, for large bodies of water and sewage, through which filter liquids, it is stated, will pass nearly as quickly as they run in. The patentee proposes to place such filters at or near the mouths of the great sewers, connecting the smaller sewers therewith, and thus he expects to see the Thames completely free from pollution, and as pure and silvery as in the days of Sir Philip Sydney.

IMPORTATION OF THE PRECIOUS METALS.—During the last three years, gold-dust from California, and silver bullion from the south-western coast of America—to the value of 50,000,000 of dollars—have passed over the Isthmus of Panama, to be conveyed to England by the Royal West India mail-packets.

RANGE OF THE HUMAN VOICE.—There are about nine perfect tones, but 17,592,186,044,415 different sounds: thus fourteen direct muscles, alone or together, produce 16,383; thirty indirect muscles, ditto, 173,741,823; and all in co-operation produce the number we have named, and these independently of different degrees of intensity.

SCREW v. PADDLE.—The Bengal screw steamer, which brought home the late Indian mail, performed the distance between Malta and Alexandria (820 miles) in two days twenty hours—which is the shortest time the voyage was ever performed in, and she must have averaged twelve miles an hour to have done it in the time. There is no doubt that this steamer, the largest at present in the world, can run, under very favourable circumstances, nineteen miles an hour. She has fully answered the most sanguine expectations concerning her, and has proved the Yankee notion, that length of itself gives speed, because steamers of such enormous length as the Bengal, which is nearly 320 feet long, have not to breast every wave. All persons interested in the screw, and who have watched the performance of the Bengal, have pronounced that the days of paddle-box steamers are numbered, and that they will be supplanted by screw steamers as effectually as the mail coach has been supplanted by the railroad.

MILK AS A MANUFACTURING INGREDIENT.—Milk now possesses other offices besides the production of butter and cheese, and the flavouring of tea. It has made its way into the textile factories, and has become a valuable adjunct in the hands of the calico-printer and the woollen manufacturer. In the class of pigment-printing work, which is indeed a species of painting, the colours are laid on the face of the goods in an insoluble condition, so as to present a full, brilliant face. As a vehicle for effecting this process of decoration, the insoluble albumen obtained from eggs was always used, until Mr. Pattison, of Glasgow, found a more economical substitute in milk. For this purpose, buttermilk is now bought up, in large quantities, from the farmers; and the required insoluble matter is obtained from it at a price far below that of the egg albumen. This matter the patentee has called "lactarine." Another application of this article—milk—has just been developed, by causes arising out of the recent high price of olive oil. Oil having risen from £40 to £70 a ton, the woollen manufacturers are now using the high-priced article, mixed with milk. This mixture is said to answer much better than oil alone, the animal fat contained in the globules of the milk apparently furnishing an element of more powerful effect upon the woollen fibres, than the pure vegetable oil alone.

NEW PLASTIC MATERIAL FOR FORMING VARIOUS OBJECTS.—(By Professor Purkinje.)—Five parts of mixed whiting are mixed with a solution of one part of glue. When the whiting is worked up into a paste with the glue, a proportionate quantity of Venetian turpentine is added to it, by which the brittleness of the paste is destroyed. In order to prevent its clinging to the hands whilst the Venetian turpentine is being worked into the paste, a small quantity of linseed oil is added from time to time. The mass may also be coloured by kneading in any colour that may be desired. It may be pressed into shapes, and used for the production of bas-reliefs and other figures, such as animals, &c. It may also be worked by hand into models, during which operation the hands must be rubbed with linseed oil; the mass must also be kept warm during the process. When it cools and dries, which takes place in a few hours, it becomes as hard as stone, and may then be employed for the multiplication of these forms.

RHUBARB WINE.—In connection with the article in a preceding number, upon the vinous properties of the rhubarb plant, we now give the following receipt for making rhubarb wine, which will no doubt be acceptable to our readers: Bruise 6 lbs. of rhubarb stalks, add 1 gallon of cold spring-water, let it lay five or six days, stirring it up three or four times a day, strain it off through a sieve, then add 4 lbs. of moist sugar, one lemon sliced; let this be well mixed, care must be taken not to stir it afterwards; let it stand in this state for about ten days. It is again strained through fine muslin or a fine sieve; then put it into the barrel for good. A small quantity of isinglass dissolved in the liquid must be added. An ounce of isinglass would be sufficient for a 9-gallon cask; but as the wine ferments for several weeks, we think that the isinglass ought not to be put into it until fermentation ceases. The wine then is either bunged down or bottled off, and will be in prime condition for next summer's use. If a clear champagne is wanted, loaf sugar can be used.

IRONSTONE BRICKS AND POTTERY.—Although the "slag," or refuse cinder of the iron manufacture, accumulates at the rate of some three tons for every ton of iron that is made, and although the ironmaster is involved in serious expenses for the removal and permanent deposit of the useless material, hardly anything has yet been done to turn it to profitable account. It is true, that limited uses have been found for it in Dr. Thomson's application of it for copper-smelting, and as the nucleus of Mr. Cuninghame's agricultural and fettle materials; but neither of these employments has yet in any way affected the case. Now, however, a third and more extensive vent has been found by Mr. W. G. Elliott, of Blisworth, who uses the troublesome material for the manufacture of bricks, tiles, and pipes. In pursuing this manufacture, the patentee satisfactorily argues that iron may be profitably made, even on a small scale, by using the "slag," as it runs from the furnace, instead of throwing it away, and covering up good ground with it. The coals and materials involved in the manufacture of the iron are obviously chargeable to that account; and it is assumed that the labour and general costs of the removal of the "slag," as at present, will nearly pay for the moulding it into bricks. The turns at the blast furnaces are twelve hours each; and in a furnace doing full work, there are four men and sometimes two horses, with boys, constantly employed in the removal of the "slag," which comes to 300 tons a week. Mr. Elliott is at present engaged in the establishment of his system for working the Northamptonshire ironstone. There does not appear to be any valid reason why the plan should not be most successful. The bricks are of excellent quality; their manufacture introduces a double course of economy, and the raw material is cheap and inexhaustible. As regards the last question, the best evidence is, that 8,000,000 tons of "slag" were produced and thrown away in 1851.

ASTLEY'S LIFE BOAT.—Hitherto the great points aimed at in life-boats have been merely displacement of water, and the qualification of righting when accidentally turned over. But in my air-chamber, or cone-boat, the case is very different, for it possesses many other peculiar properties. It would be next to impossible to turn over my boat by any power which will overturn ordinary boats. My opinion is, that the great importance laid upon the righting qualities of boats, has caused other more important particulars to be quite overlooked. Many persons find fault with my boat as being deficient in speed: others—and good authorities, too—say, "We never mind speed in a life-boat, provided we get safety." It has also been suggested, that if the cone were to get injured, the boat would cease to be safe. For this casualty I have provided two remedies: one is, the placing an inflated India rubber cushion inside the upper part of the cone. This cushion would be about 10 feet long, and it would follow the shape of the cone, being capable of being inflated from the inside of the boat at pleasure. My other means of safety consists in making the cone double—that is, with an intermediate space—one cone being, in fact, inverted over the other. One cone might thus be stove in without hurting the boat in the least.—P. H. ASTLEY.

THE ENGLISH AND BELGIAN SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH.—Great Britain is now additionally linked to the European continent. At twenty minutes before 1 p.m., on the 6th of May, 1853, a practical announcement was made that Dover and Middlekerke were united by an invisible telegraphic line, and that the European and American Submarine Telegraph Company had thereby furnished a means of instantaneous communication between England and Belgium. The actual line which has been laid down, was made by Messrs. Newall, of Gateshead. It consists of six copper wires, insulated by the Gutta Percha Company, with a double covering of the very remarkable material which the Wharf Road Works have so successfully and so universally introduced. The gutta percha, laid into a rope, is served with spun yarn, and then covered over with twelve iron wires. This gives a cable of greater strength than that of a first-rate man-of-war, being capable of standing a strain of 50 tons. When coiled in the hold of the William Hutt screw steamer, which took it across channel, the mass was 51 feet in external diameter, 28 feet inside the coil, and 4 feet 6 inches high. Its length is 70 miles; weight, 500 tons; and cost, £33,000. With the aid of some experienced naval men from the government, the laying down was most successfully accomplished on the day we have mentioned—the proceedings being conducted after a fashion apparently so matter-of-fact, that the work might almost be looked upon as a common and well-practised affair. The only peculiar precaution of the occasion, was the carrying the compass on board a separate tug, which vessel also kept the cable steamer steady on her course, by obviating the difficulties of steering the larger vessel. At our end, the line is laid into a case in the cliff at St. Margaret's, South Foreland. At Middlekerke, on the Belgian shore, it is passed into a coast-guard hut. Thus London and Belgium are now within speaking distance.

THE BRITISH CENSUS OF 1851.

The census of 1851 has taken upwards of two years to collate, correctly compute, and, out of the wonderful information afforded by it, to develop those important facts which, by accumulating in this manner, tend to elucidate the law of population.

The labours of March, 1851, have been only correctly reported in the summer of 1853, in the shape of two monster volumes published by the authority of Parliament. As these invaluable returns, with the skillful manipulations of them by the commissioners to whom the important task was delegated, will unfortunately, from their vast size and cost, be placed beyond the reach of the reading public, we think we could not better occupy a portion of our pages than by laying before our readers the leading results which have just been obtained, or rather arranged in intelligible order, from this remarkable decennial transaction.

The total population, then, of Great Britain and the islands in the British seas, in 1851, was 21,121,967, and not 20,936,463, as was incorrectly announced during the same year. Of this number, 10,366,048 were males, and 10,755,919 females: showing an excess of females over the males of 349,871. Good news this for the bachelor community! We hope, now that fact has been satisfactorily determined, that we shall not be tormented with their lugubrious complaints. Should they persist in the annoyance, we shall emphatically point to the figures 349,871.

This, considering the higher rate of mortality among men than among women, cannot be considered as a very alarming feature. It seems to be a law of nature that the females should preponderate; and no doubt the discovery of this fact by barbarous nations and tribes originally led to that horrible crime, female infanticide. We are not quite so cruel. Our philanthropists only wish to export this lovely surplus to distant climes, just as they would send a bale of cotton goods, correctly labelled, to New York or Botany Bay.

The object of these two volumes is not only to exhibit these and other facts, but to show how they were arrived at. In the first place, there was a judicious subdivision of labour to be effected; and then the construction of adequate machinery.

For these purposes, it was necessary to obtain from those who alone could furnish it—viz., heads of families or institutions—an authentic account of the numbers under their respective roofs. For this purpose, the whole country was divided by imaginary lines into registration districts, the registration districts into sub-districts, and the sub-districts into enumeration districts. The two former divisions already existed under the civil registration, but the latter was carried for the purpose of the census. Of the enumeration districts there were 30,610—each being assigned to one enumerator, who was to complete his enumeration in one day. Each householder of the district accounted to the enumerator for the inmates of his house; but there were some persons who were inmates of no houses at all: for instance—miners, travellers, and policemen had to be computed by a distinct machinery; and, besides these classes, there were the persons who might be sleeping on boats or barges, in barns, in tents, or in the open air.

The latter was a matter of some difficulty, and only an approximation under any circumstances could have been expected. Indeed, when we consider the number of tramps in this country, the number of English and bond fide gipsies, the enormous amount of the vagabond class—in the metropolis alone being no less than 100,000—together with the feverish dread entertained by young men of being drawn for the militia, we cannot but arrive at the conclusion that the census, admirably as it was managed, considerably underrates the actual population of the British isles. In one instance, a whole tribe of gipsies struck their tents to escape the enumerator. But, notwithstanding these drawbacks present us with some interesting as well as painful features. It appears that on the particular night of the census, 12,924 people are believed to have been sleeping in barges, 9972 in barns, and 8277 in the open air or under tents. It is rather curious that in 1841 the number of the houseless class was larger—viz., 22,303; but this is explained by the fact that the census was then taken at a season (June 7) when many Irish and other labourers were engaged in the hay harvest. Had the reckoning fallen upon the present summer, this class of the returns might have been increased by the whole garrison of Chobham Camp.

But the statistics of a census do not stop at mere numerals. There is an attempt made—and successfully, we think—to discriminate and classify the population. And to do this it was necessary to arrive at a proper definition of the terms "a family," "a house," and "a town."

According to the precedents of former censuses, even a single lodger, not boarding in the house of which he was the inmate, constituted a "family;" but on the present occasion the difficulty has been partly evaded by substituting the word "occupier" in place of the "family" of former returns. As to the word "house," the question is, whether a mansion or tenement inhabited by many individuals or families on different floors—as in Scotland—or in different chambers—as in our Inns of Court—constitutes one house or many. On former occasions the decision of this point was actually considered impossible, but at present it seems to have been ruled that houses are "isolated dwellings, or dwellings separated by party walls"—a definition which would bring the attic tenanted by a single young man lodger in the same category with the lodge of a turnpike-gate. In Great Britain the number of families has risen from 2,260,802, in 1801, to 4,312,388 in 1851. The last half century has seen 1,815,567 "new lines of families" established in England; while in Scotland the number has increased from 364,079 to 609,098, notwithstanding the migratory propensities imputed to its inhabitants. The number of "inhabited houses" in Great Britain was returned at 3,648,347, against 3,446,797 in the last census, and 1,870,476 in 1801. Omitting decimals, we might state that there was 1 family to a house, 5 persons to a house, and 4 persons to a family.

After this the commissioners deal with the question of "towns;" and they very properly accept the term as including all aggregations of dwellings above the small groups called villages or hamlets. Having thus discriminated, we are informed that of the class comprised under the terms villages or hamlets—that is to say, of "places having defined boundaries, and separately returned in population tables," there are 17,150; while of genuine towns there are in England and Wales, 580; in Scotland, 225; and the Channel Islands, 10. Besides these points there are those of relative population, of relative territorial area, and of the proximity of the towns to each other—all which are carefully discussed. "Conceive," says the report, "an area of 58,320 square miles, divided into 583 squares, each containing 25 square figures of 4 square miles; a market town in the central square containing 15,501 inhabitants, and the 24 similar squares arranged symmetrically around it in villages, containing churches and chapels and houses, holding in the aggregate 16,000 inhabitants. Now, imagine the figures to be of every variety of form as well as size, and a clear idea is obtained of the way that the ground of the island has been taken up and is occupied by the population."

There is one omission in the report which we regret—that is, the number and character of the new towns. Railways have surely done something in this way. However, as the labours of the commissioners were arduous enough in all conscience, we pass on to "the territorial" subdivisions of the kingdom: and the report lucidly recapitulates the ancient divisions of Britain from the earliest times, including the divisions made by the Romans and Saxons successively—the state of the country under the Heptarchy—and the arrangement by shires, hundreds, and tithings, which we owe to Alfred the Great. Then that wide phrase "British population" is accurately determined. In the report, "the British population"—that is to say, we Englishmen, Welchmen, and Scotchmen—are described as being distributed "over a great multitude of islands rising between the Atlantic and the North Sea," of which Great Britain is the largest. Probably no one ever understood the term "British isles" in so very precise a sense, which seems more applicable to Venetian than British territory. Yet the expression is perfectly correct. The "British isles" are actually five hundred in number, though only 175 were found to be inhabited on the morning of March 31, 1851. Of these islands we have a list, with their names and population. Great Britain had over 20 millions of inhabitants, and Ireland over 6 millions; Anglesea, Jersey, the Isle of Man, and the Isle of Wight had each more than 50,000; and Guernsey, Lewis, Skye, and Shetland over 20,000. From these, however, we descend very rapidly to classes with 10,000, 1000, 500, 400, 100, 40, 30, 20, and 10 inhabitants each, till we finally get to a man with an island all to himself. The name of this British Selkirk is not given, but his abode is called Inchcolm, and is "apparently a territorial appanage of Fife."

In conclusion, the commissioners draw our attention to the circumstance that, since 1801, the population in the British isles has doubled, and that though the general rate of increase has varied, owing to the action of epidemics and emigration, the sexes have preserved their proportions—viz., about 90 males to 31 females. This, looked at attentively, is an enormous increase. It is ten millions in half a century—equal to the increase during every preceding age. It would be hazardous to speculate upon such a gratifying state of the population in 1861; but probably when the commissioners have published their elaborations on the Irish census, we shall be better enabled—perhaps authoritatively entitled—to advance an opinion on this, the most momentous subject that can concern a nation.

A LESSON TO MATCH-MAKERS.

BY A. B. NEAL.

"AND these are your drawings, Josephine! dear me, how very clever you are!"

"Oh, that portfolio—these are mere trifles I painted in oils all last term. There's my music, after all! I could not think where Minny had put it."

"Did Minny do all your packing?"

"Every bit: she's the most amiable creature you ever saw. Madame Lausaut wanted to change, and give me Ellen Lyons for a room-mate—but I wasn't going to hear that. She was so idle she could scarcely take care of herself—much more put the room in order. I never touched a thing. You've no idea how I've improved in music—do you play?"

"Only a little music that I like, those waltzes mother used to play years ago, and some songs."

"But don't you sing exercises, scales, and all that? I was in hopes you did, for I learned some charming duets with mademoiselle, and they'll be quite lost if you don't. I depended on it, Julia."

"I'm very sorry," began Julia deprecatingly, as she saw a shade cross the young beauty's face; but Josephine had already forgotten it in humming a favourite air, with an astonishing display of "extras," as she turned over her music.

"This is so lovely—from 'Sonnambula'—la la la la—ah ah ah ah ah—oh, how difficult that accompaniment is! I meant to have you accompany me—it's so tiresome to have to keep up instrumental practice. I was so disappointed to see that stupid old piano in the parlour still. I've set my heart on a new one."

"But I wouldn't change for a great deal: I love that old piano—it has given me so many happy hours—and I'm sure it's very sweet-toned yet."

"Yes; but such thin legs; and there ought to be another octave and a half—a great deal of my music is written so. Who comes here now? Do put up these muslins, there's a good girl, and just hang up these dresses—take care, that's my best bonnet—till to-morrow. I did all my shopping in New York, thank goodness! Who comes in, did you say? Mr. Mitchell, of course, stupid as ever; talks law cases to papa, and brings mother a box of prunes New Year's Day; old Mr. Williams, and that inquisitive young Locke. How stupid everybody will seem after Albany!"

"Mr. Lawrence is not stupid."

"What Mr. Lawrence?" inquired Miss Josephine, sharply, knocking down a pile of school-books—lexicons and the like—in reaching for an apple.

"Father's partner."

"O dear, yes, I forgot! From Boston, isn't he? Why didn't you write me all about him?"

"You were coming home so soon—but he'll be here to tea, and you can see for yourself."

"To-night! It's well you told me—I was going down in this old wrapper, for I'm tired to death! You needn't hang up that blue muslin—here, these bows go so, just catch them on, won't you? How shall I wear my hair? Is he tall?"

As the looker-on could easily conclude, from the positions and dialogue of the Misses Wood, one was a beauty and a belle—the other, plain, quiet, and unobtrusive. They were engaged at unpacking, in a large, pleasant chamber: that is, Josephine dragged dresses, books, collars, portfolios and under-clothes, from the various trunks and boxes, strewn them round the carpet in almost hopeless confusion; while Julia in vain tried to fulfil her constantly conflicting demands, and bring something like order out of the chaos. It was well enough for Julia to sleep with the children, but now that Josephine was coming home "for good," from the Albany Female Seminary, one of the two best bed-rooms was prepared for her, which Julia was allowed to share. Josephine was her mother's favourite—her father's, too, for that matter; while only the children clung to Julia—and they were often permitted to tyrannise, as children will. But the bright, cheerful Josephine had all the spirit and brilliancy denied to her elder sister—and here was the secret of her popularity. Like most belles, she was careless and selfish—though good-naturedly so—and her sister was one of the readiest of the whole household to submit to her whims and caprices.

Julia had been educated at home, with the indifferent aid of Factoryville schools, and was indebted to quiet perseverance and an extended range of reading for the cultivation she possessed. The children were troublesome on the days she should have been sent from home; but on the pet of the family no pains or expense had been spared. She had a good voice, and a taste for the more showy accomplishments. She was allowed music and drawing, and even dancing lessons, to her heart's content. Mr. Wood had been troubled with conscientious scruples about dancing before this. So, with every talent for popularity, Josephine won it wherever she was. The servants flattered her, teachers praised her, school-mates looked up to her, and copied and quoted her. No wonder she was a little spoiled, and that she took precedence of her plain elder sister at home, as a matter of course.

Julia was not so exceedingly plain, nor so old, after all—in reality only nineteen, though so grave and quiet—and then her eyes, and teeth, and hair were good. But her hair did not curl, nor her teeth dazzle when she smiled, nor her eyes sparkle; but they had a deep, tender, quiet light and expression all their own, when she looked at you long enough for you to notice it. She was staid—almost grave in her ways—with quite a motherly care over the children; and, every one agreed, "cut out for an old maid." We wonder how it chanced that neat drawers, orderly closets, careful habits, and a patient, much-enduring disposition, should come to be considered as certain signs of a disposition towards single-blessedness—when any one knows they are the qualities most needed in domestic life; and by the same rule of contraries, a gay, thoughtless, careless creature, bent on self-indulgence and the whim of the moment, is considered a fair candidate for matrimony.

As her toilet had commenced, Josephine could not be expected to attend to the affairs of unpacking any longer; and while she brushed, and rolled, and curled, and braided her dark, abundant hair, Julia—still on her knees by the trunks—grew weary and flushed with stooping or lifting, or contriving places for the numberless articles in this heterogeneous collection; the belle condescending now and then to make a suggestion—very much in the tone of a command—and which was sure to give a great deal of trouble, to no purpose.

Her sister remembered that the next day was Saturday, with its own burdensome share of domestic duties, and she would not have a moment to finish the task; besides, it was to her a matter of physical impossibility to sleep in a room so littered. So the tea-bell rang while she was pinning Josephine's collar, and searching at the same time among a pile of rumpled muslins for a certain pair of under-sleeves. With her hair and dress in confusion, she was obliged to excuse herself; knowing, at the same time, there would be no one to wait on the younger children, and keep them quiet. But Julia was accustomed to these little disappointments—dignified by modern story-writers as sacrifices—and gave a most sincere glance of admiration at the light and graceful figure, as her sister left the room—so airy, yet so elegant, in the simple blue lawn dress and lace edgings.

"How Mr. Lawrence will admire her!" she thought, turning, with something like a sigh of weariness, to the pile of books she was transferring to shelves at the other end of the room. It was more than an hour before anything was arranged to her satisfaction, and then she was summoned to see the children to bed; so that the evening was half gone before, work-basket in hand, she entered the parlour. She had heard Josephine at the piano, and expected to find Mr. Lawrence beside her; but no! only the family circle—Mr. Wood, as usual, with his back to the centre table, examining accounts at the old-fashioned "secretary"—as he invariably pronounced it; Mrs. Wood sat by the globe-lamp, stitching away in industrious silence; and Josephine, with a not very amiable expression of countenance, made the poor old piano tremble with the heavy chords and octaves of a variation. She rose and came to the table as her sister entered, and commenced, rather sharply:

"I thought you told me there would be company to tea?"

"There generally is on Friday night, Josephine!"

"Well, you might have known, certainly, before you gave me the trouble of dressing! It's so provoking to take all the trouble for nothing!"

Julia's linen collar and cambric under-sleeves would have been just the same under any circumstances. She could not imagine the annoyance of looking one's very best, with nobody to see it.

"I'm sure your father was very much pleased to see how nice you looked!" Mrs. Wood said, emphatically, as if father's admiration ought to be quite a sufficient reward for any pains.

"Father! why, I don't believe he knows whether I have on a calico or a flannel dress!" and the red lips curled a little more than they should have done, as she glanced towards the stiff, square figure of the manufacturer, whose eyes were fastened—silver-rimmed spectacles and all—on the ledger before him.

Julia was sorry for her sister: she knew, from long and lonely experience, that their evenings at home were by no means gay and social. Her father was always absorbed in a review of the business of the day, or reading the latest date newspaper; and as Mrs. Wood was one of those who "cannot work and talk too," they generally had a quiet sewing duet until half-past nine, when prayers came as the close of the evening, and then to bed—to commence the next morning with the same unvaried, monotonous routine. How many families there are, in which the cheerful evening hours are thus made but a lengthening out of a day of toil and busy care. How much better for the health of mind and body, to "work while the day lasts," and devote this time to relaxation, reading, conversation, lighter employments that do not interfere with these: so that not only home is made happy to its inmates, who have something to look forward to at the close of business hours, but becomes attractive to a pleasant circle of friends from without, who will add variety to the chat or the incident.

Josephine had no work: she borrowed her mother's scissors, and commenced snipping the darning cotton with which Julia was repairing a very large, family-looking basket of stockings, and yawned, and wished somebody would come in. A faint tinkle of the door-bell, a stamp of somebody's feet on the door-step, heard distinctly through the open window, seemed a response to the aspiration. Julia neither looked up nor down, but commenced running a very large "thin place," as composedly as before; but her sister smoothed her curls, and shook out her dress, with kindling eyes fixed on the parlour door, which opened slowly to usher in—Mr. Mitchell.

"Of all people!" thought the mortified beauty. "The same tiresome, prosy, stupid old bachelor!"

She was quite disgusted by the alacrity of her father's salutation, and prepared herself for the very same remark he had used on all vacation visits, and which he evidently intended as a joke. It came accordingly.

"Dear me, Miss Josephine, how you have grown! Almost a young lady, I declare! Well, are you finished yet?"

She wondered how Julia could listen so patiently to his ponderous civilities, delivered in the same measured manner, and half-smothered, droning voice, she could remember ever since her earliest recollection—for Mr. Mitchell had been her father's friend and groomsmen, and had made it a point to visit the family once a week ever since. "Julia might talk to him for all she cared!" and with sudden interest she became deeply absorbed in the fashion article of a two-months' old "Lady's Book," not so entirely, however, that a second ring did not call an eager flush of expectation to her face.

It was a much lighter step, and a much more agreeable tone of voice, that sounded in the passage. Josephine was convinced, before the visitor entered, that Mr. Lawrence had come at last; though now she did not condescend to notice his entrance, until her father said, with quite an unusual bustle of introduction for him:

"My second daughter, Josephine, Mr. Lawrence."

"My daughter Josephine" condescended to give a very rapid but scrutinising glance, as she acknowledged the acquaintance: the result of which was, that Mr. Lawrence was neither tall nor short, handsome nor plain—but rather stylish in comparison to the Factoryville beaux generally. He had whiskers, and wore gloves. His hand was certainly in contrast to the broad, uncovered knuckles Mr. Mitchell was exhibiting on the work-table. He did not say much to Julia, beyond inquiring for her health, and asking how she liked the last book he had loaned her. He seemed more particularly interested in the children, inquiring of Mrs. Wood if Johnny had recovered from his fall, and how Sam got home from the woods the night before, and whether Mary had summoned courage to have her tooth out yet. He was a great favourite with Mrs. Wood, that was plain; and as Mr. Mitchell continued devoted to Julia and the darning cotton, the belle gradually found herself putting forth all her powers of fascination for the benefit of the new comer. Mr. Lawrence spoke of the last "Art Journal." "Did he draw?"

"A little—he sketched from nature; and Miss Wood?"

Her mother answered that question with a prompt "Oh, of course! Josephine, my dear, why don't you get your drawings, and show them to Mr. Lawrence? He would like very much to see them."

Miss Wood was sure she could not think or trouble him with such childish affairs, and the end of it was that Mr. Lawrence devoted the whole evening to the fair artist, over the portfolio and pianoforte—for he was also very fond of music.

As for Josephine, her listlessness had all vanished. She smiled, she chatted, she sang and played her very best, and talked herself to sleep after the visit was over, admiring Mr. Lawrence, and pronouncing Julia very stupid not to do so.

Poor Julia! How did the sleeping beauty know that? She did admire Mr. Lawrence more than any man she had ever met. She never knew how much until this evening, when he had scarcely spoken to her, and she had found time, between Mr. Mitchell's studied remarks, to listen to his clever repartee, or watch his animated face, as he listened to Josephine's songs. She had expected him to admire her sister, and had thought what a relief it would be to the city-bred young lady to find so agreeable a person almost domesticated with them. But he need not have been quite so much engrossed, she thought, as to forget to ask if she would like the second part of "Hazlitt's Table Talk"—which she did want very much. However, it was only natural, perhaps: she was so plain and quiet, Josephine so full of life and animation. She was so beautiful, too—and gentlemen always cared for beauty above everything else; yes, she was very beautiful—for Julia turned and looked at that fair face nestling in the pillow near her—the lips so red and full, the cheek dimpling with some pleasant dream, and the dark lashes shading it so softly. No wonder every one admired and loved her; and with a feeling of almost motherly fondness, Julia bent over and kissed her fair young sister very softly, blessing her in her heart.

Mr. Lawrence sat in the family pew at church, and walked home by the young ladies, very naturally, after service. Josephine looked more charming than ever in the simple but elegant white crape hat, with a few blue harebells near the face. And the floating, wavy flounces of her barège dress were so becoming to her figure. Julia felt almost cloudy in the Dunstable straw, with its plain satin ribbons, and the white dress, now in its second season. She saw the many admiring glances Josephine received, and gradually fell back, taking little Mary's hand, and leaving them to walk on alone. They certainly did look very well together, and Mrs. Wood thought so, too: from that moment it became "a match" in her mind.

Everything favoured the growing intimacy of the young people. For once the course of true love seemed to run as smooth as heart could wish. They practised together, and Mr. Lawrence looked over and corrected Josephine's drawings. Mr. Wood always made his young and influential partner welcome, and he as steadily resisted all the efforts of his senior to entice him into talking business after business hours. Perhaps this was one reason why Mrs. Wood liked him so well. There were various parties given during the fall and winter, in honour of Miss Josephine's return; and Mr. Lawrence was their escort, as a matter of course, Julia seeming more in the light of a chaperone, than needing one.

Of course all the Factoryville belles grew very jealous of the new comer.

"She put on so many airs, as if nobody had ever been at boarding-school before!"

"She dressed so much more than poor Julia!" said another.

"And is determined to monopolise Mr. Lawrence!" added an amiable trio. But none of these things moved the young lady herself: she was tasting the intoxicating draught of general admiration, and she had no time to bestow on distanced competitors.

Spring came on again, and the family gathered more in the sitting-room, leaving the parlour, by tacit consent, to the lovers, as they were generally supposed to be. Mr. Wood had talked it over with his wife, and concluded it would be an excellent arrangement, as far as business was concerned.

"A son-in-law would feel so much more interest than a stranger."

And Mrs. Wood thought she might as well give Julia a hint about leaving the parlour occasionally, or being engaged sometimes when a walk was proposed.

Poor Julia! she took it meekly, as she did all her mother's instructions. She confined herself more than ever to the family mending, while Josephine trifled with cambric ruffles and a gold thimble. It was quite right in her eyes that when but one of them could have a new shawl, Josephine should be that one; or when Mr. Lawrence invited the young ladies to ride, mother should wish her particularly to oversee the baking. She began to think she should like to have the wedding over soon, and that she would be an old maid, as every one predicted, after all. Indeed, she told Mr. Mitchell so, when, to her utter astonishment, he proposed to bestow on her the honour of his hand and name. Mr. Mitchell received it very calmly; said that perhaps it was the most sensible way of living, after all; and he hoped she would not think of mentioning their little conversation. He need not have uttered the last piece of advice; but by the time she reached home alone, she had begun to wonder whether she had not dreamed the whole interview, so improbable did it appear.

Her mother stopped her on the stairs, to say she was very late—the dressmaker must have kept her a great while; they were through tea, and Mr. Lawrence had asked "father" if he could see him alone a few moments that evening. "So you see if it isn't just as I said!" Mrs. Wood added triumphantly; "and I only wish Josy was at home: she's at your aunt's, and won't be here before night."

Julia was glad to hear it—all of it; she did not wish for any tea, and she wanted to be alone in her room. She was glad she knew Mr. Lawrence was going to propose—she could think it all over.

Poor Julia, once again. She did not seem very happy, after all, as she untied her bonnet, and sat down on a low sewing-chair by the open window. She was not jealous of her sister's happiness, but she envied her the power of winning love and sympathy. Her own lot seemed so lonely and unvaried. The round of household duties—the constant and almost imperceptible tax upon her time, and strength, and energies, as the elder sister of a large household—the want of cheerful companionship, especially when Josephine should be in a home of her own,—it was this that had made the visits of Mr. Lawrence so pleasant at first; he had given her an interest out of herself, described what she herself had felt in speaking of their favourite authors, which neither her father nor mother even knew by name. Before Josephine came he had almost seemed to like her. Only a month ago, he came and stood by her one evening, and asked her how it was he saw so little of her now; and he offered her his hand so kindly. Sometimes she was sure she had seen him look towards her from the piano, as if he was sorry she was so dull and lonely—but then he was so kind to every one. How happy Josephine would be with such constant love and watchful care. How could she speak so lightly of it? No longer ago than yesterday she said in that very room, with a toss of the head: "Mr. Lawrence need not think himself so very sure of her, after all—he was not the only man in the world!"

She heard him in the hall below inquiring for her father, and started as she thought how soon she would be called upon to welcome him as a brother. She was "very nervous," she said to herself—her walk had been too long. She must have been—for when she tried to think only how very beautiful the trees looked in the garden below, silvered by the moonlight, which seemed to call out the faint breath of the just opening lilacs, a mist of unbidden tears hid it from her view, and, laying her head on the window-seat, she sobbed like a tired child.

Her father's voice, calling, "Julia—Julia!" from the sitting-room door, recalled her to herself, after a miserable hour. She had been so absorbed that she had not even heard Mr. Lawrence go out; but of course he would bring Josephine home from her aunt's, and she must prepare to meet and congratulate them. It was very foolish in her to feel so—she ought to be very thankful she was going to have Mr. Lawrence for a brother. She descended the stairs slowly, nevertheless, that her eyes might have all the time she could gain, to recover their usual hue—so slowly that her father came to the door again, as if to send up another impatient summons.

Mr. Wood made few prefaces. Perhaps it was just as well.

"I suppose you knew Mr. Lawrence came to see me to-night?" he began, abruptly.

"Yes, sir."

"And not on business, either—that is, not concerning the factory. I must confess I was surprised."

"I was not, sir," said Julia, looking up, and trying to speak cheerfully.

"Not surprised? He assured me he had never mentioned the matter to you!"

"He never has, sir—but it was very easy to see it!"

"Bless my heart!" broke in Mr. Wood, abruptly, "your mother and I always thought his attentions were directed to Josephine!"

"Yes, sir, to Josephine."

"And wanting you all the while! Well, I must say I never courted your aunt Jane, when I wanted to marry your mother!"

"Oh, indeed you are mistaken—it is Josephine! he never speaks to me."

"He says he can never get a chance, and that's why he came to ask me if we had any objection to his addressing you."

"Oh no, sir—indeed it was Josephine! I always left—"

"Indeed it was not, little sceptic!" and before the poor child could think of an escape, or what it all could mean, she was for the first time in her life alone with Mr. Lawrence—Mr. Wood considerably leaving the argument in his hands. He seemed to have brought forth most convincing proof that he knew his own mind—for in an incredibly short space of time Julia had changed her opinion, and came to the conclusion that she would not like to have him for "a brother" at all.

"But you always walked with Josephine?"

"And you sang with her?"

"You never would touch the piano after she came. You know I always liked your ballads better than opera songs, that were never written for the parlour."

"But she is so pretty!"

"And you are so good, and so unselfish, and so dear!" he said, clasping the hand that he held more closely.

"What shall I do or say to convince you that it is you, and not Josephine, I want for my wife?"

It is due to the discomfited beauty to state that she bore the turn affairs had taken with wondrous equanimity, and exerted all her taste and skill in the arrangement of the trousseau. Nay, she even flirted violently at the wedding (which was the grandest affair, thanks to her, Factoryville had ever seen), with a cousin of Mr. Lawrence, who had come down to be groomsmen; though her rivals insisted "that was all put on to conceal her mortification, anybody could tell." Mr. Mitchell did not venture his usual stereotyped wedding joke about the happy pair, but retired into a corner with Mr. Wood, who was glad to refresh himself in so unusual an atmosphere, by a little sensible talk on the tariff.

After all, Josephine became Mrs. Lawrence, by marrying the Boston cousin—who, being passionately fond of gay society and the polka, was much more to her fancy than Julia's husband. It was hard to say which was happier—each in her own way—Julia devoted to her husband and her household, where Mr. Mitchell, after a time became a regular weekly visitor—or Josephine in her round of city engagements; but certainly neither one of them ever repented the choice their father's partner had made.

A Persian philosopher being asked by what means he acquired so much knowledge, he answered: "By not being prevented by shame from asking questions when I was ignorant."

FACETIÆ.

WHIS-KEY.—The key that opens the door of death and destruction.

"You look as if you were beside yourself," as the wag said to a dunce who stood by a donkey.

An alligator is a deceitful creature, and yet he presents an open countenance, when in the act of taking you in.

VERY GOOD.—A contemporary, mis-spelling the word Kissagen, says: "Lord and Lady Normanby are going to Kissagen!"

WHAT A JEWEL!—An obituary, very eulogistic of a lady, says: "She was married twenty-four years, and in all that time never once banged the door."

PLEASANT AFFLICTION.—There is a young man in Toledo who has grown round-shouldered through bending over so much to kiss the girls, who are rather short in his neighbourhood.

In a country news-room in Yorkshire, the following notice is written over the chimney: "Gentlemen learning to spell, are requested to use yesterday's paper."

"'Tis false!" as the girl said, when her beau told her she had beautiful hair.

"I shall die like a hero," said the coal, when it was being consumed; "for I shall mix with the ashes of the grate."

A FALSE ALARM.—A superstitious Irishman—an implicit believer in ghosts—fell into a state of great excitement the other day, upon hearing that several contributions were to be sent to the Dublin Exhibition from the Gobelins of Paris.

"You are writing my bill on very rough paper," said a client to his attorney. "Never mind," said the lawyer, "it has to be filed before it comes into court."

VERY TRUE.—Miss Dubois says she may be old now, but she has seen the day when she was as young as ever she was.

The latest report of Paris fashions says: "Bonnets are very small, and are more worn about the neck than on the head." We suppose shoes will be tied round the ankles before long.

If the best man's faults were written on his forehead, it would make him pull his hat over his eyes.

JUST CAUSE AND IMPEDIMENT.—A handsome young Yankee pedlar made love to a buxom widow of Pennsylvania. He accompanied his declaration with an allusion to two impediments to their union. "Name them?" said the widow. "The want of means to set up a retail store." They parted, and the widow sent the pedlar a cheque for ample means. When they met again the pedlar had hired and stocked his store, and the smiling fair one begged to know the other impediment. "I have got another wife!"

THERE is a man in town so witty that his wife manufactures all the butter that the family uses from the cream of his jokes.

TOM MOORE said to Peel, on looking at the picture of an Irish orator: "You can see the very quiver of his lips." "Yes," said Peel, "and the arrow coming out of it." Moore was telling this to one of his countrymen, who answered: "He meant arrah coming out of it."

JUDGE a man by his actions—a poet by his eye—an idler by his fingers—a lawyer by his leer—a player by his strut—a boxer by his sinews—an Irishman by his swagger—an Englishman by his rotundity—a Scotchman by his shrug—a justice by his frown—a great man by his modesty—an editor by his coat—a tailor by his agility—a fiddler by his elbow—and a woman by her neatness.

"Mr son," said Mr. Spriggins to his little son, who was devouring an egg—it was Mr. Spriggins's desire to instruct his boy—"my son, do you know that chickens come out of eggs?" "Do they, father?" said the young hopeful; "I thought the reverse." The elder Spriggins drew back from the table, sadly, and gazed on his son, then put on his hat and went out.

WANTED.—To find the jeweller, who made the welkin ring.

HARD TO INTERPRET.—The post-office men, who are obliged to read and construe the superscriptions on the various letters, have a task which must exercise all their ingenuity. One day lately, a Convocation of the Philadelphia post-office clerks was held over an irregularly-shaped billet, the direction on which was precisely as follows: "Mysterec A Jay Burd, Lung at combing knew gursy you knighted staid." After two hours and a half of hard study, one of the young gentlemen solved the riddle, and this was the interpretation thereof: "Mr. E. A. J. Bird, Long-a-coming, New Jersey, United States."

POLITENESS ALWAYS MEETS WITH ITS REWARD.—The following is from a French paper: "Sir, sir, you have dropped some papers!" said a young man, the other morning, to a person passing. "Sir, I am very much obliged to you!" said the other, turning round and picking up a large bundle. "Excuse me," continued he, "but have I not the honour of addressing Mr. P——?" "That is my name," said the young man, with some surprise. "Ay, I thought so. I am very lucky in meeting you. I am an officer of the Tribunal of Commerce, and am ordered to arrest you on a bill of exchange for one thousand five hundred francs. The paper which you were so kind as to tell me I dropped, is the summons against you!"

It has been said of the late celebrated Rothschild, that though no man was less lavish of his money, no one was more ready to detect a love of it in others. It was one day, while at a city feast, that a gentleman observed, that, for his part, he thought venison was very good, but that he loved mutton better. "Ah, ah! I knowsy vy! it is becaush he does not like to pay de prisbe: it is becaush mutton's sheep, and venshon's deer."

A YANKEE IN LOVE.—Oh dear, what nonsense people talk about love, don't they? Sleepless nights—broken dreams—beatin' hearts—pale faces—a pinin' away to ahadders—fits of absence—loss of appetite—nervous flutterins—and all that. I haven't got the symptoms, but I'll swear to the disease. Folks take this talk, I guess, from poets; and they are miserable, mooney sort of critters, half mad and whole lazy, who would rather take a day's dream than a day's work any time, and catch rhymes as niggers catch flies, to pass time—hearts and darts, cupid and stupid, purlin' streams and pulin' dreams, and so on. It's all bunkum! Spooney looks and spooney words may do for schoolboys and seminary girls; but for a man like me, and an angeliferous critter like Sophy, love must be like electricity—eye for eye, and heart for heart, telegraphed backwards and forwards like 'fled lightning.—Sam Slick's Wise Sawes.

LORD PETERBOROUGH AND THE CANARY.—Lady Suffolk relates one of his adventures told her by himself, which contrasts ludicrously with the stirring events in which he was then engaged. He was in love, or fancied himself in love, with a young lady who was very fond of birds: she had seen and heard a remarkably fine canary in a coffee-house near Charing Cross, and entreated her lover, in proof of his affection, to obtain it for her. The owner of this coveted pet was a widow, who was so much attached to it that she refused an enormous price which Mordaunt offered. He was, however, determined to gain his point by foul means, since fair had failed. By great exertion he managed to obtain another bird of exactly the same size and colour, but it chanced to be a voiceless hen; he then frequented the house to await his opportunity. The landlady usually sat in a room behind the bar, always accompanied by her beloved canary, of which she seldom lost sight. One day Mordaunt, under some pretext, contrived to get her out of the way for a few minutes, and with great dexterity exchanged his bird for that of the hostess, and carried off the prize undiscovered. Shortly after the revolution, he for the first time, ventured to touch upon this dangerous subject to the landlady, saying: "I would have bought that bird of yours, and you refused my money for it; I dare say you are by this time sorry for it." "Indeed, sir," answered she, "I am not, nor would I now take any money for him; for, would you believe it? from the time that our good king was forced to go abroad and leave us, the dear creature has not sung a note!"

WOMEN AND SALMON.—Oh, it's beautiful play that! You may talk of playin' a salmon arter he is hooked, and the sport of seein' him jump clean out of the water in his struggles, a racin' off and being snubbed again, and reeled up, till he is almost bagged, when dash, splash, he makes another spring for it, and away he goes as hard as he can lick, and runs out the line, and whirr-r! and then another hour's play before he gives in. Well, it's grand no doubt. It's very excitin'; but what's that sport to seein' a woman play her husband? The wife, too, is just such a gaudy-lookin' fly as that which the salmon was fool enough to be hooked with, and got up just as nateral. Oh, how I have watched one of 'em afore now at that game! Don't she enjoy it, the little dear, smilin' all the time like an angel, most bewitchin' sweet; bright little eyes, sparklin' like diamonds, and her teeth lookin' so white, and her face so composed, and not a breath to heave her beautiful bosom, or swell her allerbaster neck, but as quiet and gentle throughout as one of the Graces; and her words so sweet, all honey, and usin' such endearin' names, too, you'd think she was courtin' a most. But the honey makes the words stick, and the fond names cover a sting, and some phrases that are so kind have a hidden meaning that makes poor hubby jump right on end, and when he roars with pain and rage, she lays down her pencil or her embroidery, and looks up in surprise, for she was occupied before and didn't notice nothin'. Oh, what a look of astonishment she puts on!—Sam Slick's Wise Sawes.

SAM SLICK AND THE QUACK DOCTOR.—"Now, Mr. Slick, have you any more medical secrets of natur?" "I have," said I. "I can cure the jamdice in a few days, when doctors can make no fist of it, anyhow they can fix it; and the remedy is on every farm, only they don't know it. I can cure in an hour or two that awful ague in the face, that folks, specially women, are subject to; and can make skin grow when it is broken on the shin-bone, and other awkward places, even in the case of an old man, that doctors only make wus; and effect a hundred other cures. But that's neither here nor there, and I ain't a-goin' to set up for a doctor; I didn't come to brag, but to larn. That is a great herbal cure you have got hold of, though—that's a fact," said I. "What are you going to call it?" "Sure and safe remedy for the dropsy," said he. "You won't sell a bottle," said I. "Simples will do very well inside (and the simpler they are the safer they be), but not outside of patent medicines. Call it 'The Vegetable Anasarca Specific,' an easy, safe, and speedy cure for anasarca, or dropsy in the skin; the ascites, or dropsy in the stomach; the hydrops pectoris, or dropsy in the breast; and the hydrocephalus, or dropsy of the brain. Put the first in gold letters on the label, the second in green, the third in pink, and the fourth in blue. You must have a fine name to please the ear, a nice-looking bottle to please the eye, and somethin' that is perfumed and smells nice to please the nose. But everything is in a name. When I was in Windsor, Nova Scotia, I met an old nigger—which we call a Chesapeake nigger—one of them niggers Admiral Sir John Warren was fool enough to give Bluenose to support. I was then about three miles out of the village. 'Well, Cato Cooper,' said I, 'What little church is that standin' there?' 'Dat nigger church, massa,' said he. 'Built a purpose for niggers.' 'Well, I hope you go often?' 'Dat is just what I do, massa. College students preach dere, and dere is one ob de beautifullest preachers moug' em you eber did hear respond a text. Oh! he splains it rail haedsome. Nebber was uffin like it, his sarmon is more nor half Latin and Greek, it are beautiful to hear, there ain't a nigger in de settlement don't go to listen to him; its rail dictionary. He converted me. I is a Christian now, since I know all blacks are to be received into the kitchen ob heaven.' 'Now, that nigger is a sample of mankind—big words look larned, and please them.' 'Well, I have a theory about that,' said the quack captain. 'Mankind are gullible, that's a fact—they'll swallow anything a'most, if you only know how to talk 'em into it; that's the only secret, how to persuade 'em. Mankind lives on promises.' 'Well,' said I, 'gullible means taking things down like gulls, and they are awful hungry birds. They go screaming about the mud flat of the river in the basin of Minas, like mad, and swallow a whole herring, one after another, without winking; and now and then a clam, shell and all, as fowls do gravel, to help digestion—but cover a herring over with your nasty stuff, and see if they wouldn't scream loud enough to wake the dead a'most. You must treat men as you would children. Tell them to shut their eyes and open their mouths and take what you would give them, as you do when you play with the little dears, and as long as it is sweet and pleasant, they will swallow anything.'—Sam Slick's Wise Saws.

WISE SAWS, BY SAM SLICK.

"Punctuality," said I, "my lord, is the soul of business. There is an old sayin', 'Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves.' Now take care of the minutes," said I, "and the hours will take care of themselves. Pounds is made up of pence, and hours of minutes. Attention to one airns money for me, and the other saves it. These two rules will make any man rich; and, in fact, my lord, they have made me considerable well to do in this world, as times go."

Thinks I to myself, a man may be a president, and no great shakes either—for after all he is only the lead horse of a team. He has got the go in him, and that's all; but he can't hold back, which is a great matter both in statesmen and horses. For if he slacks up, he is rid over by those behind him, and gets his neck broke—he must go or die.

When grasshoppers are so plenty as to make the pastures poor, gobblers grow fat. Hard times is what you thrive in; when the ponds dry up, the pokes get the pollywogs.

Take your daily bread, and be thankful; but don't pray to the Lord to lay up for you the loaves for years to come, to make you rich. Many a man has died about the time his great baking of bread came out of his oven.

It's no use talkin'. When you are down, poverty, like snow-shoes, keeps your feet fast, and prevents your rising. A man can't hope agin hope.

Work! airn your own pork, and see how sweet it will be! Work, and see how well you will be! Work, and see how cheerful you will be! Work, and see how independent you will be! Work, and see how happy your family will be! Work, and see how religious you will be! for, before you know where you are, instead of repinin' at Providence, you will find yourself offering up thanks for all the numerous blessings you enjoy!

Hope is a pleasant acquaintance, but an unsafe friend. He'll do on a pinch for a travellin' companion, but he is not the man for your banker.

A woman who wants a charitable heart, wants a pure mind. The measure of a female's judgment must be her own feelings; and if she judge harshly, her feelings are not delicate. Her experience is her own; and if that is adverse, it ought, at least, to impose silence. Innocence is not suspicious; but guilt is always ready to turn informer.

Them that have more than their own share of one thing commonly have less of another. Where there is great strength, there ain't apt to be much "gumption." A handsome man in a general way ain't much of a man. A beautiful bird seldom sings. Them that have genius have no common sense. A feller with one idea grows rich; while he who calls him a fool dies poor. The world is like a baked meat-pie: the upper crust is rich, dry, and puffy; the lower crust is heavy, doughy, and underdone. The middle is not bad, generally; but the smallest part of all is that which flavours the whole.

A NATURAL REMARK.—A bystander, seeing chickens hatched by the Hydro-Incubator in Leicester Square, was astonished at the achievement, and wondered whether their mothers knew they were out!—Diogenes.

THE GOOD OLD TIMES RESTORED.

The Age of Gold at the present time in Australia.

The Age of Brass the same in France.

The Age of Bronze the same in Portugal.

The Age of Iron the same in Austria and Russia.

The Age of Lead the same in Rome and Italy.—Ibid.

THE VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.—A newspaper, the other day, in an article advocating early closing principles, contrasted the late hours which were kept in England with the practice in other countries. Amongst other things it mentioned that "In Italy the working-classes leave their work at 24 o'clock." Well, at any rate, we never work more than half as late as that in England!—Ibid.

THE INSURRECTION IN CHINA.—News from China is of a most startling character. The usual services are completely smashed. The emperor is said to be cracked, in consequence of the general upset. Nankin, Tanpin, and Chanpin, are in the hands of the enemy. Chekinangfoo was to be reinforced by four vessels. Who, or what, or where, is Chekinangfoo? Is it a place or a person? The latest information from Shamai is very unsatisfactory and suspicious, and may turn out to be all sham. At Taeping the imperial force succeeded in scattering the enemy, who was smashed into a thousand pieces. Every Coach-in-China has been kidnapped by the emperor, who hopes thus to crow over the rebels.—Diogenes.

THE SEWERS' RATE.—A continual drain on the purse.—Punch.

WELL OFF FOR SOAP.—The late ministers ought to thank the present government for the repeal of the soap duty, since the dockyard disclosures show their hands to be in a state which ought to make them appreciate the benefit of that remission.—Ibid.

DIPLOMACY.—The art of saying something when you have nothing to say—as much as it is the art of saying nothing when you have really got something to say.—Ibid.

TWO THINGS LOOMING IN THE FUTURE.—The repeal of the income-tax in seven years.—The gradual decrease of the tea duty, until it becomes a shilling per pound. These things, far distant though they be, are infinitely better, however, than the things hinted at by Mr. D'Israeli as "looming in the future," who never would fix any date, or tell us when we might reasonably expect them.—Ibid.

ONE (PERHAPS) IN TEN MILLIONS.—It is a strong matter of doubt where there can be found a man in the world who doesn't owe something to his tailor.—Ibid.

FLOWERS OF PROMISE.

AN orchard in bloom in the sunny spring
To me is a wondrous lovely thing:
The silver cherry, and creamy pear,
And the pure white plum looking passing fair;
But fairest of all is the apple, o'erspread
With its lady-like blossoms of white and red.
With strange delight on the scene I dwell—
It breathes a soft and dreamy spell.
Such magic as the past can raise;
It conjures up my early days,
When I learned to read in Nature's book;
And oft was wont, with earnest look,
On the flowery trees to stand and muse,
Whilst rapture would my eyes suffuse,
And I cried, as the bright thought flashed on me,
"What a jolly lot of fruit there'll be!"—Ibid.

THE CONVENIENCE OF BEING SHORT-SIGHTED.—There is a great convenience sometimes in being short-sighted. If a young gentleman happens to meet a creditor, or a friend who is rather "seedy," or a bore who is an untiring button-holder, you quietly pass on; and, when challenged with it afterwards, all you have to say is: "My dear fellow, I'm extremely sorry; the fact is I did not see you, I'm so excessively short-sighted." We know a large man in the City who is always short-sighted directly he spies out a poor relation, and yet, drop a bank-note at his feet, and you'll see how quickly he will pick it up.—Ibid.

THE SPIRITS OF THE DEEP.—A teetotaler taking gin-and-water as medicine.—Ibid.

THE BARREL ORGAN.—The vested interests of the Big Brewers appear to be defended by very Wire-drawn arguments.—Ibid.

A PLEASANT SMELL OF POWDER.—In connection with the subject of the national defences, it may be mentioned that some young gentlemen belonging to a "crack" regiment have raised a subscription in order to constitute a prize, to be offered for the invention of a perfumed gunpowder. The realisation of this desideratum will, it is considered, remove the principal objection to cartridges. Gun-cotton, impregnated with musk, is the nearest approach to the odiferous explosive substance required that has been proposed as yet; but would, it is feared, prove overpowering to friend as well as to foe. A great boon, certainly, would be conferred on delicately-organised officers by the discovery of a gunpowder which, in exploding, would, at the same time, diffuse fragrance around, and scatter destruction afar; delighting those who fire it, and being offensive to none but the enemy.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

AN honourable life is the best legacy a father can leave his children.

GRAVES are the footprints of the angel of eternal life.

DR. CHALMERS says, that one of the strongest temptations he had to contend with was, an undue and unkind aversion to those who had disagreeable peculiarities.

WHEN virtue leaps high in the public fountain, you seek for the lofty spring of nobleness, and find it afar off, in the dear breast of some mother who melted the snows of winter, and condensed the summer's dew into fair, sweet humanity, which now gladdens the face of man in all the city streets.

JARS concealed are half reconciled; while 'tis a double task to stop the breach at home, and men's mouths abroad. To this end a good husband never reproves his wife. An open reproof puts her to do penance before all that are present, after which, many study rather revenge than reformation.

GAIETY is not a proof that the heart is at ease—for often in the midst of laughter the heart is sad.

THE virtue which we gather from a fable or an allegory, is like the health we get by hunting: as we are engaged in an agreeable pursuit, that draws us on with pleasure, and makes us insensible to the fatigues that accompany it.

WHIST AND THE TEMPER.—The strangest thing in the world is the different ways in which whist affects the temper. It is no test of temper, as some pretend—not at all! The best tempered people in the world grow snappish at whist; and I have seen the most testy and peevish in ordinary affairs of life, bear their losses with the stoicism of Epictetus.—Bulwer.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE mother's smile gives her child the first glimpse of heaven, as the tenderness of her affection awakens the first conception of an all-bountiful Providence. Women dwell with patience upon the trifles that make up the lives of their children; and it is on the direction of these seeming trifles that their future greatness will depend. "A kiss from my mother," said Benjamin West, "made me a painter." When yet a child, he had drawn a rude sketch of an infant relation sleeping in a cradle. His mother chanced to see this childish production, and was so well pleased with it that she took the young artist in her arms, and rapturously kissed him. That mark of maternal delight fixed his fate for life.

THE DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND.—An amusing anecdote is related of this distinguished lady, in connection with the meeting held at Stafford House to welcome Mrs. Stowe to this country. As the hostess on the occasion, and the originator of the "Women's Address on Slavery," which led to the gathering, she of course attracted great attention. Besides, her fine figure, her noble and handsome countenance, combined with her courtly manner, rendered her conspicuous amid the brilliant throng by which she was surrounded. An enthusiastic American is said to have been so stricken with admiration, that he blurted forth, with an exceedingly Yankee twang, this remark: "Well, if we had such a queen, I guess we might get on very well at Washington!"

ANTI-PATHIES.—Tycho Brahe, the astronomer, changed colour, and his legs shook under him, at the sight of a fox or hare. Dr. Johnson would never enter a room with his left foot foremost. If by mistake it did get in first, he would step back and place his right foot foremost. Julius Caesar was almost convulsed by the sound of thunder, and always wanted to get in a cellar, or under ground, to escape the dreadful noise. To Queen Elizabeth the simple word "death" was full of horrors. Even Talleyrand trembled and changed colour on hearing the word pronounced. Marshal Saxe, who met and overthrew opposing armies, fled and screamed in terror at the sight of a cat. Peter the Great could never be persuaded to cross a bridge; and though he tried to master the terror, he failed to do so. Whenever he set foot on one he would shriek out in distress and agony. Byron would never help any one to salt at the table, nor would he be helped to any himself. If any of the article happened to be spilled on the table, he would jump up and leave his meal unfinished.

GREAT NATURAL CURIOSITY.—At Kubbepore na Jeal, in India, there is a cannon 213 inches long, 66 inches round the muzzle, and 18 inches round the calibre. It has five, and had originally six, equidistant rings, by which it was lifted up. This gun is called by the natives Jaun Kushall, or the Destroyer of Life, and its casting and position are attributed to the doctas or divinities, though its almost obliterated Persian inscriptions declare its formation by human means. But what is most extraordinary about it is, that two peepul-trees have grown both cannon and carriage into themselves. Fragments of the iron, a spring, one of the linches, and part of the wood-work, protrude from between the roots and bodies of these trees, but the trees alone entirely support the gun, one of the rings of which, and half of the whole length, being completely hidden between and inside their barks and trunks. A more curious sight, or a cannon more firmly fixed, though by the mere gradual growth of two trees, cannot well be imagined. The Indians assert that it was only once fired, and sent the ball twenty-four miles.

FRIEND SORROW.

Do not cheat thy heart and tell her,
Grief will pass away—
"Hope for fairer times in future,
And forget to-day."
Tell her, if you will, that sorrow
Need not come in vain;
Tell her that the lesson taught her
Far outweighs the pain.
Cheat her not with the old comfort,
"Soon she will forget!"
Bitter truth, alas! but matter
Rather for regret.
Bid her not "seek other pleasures,
Turn to other things;"—
Rather nurse her caged sorrow
Till the captive sings.
Rather bid her go forth bravely,
And the stranger greet;
Not as foe, with shield and buckler,
But as dear friends meet;
Bid her with a strong clasp hold her,
By her dusky wings;
And she'll whisper low and gently
Blessings that she brings.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MUSCUS.—The words of a song cannot be set to music, for sale, without the author's permission. Translations of foreign books published in this country are copyright.

JOHN LEE.—There is a wide difference between "to swim" and "to float." The former is a voluntary exertion, the latter merely a result of the law of gravity.

VERITAS.—Grense may be removed from coat-collars by applying spirits of turpentine with a sponge, and when dry rubbing them.

AN ANXIOUS FATHER.—The result of your neglect to register the birth of your child within the proper time will be that, if at any time hereafter it should be necessary to prove his age, a prudent lawyer would assume it to have commenced from the date of the registration. Have the birth registered forthwith. The fee is five shillings.

R. R. N.—You ask which of Fenimore Cooper's novels is the best? We answer, the "Last of the Mohicans;" but it is all a matter of taste. Some prefer his "Spy," an admirable tale; others his "Pilot," and others that trashy thing the "Red Rover."

IGNORANCE.—Become a member of a mechanics' institution. You will then have the advantage of associating with young men of your own age, all of them actuated by the same desire for self-improvement.

S. T. W.—The cost of a marriage before a superintendent registrar of births, deaths, and marriages, including all the notices, is about fifteen shillings.

THOMAS DAWSON.—The Prince of Wales is heir-apparent to the crown. Should he survive his mother, he will be king. Nothing can prevent that—no, not even idiocy or misconduct—but the will of the people.

WIGAM.—Marriages contracted before a superintendent-registrar are quite legal. They are authorised by one of the most important acts ever passed by the British Parliament. The parties must give the registrar notice, which notice is posted up in his office for fourteen days. On the fifteenth day the parties may attend before him and be married, but the doors of his office must be open to the public, just as the law on such occasions insists upon the doors of a church or chapel being open.

PERRY.—Etiquette allows a lady to wear a ring or rings on what finger or fingers she pleases. We have observed ladies of unexceptionable taste wear one on the fore-finger of the left hand, sometimes on the second.

HUPD.—1. You may live as cheaply in England as in any place in the world. All depends on the style and the management. 2. For one Englishman in Glasgow there are a hundred Scotchmen in Manchester. The Englishman, like the Scotchman, likes to leave the North behind him.

C. T. D.—Raspberry-water ice may be made in this manner. Mash a bottle of fresh raspberries in a basin with a little sugar, a gill of syrup, half a pint of water, and a little lemon-juice; mix them together, strain it through a sieve, and then freeze it. This is done by placing the freezing-pot in a pail of ice well mixed with salt, turning it for ten minutes, then taking the top off the freezer, scraping the ice from the sides, and working the contents with the spaddle until they are as smooth as butter.

D. EVANS.—The Southwark sessions are held before the Lord Mayor, the aldermen who have passed the chair, and the recorder, four times a year. The days of sitting are always previously advertised.

G. S. F.—The first passenger railway in either Europe or America, was that between Stockton and Darlington, a distance of twenty miles. The fare was two shillings. The line was opened in 1825, and at first the wagons were drawn by horses, but in the following year two of Stephenson's locomotives were employed.

C. B. asks us whether in the time of Richard II. a law was passed making it high treason to propose a poll-tax. We reply in the negative. Country people, especially in the south of England, have a tradition to that effect, but it is simply a tradition unfounded in fact; and, as our correspondent has drawn our attention to the subject, we unhesitatingly say a poll-tax would be the most just of all taxes. Tax every man according to his means—and how can you fairly ascertain his means, but by his position in society? Let a peer of the realm be taxed as a peer of the realm, a merchant as a merchant, a tradesman as a tradesman, a labourer as a labourer. That would do away with the inquisitorial income-tax, the abominable excise duties, and the vexatious and inexpedient customs duties. Every man then would know what he had to pay; and, as we could easily show, at the year's end he would be considerably the gainer by the arrangement. Simplicity would be introduced into the revenue accounts, two-thirds of the six or seven millions actually expended every year in the collection of taxes, and of course lost, would be saved, and we do not doubt, under a proper system of distribution, would entirely supersede the present cumbersome and oppressive mode of levying and collecting the national taxation. Why, even in the hurry of replying to a letter just come to hand, we can show how a poll-tax could be collected, and made to fall equitably on all classes. In the United Kingdom there are 70,000 proprietors of land, with an average yearly rental of £1000. Their estates being permanent, and their stake in the prosperity and safety of the country being greater than any other class, we think they might reasonably be taxed so as to pay, per head, as much on the average as would amount to one-tenth of their gross incomes. They ought fairly to pay one-tenth of their £70,000,000 towards the necessities of the state. The trades and professions should be dealt with in the same manner. This class numbers 400,000, with incomes from £150 per annum upwards. Let the average for them be £15 a year—a tenth. Those in positions commanding incomes ranging from £100 to £150 are about 300,000; therefore let the average poll-tax for them be £10 a year—a tenth. Those in positions worth only from £50 to £100 per annum, cannot be less than 300,000, therefore take the low estimate, and let them pay, on the average, £5 a head—a tenth. And as the remainder of the adult male population of the United Kingdom would be about 3,500,000, let the poll-tax for them be, say £2 per head per annum. The adult women should also contribute something—for, in fact, they owe a deeper debt of gratitude to the army and navy, the laws, the magistrates, the police, &c., than the sterner sex: so let us put them down at £1 per lovely head per annum. And now what does the group of figures present to us in a column?

70,000 landowners, at £100 per head, per annum	7,000,000
400,000 tradesmen, merchants, manufacturers, and followers of professions, at £15 do. do.	6,000,000
300,000 clerks, mechanics, &c., at £10 do. do.	3,000,000
300,000 clerks, mechanics, labourers, &c., at £5 do. do.	1,500,000
3,500,000 labourers, at £2 do. do.	7,000,000
4,500,000 adult females, at £1 do. do.	4,500,000
	£29,000,000

Why, here is the interest of the national debt at once. But our suggestion would be a poll-tax to cover the whole of the fifty or fifty-one millions required for the exigencies of the state. Make the divisions narrower, the assessment for the first two classes—especially the second—higher, and the odd twenty-one millions would speedily be raised.

R. M.—In 1851, the population in the London division was 2,361,640; in the north-western division, comprising Cheshire and Lancashire, 2,487,351: so that it is quite evident that the population in and within a radius of forty miles round the metropolis, is much greater than within the same circumference in the Manchester district. The London division is only a part of Mid-dersex, Surrey, and Kent; the north-western division includes the whole of Lancashire and Cheshire.

J. D.—Gold fish were first imported into England in 1611. They were brought from China, in which country for ages they have been the constant ornament in ponds and reservoirs in pleasure grounds.

A COLLEGEIAN complains that he has a red nose. His habits, we presume, are temperate. If so, the fault must be with his digestive organs or liver. We will give him a hint that will be of service to him and other young men. Tight lacing reddens the nose. Now, as some young men do lace tightly—wear belts or stays, to improve the figure, as they express themselves, or "hold their backs up," in rowing and cricket matches—we are not surprised at the number of young men we see with red noses. The belts worn by sailors rest on the hips, and they are slack. Jack is too wise to go about his work with his body in durance vile.

MICHAEL.—Making gunpowder is a very dangerous employment; but as you only inquire for the sake of being accurately informed on the subject, we will oblige you by stating, that it is composed of seventy-five parts of saltpetre, fifteen parts of charcoal, and ten parts of sulphur. Each ingredient requires careful preparation; and when we tell you that the concluding process is drying in a stove, heated to about a hundred degrees, we think we have stated sufficient to deter you or any other person from indulging in any foolish and useless experiments.

G. H. P. O.—You have made a mistake. It is the personal property to which letters of administration must be taken out. Of course, what property there is unsettled, whether real or personal, will be liable to the intestate's debts.

H. F. M.—Your mother must give up peaceable possession forthwith. The life interest of your father having terminated by his decease, the property has passed into other hands. Should she hold over, the consequences may be serious.

ALICE R.—A lady, when meeting a gentleman with whom she is only slightly acquainted, should bow or speak first, should she desire the gentleman to address her. Should she not, the etiquette is for the gentleman to pass on without giving the slightest token of recognition. In these cases the lady must be guided by her instinctive sense of what is due to herself and sex. Gentlemen are apt to be vain, some rather presumptuous.

SHEEN.—The personal property of an intestate, after payment of the funeral expenses, &c., and the debts, would be divided among his wife and children, in the following proportions: One-third to the wife, and the remaining two-thirds to the children in equal shares; the children of those dead taking the shares their parents would have had if living. Take an example. A. dies, leaving money and effects worth £3000, and a wife, three children, and three grandchildren, the offspring of a deceased son. The division would be as follows:

The wife	£1000
Each of the three children, £500	1500
The three grandchildren, in equal shares	500
	£3000

R. S. paid his addresses to a young lady (?) who seemed to reciprocate his affection, but now he finds that she has been for some time engaged to another. How should he behave towards her? Run away from her as if she were a cobra di capello, or other poisonous reptile. Girls who like to have two or more strings to their bow, are not very pure-minded. Angling for sweethearts is the last resource of faded beauty; or, what is still worse, of girls who, without having committed any indiscretion by which their reputations could be tainted, even by the breath of slander or revenge, have yet rendered themselves so notorious for unprincipled coquetry as to have earned the contempt of their own sex and the dislike of the other. R. S. is a lucky young man. He has escaped making a very bad bargain. He must show more judgment in his selection of another belle.

WISCONSIN.—Fifteen young ladies belonging to a school walked out together for 7 days, in parties of three, without any two walking together twice. How was this done? Your solution is a correct one, but the problem may be solved in another way. For the amusement of our young readers we subjoin your figures.

First day.	Second day.	Third day.	Fourth day.	Fifth day.	Sixth day.	Seventh day.
1 2 3	1 4 5	1 6 7	1 8 9	1 10 11	1 12 13	1 14 15
4 10 14	2 8 10	2 12 14	2 5 7	2 13 15	2 4 6	2 9 11
5 8 13	3 12 15	3 8 11	4 11 15	3 4 7	3 9 10	3 5 6
6 9 15	6 11 13	4 9 13	6 10 12	5 9 12	5 11 14	4 8 12
7 11 12	7 9 14	5 10 15	3 13 14	6 8 14	7 8 15	7 10 13

JONAS GLEAVE.—Getting into debt without the means of paying is a very grave offence; but then the law as regards poor debtors is really too stringent—it is unjust—because it makes a distinction between large debts and small debts. Our County Court law is criminal law. The defendant who does not or cannot pay, is sent to prison, not for not paying, but for disobeying the order of the court to pay. "We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us." The moment he is released he is liable to undergo the same ordeal—his body seems to be the property of the court he has offended. If he had thrashed his wife to death's door, gouged a policeman, or broken the ribs of some unfortunate creature, he would have been fined or sent to prison for a month, and there would have been an end of the matter. But as he was only a County Court debtor, his creditor could pursue him inavertedly—hunt him down like a mad dog. This is the glaring inconsistency, the injustice of the law, and we are surprised that it has not been amended long ago. Some of these days we shall have a church-rate or tithe case, and then the whole thing will be blown to atoms.

G. H. P. O.—Your friends who sneer at what they term "light reading," and the tastes of "the people," must have imperfect, if not vulgar minds. We cannot defend all the light reading of the day, but as the great bulk of it is unobjectionable, and is redolent of vigorous thoughts and sound morality, your friends should learn to sneer with discretion. As to their objection to the phrase, "the people," it is ridiculous. The people are the nation. But we suppose they speak of them in a contracted sense. Should they do so their ignorance is pitiable, their presumption snobbish, and we would venture to assert that their wealth and intelligence are very moderate. They belong to the contemptible tribe of the "stuck-ups." The people, indeed! Why what would such mushrooms be without the people? Miss Arabella Clementina Jemima Constantina Honoria Robertina could not sit down to a single meal, put on a single dress or shoe, or torture the piano, without the people. They are food, shelter, and fire to her. If there be a Master Reginald Alphonso Rupert Gloucester Clarence Brown, in this set of noodles, leave him and "the people" to settle the question. There is a good deal of virtue in leather. As for yourself, all that we would hint is, that a spirited young fellow would not mingle in such paltry society.

W. A. M.—The "Lives of the Queens of England," published in this Journal, are written, not edited, from facts collected from sources well known to the literary world, and also from others which have not hitherto engaged the attention or fallen under the cognisance of authors. We can guarantee their authenticity, and we think our readers ought to be obliged to the author for having rendered history intelligible, pleasing and piquant.

A MODERN ATHENIAN. We suspect, is fastidiously sentimental. He is as difficult to please as that prince of coxcombs, Beau Brummel. By-and-bye, we suppose, we shall be informed that he has caught a cold through sleeping in a room with a damp stranger in the duplicate bed. He says he dislikes novels, and then, in a strain of funny hyperbole, exclaims that his mind is as "dark and barren as a rainy sea!" A new idea. The sea barren! Jonah would not say so. And then a "rainy sea!" "Foaming billows" and "dashing waves" after that must hide their diminished heads. His epistle is dated "London," so he must be a Cheapside Scotchman.

A SHAREHOLDER.—Our railway management is monstrously defective, and must be reformed, or it will most certainly be abrogated. But our opinion—formed deliberately—is, that it was a blunder in the first instance, to intrust the internal traffic of the nation to private and opposing companies. The wisest step, in our judgment, would have been to have placed every railway in the kingdom in the hands of the executive, so as to have insured uniformity in their management, and conferred on the public a more equitable and safer use of these modern substitutes for the ancient highways of the realm. At the first blush this appears to be a startling innovation, a centralising suggestion, obnoxious to the instincts of the British people. But when more closely examined, it will be found to be nothing of the kind. The roads, and facilities for accommodation between places are unquestionably the property of the nation at large. They were so even in the days of the most tyrannical Roman emperors—they have ever been so all over the continent of Europe. In France, they were the constant care of that great man Napoleon; and in these islands, until within the past ten years, they were jealously guarded as the inalienable patrimony of the people. So sensitive were we on this point, that a usage for twenty years of a private road converted it into a public one; and so pertinacious was the feeling for the preservation of our highways, that traditions and superstitions were called into requisition for the sole purpose of multiplying and extending them. All this is now changed. The face of the country is covered by a vast netting of iron, and the travelling accommodation of the public afforded solely by means of the rail. This is a startling innovation, if you like.

CHAPTER CXVII.

Shunn'd as men shun the loathsome thing,
Repugnant to their natures—or as he Upon whose brow the avenging angel set
The brand which marked the first-born murderer's doom.
THE HEADSMAN.

THE City of Norwich—the ancient capital of the East Angles—has frequently and not inappropriately been designated the City of Gardens: its narrow, quaint, irregular streets being interspersed with pleasant, verdant patches and meadows, which add a beauty to their picturesque appearance.

Besides the castle—a fine old Saxon keep, which the modern Solons of the county have lately beautified, and which rises proudly from an elevated mound in the centre of a plain situated in the very heart of the city—Norwich possesses much to interest the antiquary and the artist—namely, a magnificent cathedral, two fine old halls, and six-and-thirty churches, to say nothing of several modern monstrosities which have lately been erected in the suburbs.

Remains of the city wall and towers, built chiefly of flint and stone, are still standing; but the embattled gates, interesting specimens of the architecture of the middle ages, have disappeared—destroyed by the incursion of Vandals who, under the name of mayors and aldermen, so long governed, or rather misgoverned, the place, for the sake of what they termed improvements.

The same men would have sold their forefathers' grave-stones, provided they could have turned an honest penny by them.

Where the last vestige of the fosse, or moat, which formerly surrounded the castle—now used as the county prison—disappears, runs a long, irregular lane, known by the name of Rose Lane; it was skirted on either side by old brick walls, broken here and there to admit of the erection of cottages, which were inhabited chiefly by poor weavers, or the workmen employed at the foundries—Watson's and Ker's.

At the period of our tale, the inhabitants of Rose Lane formed a community apart from the rest of the city. The rent of cottages and garden land being exceedingly cheap, decent poverty had found a refuge there; if abundance was unknown, positive destitution was equally a stranger to them. They were a simple, hard-working, contented race, retaining most of the superstitious and prejudices, as well as the better qualities of the English peasant and artisan.

In the wall which ran on the right side of the lane was a small door, the only means of access to a nest of cottages, dotted here and there, each in its separate patch of garden, well planted with vegetables and fruit-trees. One of these cottages was inhabited by a tall, thin, venerable-looking man, who was generally regarded with terror and dislike by his neighbours.

It was Sam Lane, the city hangman.

The only inmate of the house besides the executioner, was a pale, sickly boy, about thirteen—his grandson. Unlike other children of his age, he had neither play-fellows nor companions—all shunned him. The prejudice which for years had made the old man a solitary being upon the face of the earth, attached itself to his descendant. If he ventured to quit the limits of the little garden, which, being at the back of the cottage, fortunately could not be overlooked, the boys scoffed at or pelted him. Although he seldom complained, the little fellow felt his state of isolation keenly; it gradually chilled his heart, and with it the springs of health and life.

Solitude made him prematurely thoughtful. He was one of those unhappy beings condemned never to know the joys of childhood.

Although Sam Lane was far from being an uneducated man, he took not the least pains to instruct his grandson: perhaps he thought it better that the boy should be reared in ignorance. Knowledge develops the heart—his philosophy was to crush: he permitted, therefore, rather than encouraged, a kind old man named Blackmore, for many years a teacher in the charity school at the end of the lane, to drop in occasionally on an evening, and teach the boy his letters.

Had he foreseen the result, in all probability he would have forbidden him—bidden him for the very love he bore his scholar—whose energies having once found a channel for exertion, were no longer to be repressed. He devoured rather than acquired the lessons which his teacher set before him, till his kind instructor had nothing more to teach him.

Master Blackmore—as the teacher of the charity school was generally called in the neighbourhood—gradually felt interested in the uncommon zeal and intelligence of his pupil, whom he determined, if possible, to save from the state of isolation engendering those morbid feelings which were gradually destroying him. Full of this benevolent purpose, he had written to one of the trustees of the school, a large shipowner in London, who, on his recommendation, offered to take Reuben—the name of the boy—as an apprentice on board one of his ships, bound for the East Indies, provided his friends would provide him with an outfit, the cost of which was about twenty pounds—a sum far beyond his own means or that of the grandfather to raise.

Reuben had been sent to play in the garden whilst the old man talked over the affair in the cottage.

"It's a pity such an opportunity should be lost for serving the poor boy, ain't it, Mr. Blackmore?" said the hangman, thoughtfully; "but what can I do? Were I to sell all that I am worth, it would not fetch more than half the sum."

"I hoped that you had saved —"

"Saved!" interrupted Lane; "what should I save? They charge me the highest price for everything I buy, and then scarcely care to serve me. Were I to die tomorrow, they would have to sell the bed and chairs to bury me, or call upon the parish to do it."

"Have you no friends?"

"Friends!" repeated the hangman, bitterly; "I am astonished, Mr. Blackmore, that a man of your sense should ask such a question as that!"

The teacher reflected for several minutes. His own stipend was but thirty pounds a year, out of which he had to support an aged sister, who kept house for him. Still he thought that, with a little pinching, he might contrive to spare five towards the outfit of his pupil. He had just concluded in his own mind to make the offer, when a rap was heard at the door of the cottage.

"Come in!" said its owner.

A disagreeable, withered-looking little man, dressed in a shabby suit of black, not one article of which, apparently, had been made for him, entered the kitchen:

"Is your name," he said, addressing the executioner, "Sam Lane?"

"It is."

"Hangman to the city and county?"

"Even so," answered the old man, with a sigh.

"I wish to speak with you," said his visitor.

"Upon business, sir?"

"On business!—of course on business!" replied the stranger, with a chuckle which rendered his countenance only the more hideous; "few come here upon pleasure, I should suppose! My name is Mat Cows."

At the name of so distinguished a confrère, Lane started from his seat by the window, and begged him to take a chair.

"I have heard what you have been talking about," continued his visitor, as he seated himself next to the teacher of the charity school, who involuntarily shuddered at the proximity, "and want to talk to you about it—alone."

At the word "alone," Blackmore rose, and said that he would join Reuben in the garden.

"And so," continued Mat, as soon as he disappeared, "you want to get rid of that youngster of yours. Doesn't like his grandfather's business? All prejudice—ignorant prejudice—but what can people expect who live in the country?"

"The poor boy," said the old man, "deserves a better fate than to pine and mope in this dull place, or be made a scoff of and be pelted by those of his own age, if he ventures beyond the garden gate—and all because his grandfather is the hangman!"

"And so he does!" growled Mat, who very naturally shared in the indignation of his colleague.

"An opportunity has offered of sending him to sea."

His visitor nodded.

"The only difficulty is to find —"

"Twenty pounds for his outfit," interrupted Mat. "I know—I overheard all you and the other old fellow were saying. Twenty pounds is a large sum," he added, musingly; "but don't let that distress you. I'll provide it for you."

"You!"

"I."

"You give twenty pounds for the outfit of my grandson!" exclaimed Sam Lane; "surely you are jesting!"

"Who talked about giving?" answered the hangman, with a knowing wink. "I don't think I look so green as that! I said I would provide the money."

"And is not that the same thing?" demanded Lane.

"Not quite! I don't mind helping a friend, provided I put something in my own pocket at the same time; benevolence is all very well, only it doesn't pay. You understand?"

The grandfather of poor Reuben regarded his visitor with a look which indicated that he was very far from understanding him, and wished him to explain.

"You've heard, I suppose," continued Mat; "that a prisoner is left for execution, for the murder of Sir William Mowbray?"

Lane answered, with a sigh, that he had heard it. Necessity, not taste, had induced him to accept his disgusting office, and time had failed to reconcile him to the exercise of it.

"He must be hung on Monday morning?"

"Alas! yes!"

"Now, suppose," continued his visitor—"mind I only say suppose—that you were to be taken ill on Sunday night: what a pretty fix the sheriff would be in!"

"Dreadful!"

"He must hang the fellow, in that case, himself, or find a substitute."

"I have heard so."

"No doubt he would pay handsomely—I should say very handsomely"—observed Mat, with a knowing wink, "any one to take the job off his hands—fifty pounds at least; and you and I could share the money. Now do you understand?"

At last Sam Lane did understand him. It was certainly a novel expedient of his confrère to gratify his personal revenge against the warrener, and put five-and-twenty pounds into his pocket; but Cows was a prudent man, and too quick-witted to lose an opportunity of turning even his pleasures to a profitable account. His first intention had been to ask the old man to permit him to officiate for him as a favour—nay, even to go as far as offering him a bribe for the permission—but the conversation which he had overheard at the door of the cottage induced him to change it. He saw the occasion, and, like a hardy speculator, seized it. Mat Cows would have doubtless been a great man, had fate made him a stockbroker instead of a hangman; but genius is often lost for want of an opportunity.

"The sheriff is a close-fisted man," observed Lane, doubtfully; "and will hardly pay so large a sum as fifty pounds. He would sooner hang the prisoner himself."

"Pooh—pooh! Is he married?"

"Yes!"

"And got a family?"

"Both sons and daughters," was the reply.

"Then he will be sure to pay!" replied Mat, with an air of deep conviction; "no doubt, too, he is rich?"

"Very rich!" said his brother hangman; who began to consider the transaction in a more favourable light.

"From boyhood he was always a mean, scraping fellow. I've heard that when his father died, although the old man left him a mint of money, he shaved the corpse himself, rather than pay half-a-crown to Kelf, the barber. Since then he has gone on making and making money like dirt—has got his fingers into most of the charities: and it's an old saying in Norwich," he added, "that whoever gets a handling of them is sure to grow rich."

"Fifty pounds!" exclaimed his hearer, in a tone of contempt. "I am too moderate; I ought to ask a hundred!"

"We, you mean!" observed Lane, suspiciously.

"Of course I meant we!" said Mat, with an appearance of sincerity, which was very far from inspiring his colleague with the confidence he intended.

It was finally arranged between the two worthies that the scheme should be tried, and Mat Cows took his leave, promising to return the following day.

"Perhaps," he said, as he shook hands with Lane at the door of his cottage; "you had better begin by a little indisposition this evening. You can get worse in the morning, and be very bad towards night."

The old man replied by a nod of intelligence, as much as to say that he understood him.

When Reuben and his tutor entered the house, he found his grandfather standing in the centre of the sanded floor, lost in profound reflection.

"Is he gone?" inquired the boy.

"Gone! Who?"

"That evil-looking man."

"Do not condemn him," answered the hangman; "since it is to him that you will owe the means of escaping a destiny as lonely and wretched as your grandfather's! Go to bed, Reuben," he added, kindly, at the same time passing his hand over the curly head of the lad. "I want to have some conversation with Mr. Blackmore."

"Did I understand you rightly," said the warm-hearted teacher, as soon as they were alone, "that means would be found for the outfit of the poor boy?"

"You did!"

"And by the singular-looking person who has just left?"

"Through him!"

"I should rejoice at this," observed his benevolent visitor—"heartily rejoice at it, were I assured that the money is not the price of some act which justice or religion would condemn!"

The old man assured him, in a yet sadder tone, that neither justice nor religion were opposed to the means by which the welfare of his pupil was to be promoted.

"What makes you so dull, then?" inquired Mr. Blackmore, more and more struck by his peculiar tone and manner.

"The necessity of parting with him!" exclaimed Sam Lane, bitterly. "You forget how lonely my existence will be without him. Outcast from the world—hangman as I am—with Reuben near me, I feel that my heart is still human!"

That night, it was several hours after taking possession of his humble bed, before the old teacher could compose himself to sleep. His brain was busy with new and abstruse speculations. He had seen humanity in a new phase, and was puzzled to reconcile its contrasts.

CHAPTER CXVIII.

Avenging furies haunt the murderer's dreams,
With hissing snakes, plucked from their hideous crests,
Lashing his soul to madness.

ORRESTES IN ARGOS.

AFTER the departure of the chaplain from his cell, the impotent fury of the warrener gradually subsided into sullen, mute despair. His first idea had been to imitate the being who had tempted him, and seek refuge from the horrors of the scaffold, the yelling crowd, and the gripe of the hangman, in suicide. But a slight reflection convinced him this would be impossible. Both the governor of the castle and the sheriff had given strict orders that he should be watched day and night—never to be left for an instant; and those to whom the task was confided were too well accustomed to the melancholy duty to perform it carelessly. They spoke to the wretched man with kindness, but firmness; listened to his passionate protestations of innocence with that calm silence which expresses incredulity more powerfully even than words.

Worn out at last by the violence of his emotions, the wretched man threw himself upon his pallet, and soon was buried in a profound, but not a peaceful slumber. It was broken by dreams more dreadful than the waking reality of the doom suspended over him.

In those few hours' sleep, the events of his evil life passed in review before him. His passionate, unruly boyhood, and the petty crimes which led him, step by step, towards the abyss of guilt; next, the image of a fair girl, whom he had loved with all the savage energy of his nature, rose like an accusing spirit before him. Her blue eyes, eloquent in their thoughtful expression, were fixed on him, as if they would read the very workings of his soul! Gradually the phantom became indistinct; but as it faded from his gaze, it seemed to point to a dark, misty shadow hovering in the distance. Cold drops of perspiration broke on his wrinkled brow, and he groaned and writhed with terror.

The turnkeys, who had seated themselves close to the bed, noticed the agitation of their charge.

"He is dreaming!" whispered the elder, whom experience had long rendered familiar with such scenes. "I knew his courage would not last! He will be humbled and subdued enough by morning. The chaplain will have easy work with him!"

His companion nodded, to intimate that he was of the same opinion. Will Sideler gave a deep groan, and murmured a few indistinct words.

"Hush!" said the first speaker. "We shall hear something!"

The dream of the murderer had changed. The stately form of Sir William Mowbray, as he had seen him in life, stood glaring on him, and pointing to the still distant phantom, whose hideous outline was gradually growing terribly distinct. At last it assumed the wiry proportions and mocking features of Mat Cows, the hangman. No sooner did the sleeper recognise him in his dream, than he groaned and shuddered. His entire frame became convulsed, as with the death-spasm; and he writhed and turned upon his pallet like a crushed snake upon a bed of fire.

"This is horrible!" exclaimed the younger of the two turnkeys; "for heaven's sake, wake him! I can't bear to look upon him! 'See,' he added, 'how his hair bristles, and his brows work! Wake him—wake him!'"

"Not yet!" replied his more philosophic comrade; "for my part, I don't dislike to see him. Such dreams will do more to soften his hardened spirit than all the chaplain's preaching."

At this moment, the warrener uttered a yell of such intense agony, that it startled both the watchers.

"He fancies that he is struggling with the hangman!" whispered one; "see how the veins and muscles of his throat swell! now he raises his hands to it!"

"No—no—God! Mercy—mercy!" shrieked the conscience-stricken wretch, half starting from the bed, and looking wildly round him. "Where am I?" he demanded after a moment's pause, during which he was evidently trying to recollect himself. "I see—I know—the condemned cell!"

He buried his convulsed features in the rough coverlid of his bed, and wept. The strong man wept bitterly.

The situation might have appalled a stouter heart than his. The gloomy cell of unheaven granite, lit only by the light of a single lamp, rendering its darkness visible; the pale countenances and fixed eyes of the two turnkeys glaring upon him with strange interest and horror; the silence of the night broken only by deep sobs and groans, which broke from his rugged heart.

The younger of the gaolers filled a small tin cup from a pitcher of water which stood upon the table, and held it to the parched lips of the prisoner.

"Drink!" he said; "it will revive you."

"No water!" exclaimed Will Sideler, dashing it aside;

"I loathe the sight of water! Give me brandy—I can pay for it," he added, "handsomely! For God's sake, let me have brandy!"

The man silently picked up the cup, which had rolled upon the floor, and replaced it on the table.

"Brandy!" continued the prisoner, with an imploring look—"brandy!"

"It is against the rules!" observed the elder turnkey. "Besides, we have no means of procuring it, even if we had the inclination. You had better try to sleep again."

"To sleep!" repeated the warrener, with a hideous laugh; "I won't sleep—I dare not sleep again! How pale you look, and how you both stare at me!" he added, "did I say anything in my dream?"

Neither of the turnkeys answered him.

"Why don't you speak?" exclaimed the ruffian, furiously.

"You had better pray!" observed the elder of the men; "it will calm you. The chaplain will be here early in the morning."

"I don't want to see him—he can do me no good! It's hard—very hard—to be hanged like a dog, innocently, isn't it?"

"To be hanged innocently is very hard, certainly!"

"But they won't do it!" continued the prisoner; "they dare not—there will be a reprieve! The judge cannot believe that I am guilty! The jury were perjured—the witnesses perjured, too! I have known a reprieve arrive at the last hour—have not you?"

"The judge has left the town!" replied the young man.

"But there will be a post on Monday morning?"

He looked eagerly into the faces of both the men, as if to read in their eyes the confirmation of the hope—which, faint as it was, most criminals retain to the last hour. But when he saw their incredulity, he turned once more upon his side, and wept bitterly.

"Pray!" repeated the one who had previously given the same advice; "it will do you more good than either brandy or false hopes! Ask mercy of God—perhaps he will hear you."

During the rest of the night, Will Sideler maintained a sullen silence. Once or twice, when he felt himself inclined to sleep, he started from his pallet, and paced the cell with irregular strides. Terrible as were his waking reflections, it was evident they were less horrible than the dreams which haunted his slumbers.

As the old turnkey foretold, when the chaplain arrived the following morning, he found the criminal far more inclined to listen to his exhortations.

Anthony Skinner, who at that period filled the important office of sheriff, was known—as Lane, the hangman, had expressed it—to be a hard, close-fisted man; but he possessed one qualification which, in the eyes of the citizens, superseded the necessity of every other: he was rich—very rich. His claims to intellect, character, feeling, were all united in that one word—money; and, to judge from the tenacity with which he clung to it, no man felt the value of wealth more than himself. It was his idol—his god—from boyhood he had known no other. His hard, stern features were an index of his mind. If by accident poverty addressed to him its prayer, no sooner did the supplicant catch the expression of his cold grey eye, than he turned hopelessly away, the words frozen upon his lips: and yet this man—this thing of stone, not flesh—was one of the trustees of the many charities of the city! Having described him, it were needless to add how the widow and the orphan fared, whose rights were vested in such guardianship.

The civic dignity was seated at supper, with his wife and family—consisting of a son, whom he was educating for the law, and two daughters, as vain and coarse-featured as himself—when the servant announced that the governor of the gaol wished to see him.

"Clear the table!" said his master, with prudent foresight; "put the great Bible upon the table, and then admit him."

Despite the dissatisfied looks of his family, his orders were obeyed. The sacred volume, whose every precept teaches justice to the poor, and mercy, was opened before the wealthy hypocrite. It was one of those pious mockeries at which angels weep, and Satan rejoices.

"Well, Johnson!" he said, as the respectable governor of the prison entered the dining-room, "has anything particular occurred? eh?"

"Most embarrassing, sir!" replied the visitor; "Lane, the hangman, has been taken suddenly ill!"

"Ah, indeed!"

Evidently Mr. Anthony Skinner did not comprehend the importance of the communication, or the unpleasant consequence which might possibly result from it.

"What is the matter with the fellow?" added the speaker.

"An intermittent fever, I believe, which renders him incapable of performing his office to-morrow."

A very disagreeable light began to break in upon the obtuse intellect of the dignitary.

"Who the devil—ahem! The Lord forgive me!" he exclaimed—"is to hang the prisoner, then?"

Mr. Johnson informed him that was exactly the point on which he had felt it necessary to consult him; adding, by way of consolation, that in the absence of the executioner, it was the duty of the sheriff to carry the sentence into execution.

"What! hang the man! Hang him myself?"

"Even so, sir!" said his visitor, bowing to conceal an involuntary smile.

The countenances of the whole family of the Skinners began to look awfully blank.

"Pooh! ridiculous!" muttered the very respectable Mr. Anthony, after a pause; "send down to the workhouse—tell the master to pick out a strong, able-bodied pauper, and I'll—I'll give him a guinea!"

The reluctance with which the munificent offer was made, showed the severe struggle which had taken place in the breast of the speaker, before he had brought himself to consent to such a sacrifice.

"I fear it will be useless, sir!" replied the governor; "I question if, for ten times such a sum, you would find a man, even amongst the inmates of the workhouse, to perform the disgusting office."

"Ignorant wretches!" exclaimed the sheriff, who both looked and felt surprised at the idea of any poor man being found to reject the opportunity of earning a guinea.

"Well, then!" he said, "one of the city officers must do it."

Mr. Johnson shook his head.

"Or a turnkey!"

"If you were to offer them a hundred times the sum, you would not find one of them to undertake it."

"Then I'll discharge—dismiss them all!" exclaimed the miser, furiously; "pretty squeamish fellows—to leave me in such an embarrassing position! What am I to do?"

Mr. Johnson felt very much inclined to reply, "Hang him yourself!" but prudence as well as courtesy kept him silent.

"Lor, papa!" said the eldest Miss Skinner, whose gentility had taken the alarm; "surely they will never expect you to—to do such a thing!"

The young lady did not choose to make use of the word "hang"—it did not sound pretty.

"Fortunately," observed their visitor, "the sheriff will be spared so unpleasant an alternative. Mat Cows, the London executioner, happens to be in the city, on a visit to Lane, I presume. I have spoken with the fellow, and he has consented to officiate for his colleague."

"Handsome—very handsome of the fellow!" interrupted Anthony Skinner, his countenance radiant with smiles.

"On one condition!"

At the word "condition," it once more became clouded. Instinctively the man of money felt that it implied an attack upon his purse.

"Condition?" he repeated.

"That he is paid fifty guineas!"

"Fifty devils!" roared the sheriff. "Who ever heard of such a sum just for putting a rope round a man's neck, tying a knot, and drawing a bolt? why, I'd do it myself for half—"

Shame prevented his finishing the declaration.

"I am afraid, sir," replied Mr. Johnson, seriously, "that you will find the man obstinate! He is perfectly aware of the position in which you are placed, and that the execution must be performed to-morrow! I do not think he will take a single guinea less!"

"Then I will do it myself!" exclaimed the old man, with an air of dogged resolution.

The governor looked disgusted.

"You, papa!" cried the Misses Skinner.

"Anthony—Anthony!" remonstrated his wife; "what will the world say?"

"Hang the world!" roared her husband. "If I must do it, the law is to blame—not me! Didn't Julius Cæsar, or Macbeth, I forget which, put his own child to death, and wasn't he applauded for it?"

"Brutus, papa, you mean!" whispered his better informed son.

"Brutus, Macbeth, or Julius Cæsar," answered the old man, testily; "it's all the same; didn't I pay a guinea for a box," he added, with a wince at the recollection of such extravagance, "to see it at the theatre, the night that fool Grub, the mayor, gave his 'bespeak,' I think they called it!"

The family of the miser did not think it all the same: his wife and daughters felt that after such an exhibition they could never again show their faces in society. Even his hopeful son—who was as fully possessed of the value of fifty pounds as his respectable progenitor—began to remonstrate; and after great entreaty, their united efforts prevailed on the miser to commission Mr. Johnson to offer Mat Cows the extravagant sum of five pounds, to act as substitute for the city hangman in the morning.

"I will do so," said the governor, as he took his leave; "but I feel quite certain that it will be useless!"

The Skinners passed a sleepless night: from the oldest to the youngest, all dreaded the events of the coming morning.

CHAPTER CXIX.

They are well matched, oil and vinegar,
They will do very well together.—SHEEDAN.

At an early hour on the following morning, the resolution of the sheriff to perform the office of hangman himself, rather than submit to the extortionate demands of Mat Cows, was pretty generally whispered in the city. The poorer inhabitants believed it—they knew, by bitter experience, the griping, avaricious nature of the man. The higher classes were both astonished and indignant at the thought of such a scandal; and several of his political friends, feeling that their own respectability would be compromised by such an act, resolved at any sacrifice to prevent it. They accordingly waylaid him, as at an early hour he left his house, to seek the residence of Sam Lane. He had a note in his hand, which had just arrived from Johnson, informing him that he had seen Mat Cows, as he desired, and found him inflexible. It concluded by respectfully advising him to comply with his terms.

"There goes the hangman!" shouted a group of boys, as he crossed the market-place. Anthony Skinner turned pale, but doggedly pursued his way.

"Five pounds!" he muttered—"not a shilling more! My mind is made up, come what may!"

As he reached the entrance to Davy Place—then scarcely finished—he encountered several of his party. He would willingly have avoided them, but they were not to be shaken off. Their own respectability they considered to be at stake. An animated discussion—in which remonstrance and ridicule were alternately employed—took place, as they pursued their way towards the cottage of the hangman.

According to the instructions of his colleague, Sam Lane was still in bed. His grandson, as usual on such occasions, at a very early hour had been sent to pass the day from home with an aged widow, to whom he was distantly related, in the pleasant village of Thorp. The poor lad felt too keenly his social degradation, to be left alone in the house on hanging mornings.

"I don't think he will send again!" said the old man, with a sigh, alluding to the city functionary. "If Colonel Harvey, or even Bignold, had been sheriff, it would have been settled by this time!"

This was addressed to Mat Cows, who was seated by the side of his bed, quietly smoking his pipe.

"He will come," replied the wretch, in a confident tone, "or send!"

Sam Lane shook his head, doubtfully.

"I tell you that he will!" continued the speaker, at the same time deliberately puffing the smoke through his teeth. "He'll never have the nerve to do it himself!"

"You don't know him!" was the reply.

"I know human nature!" answered Mat; "and that is enough for me! It's all very well for him to bluster, and hold out; but only wait till he hears the bell, and sees the prisoner with his pale face, chattering teeth, and despairing look—as you and I have seen 'em! Why, when I first took to the trade," he added, "it unnerved even me! I would have given fifty pounds myself, if I had had such a sum, to have turned the job over to another!"

His brother hangman shuddered. He remembered how often he had experienced the same sickening feeling himself.

"Hush!" whispered Mat, laying down his pipe, and listening. "There is some one in the garden! Brush your hair back from your face, and look as like a croaker you can!"

There was little need of the caution: for what between hope and fear, joined to the terror which he felt at the idea of being called upon to perform his painful office, Sam Lane appeared more dead than alive already. The door of the cottage opened, and Anthony Skinner, accompanied by two of the gentlemen who had lately joined him, marched into the room.

"So," he said, walking straight to the foot of the bed, "a pretty time to be ill, indeed! Who do you imagine is to perform your office for you?"

"I don't know," answered the old man, meekly. "It's not my fault, gentlemen; I can't help sickness!"

"He leaves it in the hands of the sheriff!" chimed in Mat, with a sinister leer.

Although the city dignitary knew instinctively who the speaker was, he felt too indignant to answer him.

"You don't appear so very bad!" continued the rich man, willing to try the effect of a little coaxing. "Try what a little brandy will do! You shall ride to the goal! If you don't perform it quite so well," he added, in a considerate tone, "we will look over it!"

"How very kind!" observed Cows.

"And the five guineas which I would have given this fellow," added the miser, after a mental struggle, "shall be yours!"

Here Lane, with a deep groan, fell back upon his pillow, pretending to be overcome with exhaustion. So well was it acted, that even the lynx-eyed sheriff was deceived.

"Curse the rascal!" he exclaimed. "I believe that he is dying!"

"And enough to make him die!" retorted Mat; "to be asked to do such a thing at such a time! But it's like you rich men—no pity for the poor!"

"Why do not you officiate for him?" observed one of the gentlemen, for the first time breaking silence.

"I have have offered to do so already."

"Yes, for fifty pounds!"

"And very little, too!" replied the hangman. "It's had enough to have to do it in the regular way of business in London, where nobody knows one; but here, on a party of pleasure, to run the risk of being called after in the streets, 'There goes Jack Ketch!' ain't nowise pleasant. So, if the gentleman likes the job," he added, glancing towards the sheriff, "he is perfectly welcome to it!"

"I shall do it!" said Anthony Skinner, resolutely.

"As you please, sir. To show you that I have no malice, I'll just show you how to tie the knot. You'll soon learn—it ain't every one that has a taste for such things."

So saying he pulled a small coil of strong rope, which had been well greased and stretched, from his pocket, and, with considerable dexterity, began to twist it into a formidable noose. For the first time the determination of the miser began to give way. He felt sick at the forcing-pump, which out of courtesy we suppose we must call his heart. The gentlemen who accompanied him, too, looked remarkably bilious.

"Come, old fellow!" whispered one in the ear of the sheriff; "it is time to end this nonsense—pay the money!"

"Never!"

"Consider the dignity of your office—your family! Your party will see that you are no loser!"

This last consideration prevailed. No sooner was he assured that the fifty pounds were not to come out of his own pocket, than the miserly wretch felt as anxious to be relieved from the dreadful responsibility as he had before been resolute to go through with it. After sundry more whisperings and consultations, it was finally settled that the demands of Mat Cows should be complied with.

"In that case," said the fellow, with a feeling of intense satisfaction—for even his confidence began to be shaken—"I may as well put the rope in my pocket again."

"You may," replied the sheriff, angrily. "Come to me as soon as the execution is over, and I'll settle with you."

"Never give credit in my line!" cried the ruffian, with a chuckle; "it ain't the custom of the craft!"

"Do you doubt me, fellow?"

"Yes!" replied the hangman, bluntly; "very much I doubt you! chaffering and bargaining with a poor devil like myself for a few paltry guineas! Suppose you were to refuse to pay me after it is done—a fine chance I should have of going to law with a long purse like yours! I ain't got no charities to fall back upon!"

"For heaven's sake, pay him!" exclaimed one of the gentlemen; "and let us leave this place!"

One by one, as though they were so many drops from his very heart, did Sheriff Skinner count down the glittering coin. When they were all placed upon the table before him, Mat Cows began as slowly to pick them up. The ruffian enjoyed the torment which he knew he was inflicting.

"You will not fail!" observed one of the visitors.

"Business, gentlemen!" said Mat, with a grin; "always punctual in matters of business!"

The sheriff, despite his promise, informed him, angrily, that he should leave two of his officers who were waiting outside in the garden, with strict orders not to lose sight of him till he had performed the office for which he had been so extravagantly paid.

So saying, the party left the cottage.

"Have you got them?" demanded Sam Lane, as soon as he heard the door close behind them.

"All—fifty bright, shining, yellow guineas—as good as ever came from his majesty's mint!" replied his confederate. "I knew that I should get them!" he added: "the sight of the rope did it! The old hunks could not stand that! Good bye!" he said, hastily; at the same time buttoning up the pocket which contained the fifty pounds. "I must be off: when it is all over I shall return and settle."

"We must settle now, Mat!" said the old man, leaping nimbly from the bed; "as you observed just now, we never give credit in our line of business! It isn't the custom of the craft!"

"Do you doubt me?"

"Yes!" answered Lane, repeating his own words: "I very much doubt you! Suppose you were to refuse to pay me after it is done—a fine chance I should have of going to law with a long purse like yours! So pay down," he added, "or I shall find myself sufficiently recovered to hang the man myself!"

Mat Cows looked first at the speaker and then at the window, through which he saw the two officers waiting. The struggle which he endured at parting with the half of his ill-gotten gains, was scarcely less than the sheriff's. Prudence, and the burning desire he felt of avenging himself upon Will Sidelar, at last prevailed. With a bitter curse, he threw down the money, and left the cottage. His colleague, after barring the door carefully, gathered it up and once more retired to his bed. He had obtained the means of preserving his grandson from a life of misery and shame; and even in his solitude the hangman felt content.

CHAPTER CXX.

Death is indeed most terrible, e'en when it comes

Unto the sinless couch, and weeping friends

Whisper religion's last consoling prayer;

But on the scaffold, 'mid the rabble's curse,

When conscience echoes back the accusing cry,

It falls with tenfold horror. GREEN.

FROM the first dawn of morning, the crowd had gradually been collecting before the scaffold erected during the night in front of the prison. They came not only from the city and its suburbs, but the adjacent villages. So universal was the horror and detestation of the deed for which the warrener was about to suffer, that not a single voice amid the countless multitude was heard to pity him—yet there were many from Carrow who had known him from their childhood; but they had also known his victim—the good and benevolent Sir William Mowbray.

Foremost in the ranks, was the imp-like person of Red Ralph: the uncouth urchin had never witnessed an execution, and he felt as impatient for the horrid spectacle as a boy at his first play.

Many in the crowd who had known Sidelor for years, speculated on the probability of his making a confession, or dying game, as they termed it; others, acquainted with his resolute character, predicted that he would remain obstinately sullen to the last.

The dilemma of the sheriff, from the sudden indisposition of the hangman, was a general theme of mirth—mirth on such an occasion! When will the mob respect themselves sufficiently to justify the friends of humanity in calling them the people?

As usual, there was a considerable number of females present: scenes of horror seem to possess a peculiar species of fascination for the gentler sex.

"Fession!" repeated Red Ralph, who had caught the word from those who were discussing the approaching tragedy near him; "he won't make no 'Fession—it ain't likely!"

"Why not, my little man?" demanded one of the crowd.

"Cos it's summut good, I s'pose," replied the boy, "and beant in the natur' of un; t'old un be nat'urally wicked; besides, it isn't the fust murder he has committed! He would have done for I, if I had been fool enough to let in catch me!"

"For you?"

"Ees."

The urchin suddenly found himself an important personage in the eyes of those who were nearest to him; and, nothing loth, began to relate his adventures with the warrener in the old house at Mortlake. Whilst he is thus gratifying their curiosity and his own vanity—for, like older and wiser personages, Ralph loved to be the hero of a tale—we will request our readers to accompany us to the interior of the gaol, where preparations were going on for the completion of the last awful act of unrelenting justice.

As the hour of death approached, the reckless bearing of Will Sidelor gradually gave way to a more subdued tone and manner. It was evident to all that the bully was cowed, and the natural quality of the cur—cowardice—prevailed. He listened to the exhortations of the chaplain, not with the fervour of a true repentance, but with a feverish hope, which had not yet abandoned him, that something would turn up to save him. Bitterly did he lament his rashness in having denounced his accomplice, Meeran Hafaz. Had the young Indian lived, he felt assured that his influence, wealth, and daring spirit would have found the means to avert his impending doom.

Little did the murderer—even at that awful moment—seem to understand how strong a grasp the iron hand of justice at last had laid upon him.

The criminal and the clergyman were alone together in the little chapel of the prison. Vainly had the worthy man endeavoured, by prayer and exhortation, to draw from him a confession. To all his entreaties, the warrener opposed positive negation or sullen silence; he experienced a dogged kind of satisfaction in refusing to gratify what he considered the curiosity of his enemies: they might hang him, he thought, but should never make him speak.

From time to time he cast restless glances towards the door, through which the hum of voices, the fearful whisperings of the officials in the passage, who were waiting the first stroke of noon to conduct him to the scaffold, at times were distinctly heard.

It is astonishing how keen the perceptions become, when terror sharpens them.

The features of the warrener assumed a yet more deadly hue, when the governor of the gaol, dressed in black, entered the chapel: he exchanged looks with the chaplain.

"It is not twelve yet!" gasped the prisoner, pale with error; "it can't be twelve!"

Mr. Johnson was spared the pain of replying, by a loud knock at the door of the chapel.

"Who is there?" he demanded, in the usual form.

The reply was made in the harsh voice of Anthony Skinner, demanding, in the king's name, that the body of William Sidelor, convicted of murder, should be given up to the sheriff for execution, pursuant to sentence.

The doors were thrown open, and the functionary, attended by his officers and half a dozen turnkeys, made his appearance.

A few hastily-muttered words, and a receipt for the body of the condemned prisoner, passed between him and Mr. Johnson—and the formality was complete. The murderer was now in the hands of the sheriff: he, with a nod, consigned him to the executioner, Mat Cows, who with fiend-like impatience, stood at the back of the crowd, contemplating his prey.

No sooner did the warrener recognise the hangman, than his huge frame became convulsed: he tried in vain to speak or move—but terror had so strangely fascinated him, that tongue and limbs alike were paralysed. Before the wretched man could recover his self-possession, Mat, with the dexterity which long experience gave him, had securely pinioned his arms behind his back.

"That will do nicely!" he whispered in the ear of the murderer, as he finished the preliminaries of his horrid task.

Sidelor uttered a deep groan.

"Give him a little brandy," said the surgeon of the prison, who was present.

"Better not, sir," whispered Mat; "it only prolongs their sufferin's: we never does it in London."

Anthony Skinner gave the signal to advance.

"Not yet, sir!" said the hangman, who felt like an epicure toying with his pleasures; "he ain't quite ready!"

"Be speedy!" exclaimed Mr. Johnson, eyeing the ruffian sternly—for he recollected the scene in court upon the trial—"and remember that this is neither the time nor place for levity!"

"Certainly not, sir!"

With great deliberation, which was not all affected—for his hands trembled so with pleasure that he could scarcely use them—the hangman proceeded to remove the neckerchief from the throat of his victim. Having done so, he put it carefully into his pocket, and next proceeded to turn down his shirt collar: in doing which he contrived, playfully as it were, to touch the throat of the warrener—who no sooner felt the contact of his fingers, than he uttered a loud yell.

"I won't be hanged by him!" he shouted, his iron-grey hair bristling at the same time over his clammy brow. "It will be murder—I tell you it will be murder!"

"All ready, gentlemen!" said Mat, in a quiet, serious tone, as if the exclamations of the prisoner were a matter of course.

Again the order to move was given. The chaplain commenced the burial service, and Will Sidelor, more dead than alive, was carried, rather than led, by a turnkey on either side of him, towards the scaffold.

Mat Cows followed close behind him—the fatal cord in his hand. So delightful did the whole affair appear to him, that it was with the greatest difficulty he repressed his usual chuckle.

"Hats off!" exclaimed several voices in the crowd, as the sound of the great bell of the prison vibrated solemnly in the air.

"Is he a comin'?" demanded Ralph.

"Silence, boy!" said a respectable man who was near to him, who felt disgusted at his eagerness.

There was a murmur of something like disappointment amongst the people when Mat Cows appeared upon the scaffold to adjust the rope. They had fully expected to see the sheriff; and felt almost angry at the miser for not performing the office.

"That be he!" said Ralph; "that be he!" as the warrener, looking deadly pale, was dragged upon the scaffold. The terrified wretch had recovered something like courage at the last moment, and struggled fearfully.

"How he do fight for life, to be sure! This be better sport than the rats at Mortlake!"

The assistants of the dreadful scene held the prisoner—who yelled and shrieked the while—firmly under the beam, whilst Mat threw the noose over his head. The excitement of the populace became terrible; and they answered the yells of the murderer with cries as loud and piercing.

"That will do!" said Mat, quietly, to the turnkeys. "You may go down; I can finish the rest!"

"But the cap?"

The hangman drew it from his pocket.

"All right!" he said. "I know my business!"

No sooner did the warrener hear the discordant cries of the mob, than he became suddenly calm. His eyes wandered over the up-turned sea of human faces, and even on the brink of eternity, a bitter curse escaped him!

"That's right!" whispered Mat, drawing the cap over his face. "Curse away! Prayers are of no use to you now! Good bye! Remember my peculiar knot—I shan't forget it!"

With these words the wretch descended from the scaffold, and stood waiting to withdraw the bolt the instant the chaplain should drop the white handkerchief which he was holding in his hand. He had not long to wait: the signal was speedily given, and the murderer launched into the presence of that awful Judge, whose laws he had so perseveringly mocked and braved. His struggles were long and fearful. Even the mob, who had welcomed his appearance on the scaffold with delight, began to feel disgust and pity. The cry of "Shame—shame!" was loud and general.

"Rascal!" said the governor to Mat, who stood quietly enjoying the scene, "you shall answer for this!"

"It ain't my fault!" growled the ruffian. "What did he resist for? I would have hanged him comfortably enough, if he had only let me!"

The struggles of the dying man still continued, and the yells of the populace became absolutely terrific.

"We shall have a riot!" observed the sheriff, looking very pale.

The hangman felt it necessary to make some attempt to complete his hideous work. With the agility of a cat, he climbed up the scaffold till he reached the legs of the warrener, which he seized with both his hands, and swung on them till he was dead!

No sooner was the disgusting scene over, than Mat Cows left the prison by a private door, whilst the populace were still gazing on the gibbet, from which the body had been removed. He was never more seen in the ancient city of Norwich.

The crowd slowly dispersed, many of them impressed with sadder thoughts and better feelings than when they congregated; others with that brutal levity which no lesson can teach, or example, however terrible, reform.

Amongst the former was Red Ralph. The boy was not naturally bad. He was ignorant; but, ignorant as he was, the scene had made a lasting impression upon him; and he afterwards confessed to his patron, Joe Beans, that if he had known a prayer, he should have repeated it when he saw his old enemy the warrener struggling on the gallows.

LITTLE CHILDREN.

ONE cold winter morning I looked into a milliner's shop, and there I saw a hale, hearty, and well-browned young fellow from the country, holding up some little matter, and turning it about. And what do you suppose it was? A baby's bonnet! A little, soft, blue satin hood, with a swans-down border, white as the frill of rich blonde around the edge. By his side stood a very pretty woman, holding, with no small pride, the baby—for evidently it was the baby. And one could read the fact in every glance, as they looked at each other, and at the little hood, and then at the large, blue, unconscious eye, and fat, dimpled cheeks of the little one. It was evident that neither of them had ever seen a baby like that before.

"But really, Mary," said the young man, "is not fifteen shillings very high?"

Mary very prudently said nothing, but, taking the hood, tied it on the little head, and held up the baby. The man looked and grinned, and, without another word, down went the fifteen shillings (all the last week's butter came to), and, as they walked out of the shop, it is hard to say which looked the most delighted with the bargain.

"Ah!" thought I, "a little child shall lead them."

Ah, these children! little witches! pretty even in all their thoughts and absurdities! winning even in their sins and iniquities!

See, for example, yonder little fellow in a naughty fit, he has shaken his long curls over his deep-blue eyes, the fair brow is bent in a frown, the rose-leaf is pushed up in infinite defiance, and the white shoulder thrust naughtily forward. Can any but a child look so pretty, even in its naughtiness? Then comes the instant change—flashing smiles and tears—as the good comes back all in a rush, and you are overwhelmed with protestations, promises, and kisses. They are irresistible, too, these little ones. They pull away the scholar's pen; tumble about his papers; make summersets over his books; and what can he do? They tear up newspapers; litter the carpets; break, pull, and upset, and then jabber their unintelligible English in self-defence; and what can you do for yourself?

"If I had a child," says the precise man, "you should see!"

He does have a child; and his child tears up his papers, tumbles over his things, and pulls his nose, like all children; and what has the precise man to say for himself? Nothing. He is like everybody else: "a little child shall lead him!"

Poor little children, they bring and teach us human beings more good than they get in return. How often does the infant, with its soft cheek and helpless hand, awaken a mother from worldliness and egotism to a whole world of new and higher feeling. How often does the mother repay this by doing her best to wipe off, even before the time, the dew and fresh simplicity of childhood, and make her daughter too soon a woman of the world, as she has been. The hardened heart of the worldly man is touched by the guileless tones and simple caresses of his son, but he repays it in time, by imparting to his boy all the crooked tricks, and hard ways, and callous maxims, which have undone himself. Go to the gaol—the penitentiary—and find there the wretched, most sullen, brutal, and hardened. Then look at your infant son; such to some mother was this man. That hard hand was soft and delicate; that rough voice was tender and lisping; fond eyes followed as he played; and he was rocked as something holy. There was a time when his heart, soft and unknown, might have been opened to questions of his Maker, and been sealed with the seal of heaven. But harsh hands seized it, and all is over with him for ever.

MY OWN.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

MY own—my own—oh! breathes there one

To whom that simple word's not dear?

Beats there a heart so drear and lone,

That holds not some loved object near?

Whose spirit like the arkless bird,

From all companionship hath flown;—

And finds no gladness in that word,

My own!—my own!—

Who dull to every finer tie,

To every soft affection cold,

Lives on in cheerless apathy,

And in his very youth seems old!

Though frequent cares my mind enthrall,

Could wealth, mere earthly wealth, atone

For the sweet beings lost!—I call

My own!—my own!

No!—Time may still but speed to show

How false is Hope's delicious song,

And many a sorrow I must know;

But, oh!—sweet Heaven—may it be long

Ere those I love from me are gone;

And like a wilderness hath grown,

And of earth's millions there is none,

My own!—my own!

STERLING.—ORIGIN OF THE TERM AS APPLIED TO MONEY.—In the time of Richard I. money coined in the east part of Germany came in special request in England, on account of its purity, and was called Easterling money—as all the inhabitants of those parts were called Easterlings; and soon after some of these people, skilled in coining, were sent for to London, to bring the coin to perfection—which was soon called Sterling, from Easterling.

[THE TWO CHILDREN OF THE EARTHMEN TRIBE, FROM SOUTHERN AFRICA.]

THE EARTHMEN IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

MAN has always been exceedingly curious about himself. Tell him of a monster, and he will rush anywhere to see it. But of all the sciences, that concerning himself has been the least pursued, and the most needed. Priests have anathematised it; and among every race and nation that ever existed, its study has been shunned with horror. Whence this universal fear—this wholesale timidity on a subject fraught with almost Divine interest? Is it instinctive? Is it natural? We think so: because among barbarous tribes the idiot is said to be inspired, and the afflicted tormented by demons. Epilepsy has given birth to the most monstrous superstitions. Even the early Christians, in their ignorance, attributed many things to the Evil One, which were the results of disease and malformation. And in the present day, enlightened as it is, deformity is viewed with abhorrence. The hunchback, as in the days of Shakspeare, is still the hobgoblin of the young, and the dislike of the aged. Indeed, anything concerning the human race unlike the mass, or presenting features that call into question the dogmas of churches, is sure to be made the subject of mystery and fear. Man dreads himself—and that is the whole truth of it. And the more intelligent he is, the more sensitive does he become as regards the origin, honour, and future of his common species. He will ridicule those who philosophise on the matter, as he did the eccentric but clever Monboddo; yet he will at the same time devour the most extraordinary stories—gobble up what he considers the fictions of Mandeville—and almost break his neck to have a peep at a “What is it?” Tales of men with their heads beneath their shoulders, and others with dorsal extremities, like monkeys, and of pigmies, have been rife in every age; and no doubt gave rise to much of the belief in witchcraft and the supernatural, which, even in this day, pervades the higher as well as the lower circles of human intelligence.

But, unhappily for romance, travellers now bring with them living evidence of the truth of their discoveries; and physiologists can elaborate, out of the heterogeneous mass of materials placed before them, the most convincing theories. They can tell us that, under certain impoverished conditions, man will dwindle away, and finally disappear from the earth; and that, had it not been for wars, revolutions, and natural convulsions, this world would long ago have been unpeopled. The Jews owe their existence to their dispersion. Their intermixture with the blood and institutions of the Gentiles gave them another lease of life; for most assuredly, had they lived together, and intermarried so closely as they did, and could not avoid, they would have been swept away, and become a tradition, just as much as the Asiatic races that existed before the deluge are become merely traditions. We have before us numerous melancholy examples of the truth of this law of population. First, the morals of a people become corrupted; then their intelligence decays; afterwards, as a natural consequence, their physique is enervated. Wars and pestilence then mow them down, and, sinking gradually into blind ignorance and helpless indolence, they become albinos, dwarfs, idiots, beasts; and finally are extinguished. In fact, the in-breeding has bred them out. The tribes of pigmies recently discovered in central America—those which are existing in Ethiopia, in Burmah, in Siam, on the borders of China, among the Himalayas, and at the Cape of Good Hope (at least, in Southern Africa)—constitute ample evidence of this punishing and avenging law of nature. All these extraordinary links in the chain of humanity of late years have attracted much attention; and from the circumstances we are about to mention, will no doubt attract much more.

Our illustration gives the portraits of two pigmies which have been brought to this country from the Orange River, in Southern Africa—one of the boundaries, as our readers will doubtless remember, of the territory in which some of the arduous operations incidental to the war in Kafirland were conducted. They are a male and female, and belong to a variety of the human family which has received the general designation of Earthmen. Their origin is supposed to be analogous to that of the Bushmen and Hottentots, but their habits are totally distinct. The Bushmen build huts and live in little villages, but the Earthmen live in excavations—and hence their name. They scratch hollows in the ground, to shield them from the wind. These hollows they line with a little straw, and then cover themselves with a light grass mat, out of which project their feet towards a fire which burns in the centre of the hollows. A mat is hung to windward, by the aid of two rods, placed perpendicularly, and another mat, fastened to a third rod, is spread horizontally over the hollow. This is all the protection the Earthmen possess against the heavy dews and atmospheric changes of night. In the morning they roll up their mats, and, as they have neither cattle nor cultivated grounds, and make no use whatever of culinary utensils, the traveller may pass within a quarter of a mile of their rude and wretched encampment without discovering them. The Earthmen shun the face of a white man, and as they usually cower down behind some inequality in the ground when they see one approach, they are seldom seen by Europeans. They assign as a reason for their living in hollows, that, were they to build huts, as the Bushmen do, their enemies would know where to find them, and might come in the night, burn their villages, and destroy them. They further allege, that to build huts would attach them too much to one place, and they could not then follow the game in its migrations. Game is their chief food, when it abounds; but there are periods in the year when it recedes beyond their reach: they then live on locusts, which the women of the tribe gather during the season. They also eat the larvæ of ants and a root resembling garlic. They are sometimes so straitened for food as to be compelled to gnaw the skins of the animals they have previously killed. The tribe thus destitute of every vestige of civilisation is found along the whole extent of the Orange River; but they so cautiously avoid the settlements, that many colonists who have resided in Port Natal and other districts of South Africa for years, have never seen them. This Lilliputian race of beings have, however, the character of great docility, and are said to be faithful to those to whom they attach themselves.

The pair—a boy and girl—which have been brought to this country, are now being exhibited. Both are very diminutive, but well formed. They have the appearance of being about nine years of age; yet the boy is confidently stated to be fourteen years of age, and the girl sixteen. How small they are for their age will be seen when it is stated that they are not more than three feet four inches in height. However, there is nothing misshapen or dwarfish in their appearance. Their slenderness and shortness of stature is a peculiarity of the native race to which they belong, the males of which are seldom more than from four feet to four feet four inches in stature, and the women a little less.

The boy's name is “Martinis”—the girl's “Flora.” Their complexion and skin are of a warm brown of a pleasing hue. Their physiognomy is intelligent and engaging. Their lustrous black eyes have a soft and affectionate expression, indicative of the perfect docility and mildness of disposition which characterise them. The nose is the worst feature in the face. Between the eyes there is scarcely any projection; and the nose is so spread as to be almost confounded with the cheeks, until the nostrils appear. They are wide, but very little raised. The lips are rather thick, and the mouth wide; the teeth white as those of a sheep; the forehead high and narrow, and the cheek-bones broad. The hair is of remarkable colour and texture. It resembles the wool of a black sheep—strong, short, and coarse. It grows in stiff spiral lines, so that the scalp is everywhere seen. Both children are naked to the middle, and bare-legged, but do not appear to feel the cold. They answer questions intelligently, and have evidently good natural faculties. The little girl has a slight impediment or stutter in her speech, but this may probably be overcome, as it is not observable when she sings. Both children have an excellent ear for music, and sing the “Buffalo Gals,” “I'm going to Alabama,” “Poor Uncle Ned,” “Britons never shall be Slaves,” and “Cheer Boys, Cheer,” with evident enjoyment. They also dance together, and Flora, when dancing a schottische, moves about with the easy and natural grace peculiar to her sex. Martinis is a fine little savage, beautifully formed, and with well-developed muscles. Flora is also a nicely-made child, of more slender and delicate frame, but perfectly healthy.

The dress worn by the boy Martinis is said to be that usually worn by the males of his tribe. He wears a tuft of small feathers on his forehead; beads hang from his temple and around his neck, and from a coloured girdle of beads round his loins are suspended strips of skin and the tails of animals. The girl wears a head-dress and lappet of coloured beads, a leopard-spotted piece of wool around her waist, and strips of hair cover her legs. Her demeanour is modest and feminine. Both children display so much aptitude for learning and for imitation, that in a few years it is probable their acquirements and habits will in no respect differ from those of the English children with whom they may be brought up.

As a connecting link in the human family, they must excite the liveliest interest. When they were first brought to England—which was about a year ago—if taken into an apartment, they would climb chairs and examine the looking-glasses and other objects with intense curiosity; but if suddenly spoken to they would crouch down upon the floor like half-tamed animals who dreaded the keeper's lash. Their language consisted of a few hoarse, guttural sounds, but now they have been so far reclaimed from savage life as to be able to speak English correctly, and differ little, except in form and colour, from the habits of children of a similar age.

HOW THE SCOTTS OF THIRLESTANE CAME TO BEGGARY.

SIR ROBERT's second wife was an unprincipled woman, of vindictive temper, and fierce passions; and by her he had several children. This woman had all the qualities calculated to make an oppressive and cruel step-dame; and accordingly her jealousy was excited by the fond affection which Sir Robert displayed towards his eldest son. She knew that his rich inheritance would descend to him, while her own sons would receive a very slender provision; besides, her husband's excessive attachment to his eldest son gave her no hope of his being persuaded to alienate from him any portion of the family property. Her jealousy accordingly grew into a disease, and her mind was distracted with rage and mortification. These feelings were still further aggravated, when Sir Robert built the Tower of Gamescleugh, and adorned that property with all manner of embellishments, as the future residence of his eldest son, who was now about to come of age, and for whom he had arranged a suitable and advantageous matrimonial alliance with a beautiful young lady, of high birth. The step-mother now lost all patience, and was firmly resolved to compass the destruction of her hated step-son.

The mason-work of the new Castle of Gamescleugh was completed on the young laird's twentieth birth-day, which was held as a high festival at Thirlestane. The lady resolved that his hours should be numbered; and she accordingly prepared, on the intended festival, to execute her horrid purpose. She had already secured in her interest the family piper, whose name was John Lally. This man procured threeadders, from which he selected the parts replete with the most deadly poison; and, having ground them to a fine powder, Lady Thirlestane mixed them in a bottle of wine.

Previous to the commencement of the feast at Thirlestane, the young laird went over the Etterick River to Gamescleugh, to inspect the finished work, and to regale the masons and other work-people, who had exerted themselves to have the castle walls completed by the birth-day. He was attended by John Lally. In the midst of the entertainment of the workmen, the young laird called for wine to drink their healths; and John filled his silver cup from the poison bottle, which the ill-fated youth hastily drank off. The piper immediately left the castle, as if to return home; but he was never more seen. The most diligent search failed in discovering him; and it is supposed that he escaped across the English border. Young Thirlestane was instantaneously taken violently ill; and such was the force of the poison, that he swelled and burst within an hour.

The news was immediately carried to Thirlestane, where a large party of the kith and kin of Scott had assembled to do the honour of the festival. But it may easily be conceived what a woful gathering it turned out to be. With one accord, the guests felt and said that the young laird was poisoned, but were unable to conceive who could have done so foul a deed to one so universally beloved. The old baron immediately caused a bugle to be blown, as a signal to all the family to assemble in the castle court. He then inquired:

"Are we all here?"

A voice from the crowd answered:

"All but the piper, John Lally!"

This sounded like a knell in the ears of Sir Robert. He knew the confidence which his lady placed in this servant. His eyes were at once open to the foul deed, and the conviction that his most dear and beloved son had been slain by the machinations of his wife, shocked his feelings so terribly, that he was almost deprived of reason. He stood very long in a state of utter stupefaction, and then began to repeat the answer which he had received. And this he continued to do for several days. "We are all here but John Lally, the piper!"

Sir Robert lived in a lawless time, justice was not rightly administered, and it was difficult to punish the crimes of the powerful and noble. Moreover, Sir Robert could not be induced to seek to make a public example of his own wife. However, he adopted a singular and complete, though most unjust method of vengeance.

He said that the estate belonged of right to his son, and that since he could not bestow it upon him while living, he would at least spend it upon him when dead. And he moreover expressed great satisfaction at the idea of depriving his lady and her offspring of that which she had played so foul a part to secure to them.

The body of the young laird was accordingly embalmed with the most costly drugs and spices, and lay in state at Thirlestane for a year and a day; during a whole of which time Sir Robert kept open house, welcoming and royally feasting all who chose to come. And in this way of reckless and wanton profusion he actually spent or mortgaged his entire estate. While the whole country, high and low, were thus feasting at Thirlestane, the lady was kept shut up in the vault of the castle, fed upon bread and water. During the last three days of this extraordinary feast, the crowds were immense. It was as if the whole of the south of Scotland were assembled at Thirlestane. Butts of the richest and rarest wines were carried into the fields; their ends were knocked out with hatchets, and the liquor was carried about in stoups. The burn of Thirlestane literally ran red with wine. The vault where the young laird was interred, in a leaden coffin, is under the roof of the church of Etterick, which is distant from Thirlestane upwards of a mile; and so numerous was the funeral procession, that when the leaders had reached the church, those in the rear had not nearly left the castle gates. Sir Robert died soon after this, and left his family in utter destitution. It is said that his wicked lady died in absolute beggary.—Burke's Family Romance.

IRISH CARMEN.

When a Dublin carman is summoned by a police constable, he almost invariably meets the accusation by a direct contradiction, and generally offers to swear to his statement. If he is called upon to answer for being shabbily dressed, and dirty in his apparel, he buys or borrows a good suit of clothes, shaves, and puts on a clear shirt, and then states boldly to the magistrate that he was just in the same state when "the policeman wrote him," and "that if he's let to the book he'll swear it." If he is summoned for being absent from his beast and vehicle, he insists that he was "holding a lock of hay" to his horse all the time. If the complaint is for furiously driving, the defence is set up that "the baste" was dead lame, that it was just after taking up a nail, and was on three legs "when he was wrote." If it is alleged that the horse was in wretched condition, and unfit to ply for public accommodation, he expresses his wonder that any fault should be found with a horse that could "rowl" four to the Curragh and back, without "turning a hair." Whatever statement is made for the defence, it is one that evinces imaginative power—for the plain, dull truth is never permitted the slightest admixture in the excuse offered; and even when the truth would amount to a defence, it is discarded "upon principle." A fellow waiting at a corn shop for a feed of oats declares that he was only ordering "a mash of bran;" his impression being that the truth is unlucky; besides, he never hears any one else telling truth, and why should he be singular? An old man named Pat Markey, formerly belonging to Baggot Street stand, and now some years dead, made a statement on one occasion utterly at variance with all probability, and directly opposed to the evidence adduced against him; however, upon the prosecutor's own showing, the case was dismissed, as the charge was not legally sustained. Pat was then asked why he did not tell the truth, as it would have been better for him, upon which he exclaimed:

"Musha, cock him up with the truth! that's more than ever I towld a magistrate yit." A Dublin carman never mentions the offence for which he is punished; he always substitutes for it the inducement which caused him to commit the fault. A fellow goes into a tobaccoist's, and while he is making his purchase, his horse moves on, and is stopped by a constable, who summons the driver. A fine is imposed, and if the mulcted party is afterwards asked what it was for, his reply is, "for taking a blast of the pipe." Another, on a Saturday evening, leaves his horse and car to mind themselves, and betakes himself to a barber's shop to have the week's growth taken off his chin: and when punished for being absent from his vehicle, he tells his friends that the "polis wrote him" for getting himself shaved. And on Sunday morning, if a devotional feeling prompts him to get "a mouthful of prayers," whilst his beast is left, without any control, upon the public street, he expresses his indignation at a consequent fine "for going to Mass," with, perhaps, the remark, that when such things can be done, there is very little use in having a Catholic commissioner. A carman is the greatest hyperbolist in existence. The Spaniard, who described the rain as so heavy that "it wet him to the marrow," was not so poetical or forcible in his exaggeration as are some of our jarveys. When a gentleman complained of the choking dust of the Rock Road, and declared that he did not think it possible for a road to be so dusty, his driver remarked:

"It's thrue for yer honor; but this road bates all others for dust, for by all account, there was dust on this road the day after Noah's flood." A lady who resided at Castleknock was wont to give a carman who lived in her neighbourhood a glass of grog, along with his fare, at the conclusion of his engagement. However, she became too sparing of the spirits, or too generous of the water; but the grog eventually became so weak, that its recipient criticised it with an oath, by asserting, that "if you threw a naggin of whisky over Essex Bridge, you might take up as strong grog at the Lighthouse."—Irish Quarterly.

A FORTUNE MADE FROM SMALL BEGINNINGS.

THERE dwelt many years ago, in the island of Bombay, a young Parsee, or fire worshipper, one of the poorest of his tribe, but endowed with a sagacity as great as that of the more cultivated dame of Christendom, and with as large and benevolent a heart. This man began life with less substantial ground for hope than the dreamer Ainschar possessed; for whereas he of the Arabian story had a basketful of glass and earthenware, our modern Guebre possessed but two old wine bottles. They were, to be sure, of more value than they are here, being articles held in great estimation in some parts of India—as, for example, in Scinde, where, when it was first occupied by the British, a couple of fowls could be obtained for an old porter-bottle. Still, it was decidedly "small beginning" for a merchant; but he managed to sell them advantageously, bought more, again made a profitable bargain, and became a regular bottle wallah—this is, seller of bottles.

In a country where nature so abundantly supplies the wants of her children—where a basket of charcoal and a handful of rice form the cuisine of the poor, it is easier to save than in a land where many wants consume the hard-earned pittance. Our Parsee accumulated annas till they grew into rupees, and became a thriving trader. Then the opium trade engaged his attention. Some doubtful speculation in it was mentioned in his presence, and, seeing with instinctive sagacity the probable profit, he closed with the proposal unhesitatingly; and thus—for it proved most successful—in the words of the friend who told me his history, "he cleared £10,000 by a stroke of his pen." From that moment his rise to the summit of prosperous fortune was rapid. Nor could it be called the work of chance, or a mere caprice of his destiny. He studied to meet the exigencies of his new position. He learned to speak the language, and understand, in a great measure, the commercial policy of the European strangers who rule the land. He was industrious, self-denying, and quick-witted. When we saw him, in his advancing age, he possessed, as the fruit of his own thought and energy, an income of some hundreds of thousands yearly; and he spent his wealth as liberally as he had earned it carefully. His charity scarcely knew a bound. In one year he gave away in alms to the poor, English and natives, the enormous sum of £90,000, for which he received the thanks of the Queen of England, and her likeness set in diamonds, besides the first title of knighthood bestowed on an Oriental since the days of Saladin. He founded a noble hospital. His wife gave her jewels to form a causeway between the islands of Bombay and Salsette, many lives having been lost among the natives in making the somewhat dangerous trajet; and he never drove out without carrying in his carriage bags of small coin, to fling to the mendicants who thronged his path.

It was while seated at his own table—in a bungalow he had purchased on the Kandallah Hills, and which he lent to our party as a place of rest during the ascent—that we first heard the story of the achievement of this wealth; and, gazing on the splendour around us, the "two bottles" appeared little else than an Eastern fable. The land for many a mile around was his; the plantations of roses, covering whole acres, and so sweetly clothing the wild mountain-side, were but a lovely portion of his merchandise—their essence but a fragrant addition to his heaps of gold. And then the luxury of this country retreat! The European furniture—the costly china dinner service, manufactured for him, and bearing his arms and initials—the plate, and servants, and rich viands—all from such a small beginning! It was marvellous as a fairy tale.

Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeehoy is now no more, but the memory of his good deeds is still and will be long cherished in the East.

HOW BULLFINCHES ARE MADE TO PIPE.

No school can be more diligently attended by its master, and no scholars more effectually trained to their own calling, than a seminary of bullfinches. As a general rule, they are formed into classes, of about six in each, and kept in a dark room, where food and music are administered at the same time: so that when the meal is ended, if the birds feel disposed to tune up, they are naturally inclined to copy the sounds which are so familiar to them. As soon as they begin to imitate a few notes, the light is admitted into the room, which still further exhilarates their spirits, and inclines them to sing.

In some establishments the starving system is adopted, and the birds are not allowed food or light until they sing. When they have been under this course of instruction in classes for some time, they are committed singly to the care of boys, whose sole business it is to go on with their education. Each boy assiduously plays his organ from morning till night, for the instruction of the bird committed to his care; while the class-teacher goes his regular rounds, superintending the progress of his feathered pupils, and scolding or rewarding them in a manner which they perfectly understand, and strictly in accordance with the attention or the disregard they have shown to the instructions of the monitor. This round of teaching goes on uninterruptedly for no less a period than nine months: by which time the bird has acquired firmness, and is less likely to forget or spoil the air by leaving out passages, or giving them in the wrong place.

At the time of moulting, the best-instructed are liable to lose the recollection of their tunes, and therefore require to have them frequently repeated at that time; otherwise, all the previous labour will have been thrown away. There are celebrated schools for these birds at Hesse and Fulda, from whence all Germany, Holland, and England receive supplies of the little musicians. In some cases, the birds have been taught to whistle different airs, without spoiling or confusing them; but in general, a simple air, with, perhaps, a little prelude, is as much as they can remember.

THE CRICKET IN THE WALL.

HARK! 'Tis the small voice of the cricket in the crevices of the wall. How cheerful is his little song. What is the subject of his lay? Is he chanting melody in the ear of his lady love, or is he pouring out his soul in an evening hymn? Is he singing the praise of some mighty insect warrior, or lauding the name of one who has gathered wisdom beyond that of his fellows? Have insects their heroes, their tyrants, their poets, and their orators? Who can tell?

But why is it that all living things have glad voices given them? Why is it, that when the sun has gone down and the hum of business is still—when man has withdrawn from the cares and bustle of the day, and the winds have retired to their caves, that the voice of the insect tribes, low and solemn, comes abroad upon the air? Why does not silence come down with the curtain of night, and brood with the darkness over us? It is that we may not forget the great teachings of nature. The heavens may be darkened by clouds, the stars may not look out to remind us, the face of the moon may be veiled, and the sound of the winds hushed; but the voice of the insect world tells us that life, beauty, joy, and happiness are still rife in the works of God. We remember the cricket that chirped in the corner when we sat by our father's fire-side. His voice was cheerful, and it was a pleasant thing to listen to his happy song. Father, mother, brothers, sisters, were beside us then, and we talked of the little warbler as a thing that we all loved. But the corner and the cricket and the home of our childhood are all gone—swept by Time into the returnless abyss of the past. And those who listened with us, where are they? Father, mother, brothers, sisters, where are they?

They are scattered and parted by mountain and wave, And some are in the cold silent womb of the grave.

Sad are the memories that the song of the cricket brings to our heart. It tells of happy days, now gone for ever of merry hours that have passed away. It brings clustering around us the furrowed brows of the living, and the pale, still faces of the dead.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

INCORUSTED BOILERS.—Mr. Ira Hill has informed us that he has accidentally made a valuable discovery, by which the deposition of lime upon steam-boilers may be obviated. Two or three shovels of sawdust are thrown into the boiler, after which process, he states, he never had any difficulty from lime, although using water strongly impregnated with it. He has always found the inside of his boilers as smooth as if just oiled. Whether the lime attaches itself to the floating particles of sawdust, instead of the boiler, or whether the tannic acid in the oak sawdust forms a salt with the lime, which will not attach itself to iron, remains to be explained. The sawdust was placed in the boiler for the purpose of stopping a leak. The experiment is cheap, and easily tried.

IMPROVEMENT IN PHOTOGRAPHY.—M. de Lucenay, of South Street, Finsbury, has patented a means of producing photographic images by artificial light. The light must be parallel or diffuse, according to the effect desired. It is rendered parallel by placing the light to the focus of a parabolic mirror, or to the principal focus of lenses for silhouettes of a natural size, or negative copies upon grounds of any kind which are covered with a sensible layer; while for portraits the light is rendered diffuse. Light is produced either by the galvanic battery, or by refractory bodies, heated by flames of oxygen, or by the combustion of artificial compositions. This is a very ingenious invention in photography.

POST OFFICE NOTICE.—Some misapprehension appears to exist with respect to the regulations in force for the transmission of periodical works and pamphlets to those foreign states with which this country has entered into convention for the mutual exchange of such works by the post, at a reduced rate of charge. It is necessary, therefore, to point out that only a single number of any periodical work, or a single pamphlet, is allowed to be sent in one cover, and that any infringement of this regulation will render the packet liable to be charged with postage, as a letter.

NEW DISINFECTING PROCESS.—A patent has been taken out by Mr. A. Gilbe, of South Street, Finsbury, for an improved mode of disinfecting and converting purulent and fecal matters, applicable to sewers, cesspools, drains, &c. The invention consists in producing a new deodorising powder, obtained by the combustion of the detritus of forests, lignites, vegetables, marine plants, any ligneous substances, rags, refuse of wool, &c., mixed in suitable proportions with substances which give them the property of absorbing or decomposing others. Under an analysis of the celebrated Messrs. Payen and Poinot, of Paris, the following was the result: Organic substances azotised, 16.44; non-azotised organic substances, 58.06; mineral substances, or cinders, 25.50, equal to 100. 2.50 alkaline chlorides and sulphates, a small quantity of carbonate; 14.56 carbonate of lime and magnesia, phosphate of lime, alumina, and oxide of iron; 8.44 argillaceous earth and sand. Another composition gave: Organic substances azotised, 20.41; non-azotised organic substances, 52.26; mineral substances, 27.33, equal to 100. 4.78 chlorides, alkaline, and sulphates, a little carbonate; 12.73 carbonate of lime and magnesia, phosphate of lime and oxide of iron; 9.82 argillaceous earth and sand.

THE CHEMISTRY OF NATURE.—It will undoubtedly astonish many, to be told that the great fabric of the animal and vegetable kingdoms which meet our eye, have been built up entirely from gases and water; and these, in most cases, colourless. Even the brown and solid trunks of gigantic forest trees, which have stood the shocks of ages, were composed originally of substances as apparently immaterial. This, although strange, is true; for plants derive nourishment exclusively from gaseous and liquid products, no solid probably being ever absorbed. Animals subsist chiefly on the organised tissues of plants, or on each other. The four chief nutritive bodies required by plants are—carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen; and these must be in a certain state of alteration or modification; as in air, carbonic acid, ammonia, &c. These gaseous bodies are mostly dissolved by the rain, in its passage downwards to the earth; and there absorbed by the fibrilla of the roots. In the minute cells of plants are to be found the most remarkable chemical decompositions, which no chemist can ever produce. Here various bodies are fixed or eliminated, and nourishment supplied to the tissues. Then, as to exhalation—from the green parts of plants we find that oxygen, the chief essential of plants and animals, is given off abundantly from those parts which are coloured. Carbonic acid is important to plants; containing carbon, a black body resembling charcoal, of which it is the chief constituent. A remarkable instance of the adaptation of birds to their leafy habitations, is, that in singing they give off this body largely, mixed with air. Animals are chiefly fed by plants, containing the same four elements above-mentioned, but modified in their condition. It is a well-known fact that, unless we eat and drink, we die; but that while we are eating and drinking we are really dying, may appear a paradox. It nevertheless is strictly true. The destruction and re-production of the particles of the human frame are continually going on: so that a man at forty years, though apparently the same as at twenty, has not probably a single atom in his body which has not been changed. Respiration itself is, in fact, a species of slow combustion. By this the vital current is purified and supplied with oxygen; while a portion of the same body combined with superfluous carbon, is again given off. So that we may truly be said "to die daily," and to enter again upon a kind of new life: this continues till the vital force finally becomes extinct, when another series of changes are produced.

INSTANTANEOUS FLOWERING OF PLANTS.—M. Herbert, a gentleman who has recently arrived from France, lately exhibited to a few ladies and gentlemen his method of causing plants to blow almost instantaneously. The plants selected—a group of geraniums and a rose tree—were planted in two rather deep boxes of garden mould, previously prepared with some chemical manure, and were then covered with glass shades. M. Herbert then proceeded to pour over the roots, from a small watering-pot, a chemical mixture, which, uniting to the ingredients already in the earth, caused a great heat, as was shown by an intense steam or vapour, which was evolved within the shades, and allowed, to some extent, to escape through a small hole in the top, which at first was kept closed. The effect upon the geraniums was certainly almost instantaneous: the buds beginning to burst in about five or six minutes, and the plants being in full bloom within ten minutes, when the blossoms were gathered by M. Herbert, and distributed amongst the ladies present. With the rose tree the exhibitor was less fortunate: M. Herbert explaining that it had only been in his possession about half or three-quarters of an hour—and he had, therefore, not had sufficient time to prepare for the experiment—thereby evincing that it occupies more time than would appear to the casual observer to be the case. The invention may prove useful where ladies require to decorate their drawing-rooms or boudoirs with the beauties of Flora, somewhat earlier in the season than they can otherwise be obtained.

MACCARONI FLOUR.—The Italians prepare their flour for macaroni, soup-pastes, cake, &c., with great care and wonderful success. From a coarser grain—poorer and more dirty than we grow in England—they produce a finer flour than the best which our patent machines and most highly-cultivated fields give to us. This is partly owing to their climate, which allows of methods of preparation impracticable in England, and partly to a degree of delicate manipulation and minute attention which our high-pressure rapidity sets out of the question. All through Italy, you may see by the outhouses of farmsteads, on the open threshing-floors, in the public streets of the cities, by the sides of bridges—as in Genoa, which is one large net-work of bridges in the upper town—in the open fields, and along the highways—anywhere and everywhere—small paved squares, surrounded by a wall of about two inches high, inclining on one side, and bordered by a groove or gutter on the side of the incline. In these places you see a quantity of wet corn thrown from a bucket full of grain and water, standing by the workman's side. Here the corn, after having been well washed in the bucket in many waters, is suffered to lie for a short time, until the water has drained off into the groove or gutter prepared for it. It is stirred gently; and as it dries, the wind carries off all the light particles which the water has not removed. The fine air and powerful sun do all the work of our close stoves and stifling kilns, with the superiority which fresh air must always have over the atmosphere of a roofed apartment. When thoroughly dry, the corn is then carried away by women, who sit, one on each side of a table, and separate, grain by grain, with their hands, the bad from the good—the light from the full-fed, until, at last, only the best of this washed, and cleansed, and separated corn remains for the mill. Yet, what does remain produces a flour superior to anything we see in England on the very richest tables, and superior, also, to anything we see in France, noted for her white wheat flour. It is the finest flour in the world, from a poor and ill-fed grain.

HOW TO KEEP EGGS FRESH.—Some of your readers may like to know how to keep eggs fresh. I send you an account of the method practised here: Take a half inch board of any convenient length and breadth, and pierce it as full of holes (each one and a half inch in diameter) as you can, without the risk of breaking one hole into another. I find that a board of two feet six inches in length, and one foot broad, has five dozen in it—say twelve rows of five each. Then take four strips of the same board of two inches broad, and nail them together edge-wise into a rectangular frame of the same size as your board. Nail the board upon the frame, and the work is done; unless you choose, for the sake of appearance, to nail a heading of three-quarters of an inch round the board on the top. This looks better, and sometimes may prevent an egg from rolling off. Put your eggs in this board as they come in from the poultry-house, the small end down, and they will keep good for six months, if you take the following precautions: Take care that the eggs do not get wet either in the nest or afterwards (in summer, hens are fond of laying among the nettles or long grass, and any eggs taken from such nests in wet weather should be put away for immediate use); keep them in a cool room in summer, and out of the reach of frost in winter, and then, I think, the party trying the experiment will have abundant reason to be satisfied with it. I find there are some in my larder which I am assured have been there nearer eight months than six, and which are still perfectly fresh and good. In fact, it is a practice here to accumulate a large stock of eggs in August, September, and October, which last until after the fowls have begun to lay in the spring. If two boards are kept, one can be filling and the other emptying at the same time. This is an exceedingly good plan for those persons who keep a few fowls for the supply of eggs to their own family; but would, perhaps, not do so well for those who keep a large stock of hens, as it would take up too much room. I have endeavoured to account for the admirable way in which eggs keep in this manner, by supposing that the yolk floats more equally in the white, and has less tendency to sink down to the shell than when the egg is laid on one side. Certainly, if the yolk reaches the shell, the egg does spoil immediately.—T. G., Clitheroe.

THE SALT TRADE.—Out of 97 salt-works in the kingdom, 79 are situate in the valley of the Weaver, in Cheshire, where the supply of salt is supposed to be practically inexhaustible. It is found in a dry, semi-transparent state, resembling lumps of alum, when it is called "rock salt," which is mainly exported to Holland and Belgium, for manuring there into white salt. But the supply is chiefly produced by evaporating brine pumped up out of the earth from the beds of the rock, which, when crystallised, is termed "common salt," and used principally for pickling and preserving fish, meat, and vegetables; also, as a mordant, and generally by all manufacturers of alkalies; then, again, when dried and rendered fit for table purposes, it is denominated "stoved salt," and consumed as a seasoning or condiment. It requires about 12 cwt. of coal (burgie) to evaporate brine sufficient to produce a ton of salt; the entire production of which, in this kingdom, now amounts to 800,000 tons per annum. One moiety is exported to North America, the Baltic, and the northern parts of Scotland and Ireland; and the other half is consumed at home. (Of this immense manufacture, nearly 7-8ths are produced on the banks of the River Weaver—the bulk of which is exported from Liverpool; another portion is used by the alkali manufacturers in St. Helen's; and the residue is chiefly sent to the east coast of England; scarcely 10,000 tons per annum being consumed in Liverpool. Mr. Braithwaite Poole, in his "Statistics of Commerce," says: "There are upwards of a million feet of pannage contained in the salt-works of the United Kingdom, which, together with the necessary machinery and other appliances, 600 flats, trows, barges, and boats, to prosecute the traffic, has been estimated as representing a capital of £1,000,000, and employing upwards of 3000 men."

THE FRENCH MODE OF BREEDING FISH.

The French government consider the matter of much importance. Rivers and lakes, in which there were no fish, now literally teem with them.

A commission of savans is appointed to superintend the process. Salmon, perch, tench, and even lobsters are to be domesticated—so far, at least, as being bred and reared out of the reach of their numerous enemies.

Perhaps no animal will multiply so fast as fish. The tench produces 38,000 eggs, the mackerel 546,000, the cod-fish 1,357,000. The herring produces also vast numbers, and if only 2,000 of any one of these came to perfection, there would be, in the second year, 12,000,000, in the third 2,000,000,000. To protect only, therefore, is to insure the production of millions of fishes; but how any fish now happens to escape their enemies, natural and artificial, seems even more wonderful than their powers of production.

The breeders of fish artificially in this country are Mr. Gurney, of Carshalton, and Mr. Young, of Lochshin; but what should hinder the plan being tried by the landed proprietors near the sides of all the rivers in this and the sister kingdom? and why not try to introduce the salmon into rivers where it has not yet been found?

Mr. Shaw appears to have been the first to show that the parr and the smolt are only stages of the salmon; and to prove that, by the construction of side ponds, with a small stream running over them, with sufficient water to keep them covered (but not too deep), so as to favour the development of the spawn with as much rapidity as possible, the desired end can be accomplished. The small fish will thus be preserved from their larger enemies until they have an opportunity of shifting better for themselves; and vast supplies will be afforded to the sea, to return either to the same spot, or most certainly to the same river, in another year.

The grisle, or young salmon, of from 2½ to 3 lbs. weight, has been sent to market, the spawn from which they have come having only been deposited in the preceding October or November—three months of this to be allowed for hatching—and often a longer period. A grisle weighing 6 lbs in the month of February, after spawning, has, in its return from the sea in September, weighed 13 lbs.; and it is said that a salmon fry of April will in June weigh 4 lbs., and in August 6 lbs.

Taking the rapid growth, the immense powers of reproduction, and the effect which the artificial production seems to have upon the fish, we hardly know a subject of greater national importance than the encouragement of this practice.

We would strongly urge the construction of breeding-ponds near the heads of our principal rivers, properly secured.

INVENTIONS OF THE CHINESE.—It had been considered that the Chinese were not an inventive people—but this was a mistake. The art of printing was known in China 900 years before any knowledge of it prevailed in Europe. Printing was first introduced into Europe early in the fifteenth century. The Chinese printers were generally itinerants. They next discovered the magnetic needle: this took place in the traditional period when the Yellow Emperor, having missed his way, a little carriage was built, on the top of which was a figure, with a needle which always pointed to the north—and thus the route was discovered. The effects of the loadstone were also mentioned in their dictionary. We were also probably indebted to the Chinese for the mariners' compass—for it had been long known to them before it was to us, and Marco Polo made a visit to China, and no doubt communicated it from them to his countrymen. Gunpowder was invented there many centuries before it was known in England—but it was only used for fireworks; and, strange to say, the component parts were nearly the same as the European mixture.

[SILVER-GILT CASKET AND WINE-COOLER.]

SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION
IN DUBLIN.

SILVER GILT CASKET AND WINE-COOLER.

OUR first illustrations present rather a strong contrast. They consist of a delicately worked casket for the fair hands of a countess, and a wine-cooler, accompanied by a cup and goblet, for the more exquisite and refined enjoyment of after-dinner exuberances. Both are the manufacture of the Messrs. West and Son, and each contributes largely to the support of their well-established reputation for works in which industry is poetically blended with art. The exhibitors seem to have a keen relish for the antiquities and traditions of their native land. They are enthusiasts in their love of everything Irish. And as we have not yet been toned down to the leaden cosmopolitan feeling, we can heartily approve of their patriotic preferences.

The casket is silver gilt, ornamented with Irish gems, and is, we are informed, a faithful copy of an Irish antique. The tracery and chasings are very beautiful. The stand is of bog yew. Altogether, it is a pretty present to make to a lady; and when we mention that it was a farewell acknowledgment from the ladies of Ireland to the Countess of Clarendon, the wife of one of the ablest viceroys Ireland has had during the past half century, our readers will agree with us that it was a very graceful and appropriate memorial of the affectionate esteem of the warm-hearted daughters of Erin for that exemplary lady.

The wine-cooler is a more massive piece of workmanship. Bacchus himself might sit down before it without grumbling at its capacity. It is in the form of an Irish mether, or drinking cup, and is made of bog oak, and lined with chased silver. This cooler, like the ancient mether, is four-lipped, and has no lid, which omission has been interpreted to signify unbounded hospitality. Now, as the Irish people, from the remotest to the present period, have been distinguished for this generous quality, it must, we presume, be considered to have been rather a happy idea which suggested this peculiar form for so luxurious an article as a wine-cooler. Why, the ancient Irish, for want of pewter or pottery, ingeniously fashioned the mether out of the stump of a tree. Like the ancient Britons, their race-kindred, they drank metheglin to each other and the gods under the broad roof-tree of heaven, out of a cup of a shape which we moderns have vainly endeavoured to rival. The mether is quite an original design; but, as in the present day drinking-cups can be multiplied ad infinitum, and people have solid objections to drinking with each other, just as the north American Indians pass round the calumet of peace, it can only be regarded as a curiosity.

A drinking cup now, with four lips, would be ignored throughout the whole realm of thirsty-land. Being more cleanly in our notions, we are more reserved in our habits, and dislike the familiarity which in ancient times subsisted between saint and savage, baron and serf, lady and serving-maid. Whether we have improved in hospitality may reasonably be doubted—for, as civilisation progresses, society becomes more and more self-reliant, and the conviction is forced upon us, that genuine hospitality is the exclusive and about the best attribute of the human race, when in conditions which render Necessity the Lord Chief Justice of the land.

Ancient hospitality has a pleasant, musical ring about it; but when fairly considered, it was only with the many a system of giving and taking, and with the few, an incentive to idleness and depravity. As it never stimulated industry, but rather led to scenes of drunken excess, it can only be ranked amongst the humbler virtues. We don't call relieving a vagabond or assisting a scamp out of a difficulty a virtue—for the intended good invariably works tremendous evil to the individual; he sinks lower: therefore, as the hospitality of the ancient Irish was more of this and of the equally degenerative convivial character, we cannot think that the preservation of the form of an ancient bacchanal cup shows the best possible taste. As an antiquity its place is in a museum.

[BROOCHES, BY WATERHOUSE.]

Many-lipped vessels are only adapted for poor and lazy races. Why, in the present day husband and wife will scarcely drink out of the same glass. Imagine, then, the mether, after having gone the round of half a dozen men addicted to smoking tobacco, being handed to a lady! We are afraid that the admirers of "the old nobility" will never be able to revive the primitive customs of the baronial times. The temperance, wisdom, and industry—call it exclusiveness, if you like—of the present day would blot a score of drinking and fighting ages quite out of the calendar. We are not hospitable, it is true; but we are learning to be just to one another: and that tendency takes in kindness in all its amplitude.

Our next subject is a group of brooches—one of the numerous contributions of Mr. Waterhouse, Dublin. The combination of the metal and the stones in them is very effective. The execution of all this kind of work shows no inconsiderable amount of skill on the part of the artisans, and also satisfactorily proves that the Great Exhibition of 1851 was of essential service to this class of industrial art—for ever since it has manifested wonderful improvement; indeed, we may safely affirm that every description of work in the precious metals evinces a more cultivated intelligence in the manufacturer.

But while taste and talent are unquestionably displayed in these articles of luxury, we cannot conscientiously accord to them any praise on the score of marked invention. These brooches, effective as they would be on almost any ground, especially on the bosom of a lady, are, with one exception—that in the foreground—simply snakes pierced by arrows—a very old form, and one which may be said to be common to all those nations who, in some shape or other, accepted the serpent as the emblem of wisdom—with the addition of the modern clasp. An ancient Egyptian might have worn one of similar form to retain his pallium across his shoulders.

But the poverty of invention, so glaring in the productions of this class of art, must, we think, be entirely attributed to the servile imitation of old models so sedulously impressed upon the mind of the student. British artists live in the old fountains, without ever dreaming of those sparkling and untouched at their feet, or even evincing a desire to go in search of a fresher one. So that practically they are Greek, Roman, and Egyptian artists—not British; and manufacturers and workmen being compelled to follow them, the result is, that in every exhibition of the works of art we find the unvarying characteristics—the same old type, but extravagantly loaded with ornaments.

It is one of the purposes of these great exhibitions to demonstrate all this by practical evidence of the fact, and to show that it is in the manufacture, per se—we mean the working part, the science, the manipulations of the materials—we say, that if in the manufacture of articles of taste, the improvements made during the past few years have been extraordinary, it is quite evident that a great advance might and ought to have been made in the intellectual departments. Art should be a promoter, not a stop-gap in the way of development. It should lead, not follow. When it does—as unquestionably in these islands it does—lag behind—and far behind, too—the energy of men of capital, the skill of workmen, and the wants of the age, it imperfectly discharges its duty, cramps its spiritual instincts, and exposes its professors to the grave charge of being indifferent to that expansion, that freedom of thought, without which art is merely mechanical drudgery.

Such exhibitions as the Great Dublin one can scarcely fail to stimulate the desire universally felt for a change in this respect; but artists are a stubborn class. Once indoctrinated, they are fixed for ever in a belief. The great of old were not so unimaginative or dependent. What does the poet tell us of the mighty who slumber in the chapel of Florence?—

Oh till the day was gone, Be phael himself—
He and his haughty rival—patiently,
Humbly to learn of those who came before,
To steal a spark from their authentic fire—would stand amid works of art, pondering, not to copy, but to catch the inspiration which in time crowns art with the rarest and purest gems. We ought to study to excel, to originate—not to equal. There are British and Irish workmen who could rival the expert jewellers of Florence: they would experience no difficulty in making such a table as the poet Rogers describes:

The toilet-table was of silver wrought,
Florentine art, when Florence was renowned;
A gay confusion of the elements,
Dolphins and boys, and shells, and fruits, and flowers;

but British art would not be satisfied with such a performance. It demands something new—something not hitherto done; and that aspiration it cannot realise until the artists themselves, taking counsel from the examples of the illustrious in other branches of knowledge, emancipate themselves from the thralldom of worshipping to idolatry the graceful spirit of the Greek, and the devotional fervour of the Christian schools of art.

When we contrast modern art with ancient, we can perceive, in the most excellent, a striking similarity. An Irish or English vase, for instance, is, after all, but a copy of a Greek or Roman model. Probably in the manipulation of the metals the moderns far excel the artists of antiquity; but in porcelain, the productions of this day can scarcely be said to rival the inimitable designs of the Greeks and Romans. This is easily accounted for. The moderns have adopted the styles of the Greeks, instead of relying on their own inventive powers.

During the three centuries immediately preceding this, academical correctness usurped the place which should have been occupied by original genius. Technical proficiency in drawing, colouring, and composition, were held up as the leading elements in the revival of the arts. There was certainly opportunity for the healthy growth of true artists; but the turn of society and of social education rather suppressed and misdirected, than encouraged those spiritual tendencies which form the first essential condition of art. And such qualities are precisely those which royal academies have ever ignored by their dull routine and formal discipline. Their exhibitions, indeed, present abundant evidence of industry on the one hand, and careful teaching on the other; but they are destitute of soul. In their servility to classic forms they have become tame. Their developments are confined within the range prescribed by their models. Now, as such exhibitions as this Irish one are expressly intended to show that creative talent is not only the highest talent, but, in producing the noblest spiritual expressions, the student not only learns the technical part of his work, but insensibly imbibes the higher and yet more necessary spirit of it. We do trust that the age will yet produce some really great artist, who will put the "mannerists" to the blush, and dare to be independent. The poetical temperament of the Irish eminently fits some of their most intellectual sons for this triumph. We may even anticipate such an event with much more confidence, when we consider that their country is poor in opportunities, but rich in ideality, imagination, and devotion. Poverty, after all, is the nursery of talent.

Our last illustration this week amply supports us in this anticipation. It is a vase which was presented to the Duchess of Northumberland by the ladies of Ireland, on her leaving the Irish capital, on the occasion of her husband, the Duke, resigning his office of Lord Lieutenant. It was manufactured by Messrs. West and Son, jewellers, College Green, Dublin. The shell and base are of bog-oak; but it looks like one mass of gold, silver, and precious stones. It cost five hundred guineas: no inconsiderable sum, when we come to reflect that, owing to rapid changes in the ministry, the Irish ladies are very often impelled to make such presents. The vase, however, is a splendid specimen of Irish taste and ingenuity. Indeed, it may be considered as a brilliant addition to that vast army of vases which of late years have exercised the skill of both native and foreign artists. We mean the race-cups which are annually contended for all over England. This, we think, presents considerable improvement; for it is not limited to one metal, and the style in the elaboration is markedly inventive.

This vase deserves some notice from the multiplicity of objects introduced into the decorative department, and the good taste displayed in their selection. It is pre-eminently Irish, for it is composed entirely of native materials. The gold is Irish—it has been the tradition of ages that the Green Isle abounds in that precious metal—the silver is Irish, so is the glass, the gems, and—most emphatically—so is the bog oak. The cup is a sparkling crystal, profusely ornamented with gems. An Irish wolf dog sits upon the brim, in an attitude of grim watchfulness; his fore-paws rest upon the shield and sword of an ancient chieftain. He is guarding the arms of his warrior master. The design and execution here are excellent. They carry the mind back to the days when Ireland was infested by wolves, and peopled by a race over whom the most barbarous and bloodthirsty chieftains exercised the most absolute authority. Those gifted with a more poetical imagination, when looking upon this image of a noble dog, may fancy that such an one followed the fairy footsteps of the daughter of Thuathal, as she emerged from the Palace of Tara, on a bright summer's morning.

On her soft cheek with tender bloom
The rose its tint bestowed;
And in her richer lips' perfume
The ripened berry glowed.

But as such coinages of the brain are denied to those who cannot view the past through a crystal medium, every one must accept the impressions conjured up by this sentinel wolf-dog just as they arise, and pay the artists the compliment of having being able to excite more than a fleeting interest in their beautiful production.

[THE NORTHUMBERLAND VASE.]

Among the other figures is Hibernia, seated upon a throne, playing the harp, and supported by dolphins. This is emblematical of the naval advantages she has never yet had the good fortune to enjoy. But let us, parenthetically, prognosticate that, when her emigration mania has exhausted itself, the connection—the heart-connection—between the millions of Irish in America and the millions left behind, will infallibly lead to the establishment of a mighty maritime communication between the western shores of Ireland and the great Atlantic States of America. Then Ireland will be able to know herself, and the Hibernia of the future promise not only to rival Britannia in matronly demeanour, but have some more staid appreciation of the hitherto—to her—fatal gift of beauty. The canopy over the head of Hibernia is supported by a phoenix—for Ireland an emblem of hope of a new birth; but the ashes ought not to wait long for the life-giving fire, or some terrible gust of passion might scatter them far and wide. The stem is composed of the antlers of the giant Irish stag, silver gilt. The head, as well as the pedestal, is of bog oak. Two silver deer-hounds, in picturesque attitudes, complete the tout ensemble of this really marvellously well executed vase.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF
"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WITH the accession of Elizabeth to the throne of her sister, all our sympathy with her, as a woman, ends. She had suffered persecution, but it had not taught her mercy. Occasionally, indeed, she will excite our admiration as a sovereign, by the display of firmness and courage, too often contrasted, alas! with the debasing qualities of meanness, treachery, and revenge.

All relations having been broken off with the court of Rome, the new sovereign, like her father, endeavoured to establish a certain uniformity of religion. Toleration was a stranger to her heart and nature, and the Nonconformists were persecuted with as much bitterness as the Catholics. Soon after her coronation, Elizabeth repaired in great state to St. Paul's—and a curious scene is related of the sound rating which she gave the dean, even in the church itself, for having placed a Prayer Book, adorned with curious prints, upon the cushion intended for her use: the poor man intended it as a New Year's gift. The royal virago called him a most ignorant person, and demanded how he dared—after her proclamations against pictures, relics, and the images of saints—to place such an abomination before her.

The dignitary replied, that he had done so with the humble hope of pleasing her majesty—that the prints were both rare and costly; wittily adding, that if he were an ignorant person, her grace ought the better to pardon him.

What rendered the conduct of Elizabeth the more inconsistent on this occasion was, that up to the very time of her thus publicly insulting the dean, she retained in the Chapel Royal a large silver crucifix, suspended over the altar, together with candlesticks and other ecclesiastical ornaments, such as are generally used in the Catholic church. The intention of the whole scene, which was well got up, was to obtain a little popularity with the citizens of London.

The great Protestant queen, as she is styled, loved pomp and ceremonial, and willingly retained as much as or more than was consistent with the simple tenets of the reformed church, of which she had declared herself the head.

Like all of the Tudor line, Elizabeth, throughout her protracted reign, evinced the most determined hostility to all who stood in the order of succession to the crown. Margaret, Countess of Lennox, after the youthful Queen of Scots the next heir, was arrested and committed to the Tower, upon the most frivolous pretext—namely, that of sorcery.

Elizabeth's hatred and persecution of her beautiful and unfortunate rival, Mary, amounted almost to a species of insanity, and occasioned the foulest stain upon her character, both as a queen and a woman. These feelings of hatred and jealousy appear to have been purposely kept up by the artful representations of one of the maids of honour—a Mistress Sands, who had formerly been in the service of the Queen of Scots.

One great cause of the popularity of Elizabeth was the uncertainty which existed in the minds of men touching the succession. Many laws had been passed contradicting each other—her heirs were Catholic. A general desire was felt that her majesty should marry, and, by having issue of her own, extinguish the conflicting claims of the Queen of Scots, the Poles, and the Suffolk family. Parliament even ventured to address her upon the subject, expressing the wish of the nation—a proposition which was coldly received: Elizabeth replying that, in a matter of such importance, she would be advised.

On the death of her French husband, Mary Stuart, persecuted by the Queen Mother of France, who governed in the name of her imbecile son, returned to her own kingdom, despite the hostile attempt of Elizabeth—who sent a fleet for that purpose—to intercept her. She afterwards devoted all her energies and intrigues to prevent the beautiful widow from entering into the bonds of a second marriage: and the consummate art and treachery by which on several occasions she carried her point, may be fairly considered as one of the causes of the downfall of her rival—since it drove her at last into an ill-assorted marriage with Henry Darnley—a prince not less vain and frivolous than heartless and ungrateful.

But we must not anticipate events.

In order to mark her ill feeling towards France, Elizabeth had been induced to send an expedition to Normandy, under the command of Warwick; but although her resentment induced her to take such a step, the natural parsimony of her disposition prevented her doing the only thing which could render it effectual—namely, supplying it with money—in war, as in peace, the sinew of every enterprise.

The consequence was that Rouen was taken, and upwards of three hundred of the English auxiliaries put to the sword, by the troops of the King of France: on the receipt of which intelligence, there was great discontent in London—most men blaming the avarice of the queen, in not supporting her generals and troops in a befitting manner.

With Elizabeth to decide was to act. The fact that Rouen had actually fallen appears to have been concealed from her. The following letter, which she wrote with her own hand to the Earl of Warwick, was worthy the queen of a great and powerful nation like England; and is one of the best specimens extant of her epistolary style, which was not always remarkable either for brevity or clearness.

"MY DEAR WARWICK,

"If your honour and my desire could accord with the loss of the needfullest finger I keep, God so help me in my utmost need, as I would gladly lose that one joint for your safe abode with me; but since I cannot, that I would, I will do, that I may and will rather drink in an ashen cup, that you and yours should not be succoured, both by sea and land, and that with all speed possible; and let this my scribbling hand witness it to them all.

"Yours as my own,
"E. R."

The reign of Elizabeth, more than any other, was marked by royal progresses or visitations. The one to Cambridge—with the exception of her visit to Leicester, at Kenilworth Castle—was the most magnificent she ever made, and certainly has been the best described. A description of the dress in which she entered the town, we trust will prove acceptable to our female readers.

She was attired in a large gown of black velvet, pinked or cut; according to the fashion of the day: the sleeves made monstrously large at the top, and slashed, to show the lining of cloth of silver, passmentures, and puffs. Her majesty wore a cowl upon her head, set with pearls and precious stones, and over that a high-crowned hat, spangled with gold, and a huge plume of different-coloured feathers.

Only imagine a queen of England at the present day appearing in public in such a costume! The people would take her for a mad woman or a rope-dancer; but in the reign of Elizabeth it was considered, no doubt, both as becoming and proper.

During her stay, the queen resided at King's College; and, on the Sunday following her arrival, attended Divine service in great state, four doctors of divinity bearing the canopy over her head.

We fear that we shall very much shock many of the orthodox admirers of the great Protestant queen, when we inform them that, during her visit to Cambridge, Elizabeth commanded a species of theatre to be erected in the magnificent chapel of King's College, where, on the evening of the Sabbath, the Aulularia of Plautus was enacted before her.

A Pagan play—and that not the most decent which has been handed down to us—in a Christian church; the stage lighted by the torches held in the hands of the guards, who were drawn up on either side of the platform!

Dr. Caius, the founder of the college of that name immortalised by Shakspeare, had the honour of disputing before her majesty, in St. Mary's Church. The subject was, whether monarchy or republic were best. Elizabeth, who took great pleasure in such discussions, repeatedly called out to the disputants, "Loquimini altius!" and even left her seat under the canopy of state, the better to hear them.

That same evening, she heard a second play, called Dido, acted in the church. The young student who represented the heroine so pleased Elizabeth—he being a handsome, ready-witted youth—that she bestowed on him a purse of twenty pounds per annum: the only benefaction which marked her gratification at the reception she had received.

The last day of her progress in Cambridge she received a pair of gloves from the master and fellows of Christ College, in memory of her great grandmother, Margaret, mother of Henry VII.

Elizabeth was perhaps the most consummate actress of her time. She had an admirable knowledge of stage effect—most of her points told. The night before her departure, she was seated in her withdrawing-room—still known by the name of the "King's Lodging"—with Cecil—the latter wearing his robes as Chancellor of the University.

"I think it will do, Master Cecil!" said the queen, glancing at an open paper, which she held in her hand; "God's wot! but we shall have some trouble in committing it to memory—albeit we have a familiar knowledge of the Latin tongue!"

The paper to which the speaker alluded, was the famous Latin oration which Cecil had secretly got written for her, and which her majesty, after great entreaty, was to be persuaded to speak on the following day, when she promised to attend a second disputation in the Church of St. Mary's.

"You will perceive, madam," said the minister, "that the orator merely alludes to a royal foundation in Cambridge—nothing definite."

Elizabeth smiled. She perfectly approved of the prudent foresight of her adviser. It cost nothing beyond a few words to raise the hopes of the university—but it would take money to gratify them: and money was one of those things which the queen liked least to part with.

"Good, Cecil—good!" she replied; "our great grandam's benefaction hath surely been sufficient! but we will consider of the matter, and bide our time." With this Elizabeth dismissed him; and, during the two following hours, remained seated at the lamp, conning her oration for the following day.

At an early hour the Church of St. Mary was filled with the heads of colleges, doctors of divinity, wearing their scarlet hoods, masters of arts, and bachelors, impatiently awaiting the arrival of the queen, to commence the disputation, which lasted, like the former one, several hours—to the great delight of the assistants: the long theological disputes which for three preceding reigns had divided the kingdom, having created a taste for such displays.

At the conclusion Elizabeth rose from her seat, and was about to quit the church, when the Duke of Norfolk and her favourite, Lord Robert Dudley, threw themselves at her feet; and, having previously rehearsed their parts, entreated her majesty to address the assembly in Latin.

"For shame, my lords!" exclaimed her majesty, with well-acted surprise and confusion; "how should I, who am a woman, and altogether an unlearned person, take on me to speak before so many scholars and divines, in one of the ancient tongues? If I may speak my mind in English," she added, "I would not stick"—her own expression—"at the matter."

"Madam," said the Chancellor Cecil, bowing low, "nothing may be said openly in English before the university."

"Then do you speak for me! you are Chancellor—and a Chancellor, as you well know, Sir William, is a sovereign's mouth-piece!"

"True, madam!" answered the statesman; "but I am not your Chancellor, I am only that of the university!"

The Bishop of Ely, throwing himself upon his knees, added his entreaties to those of the Duke of Norfolk and Lord Robert; adding, "that three words from her august lips would be better than a studied oration from any other person in the world!"

"No—no! I cannot!" simpered Elizabeth; "my shamefacedness would betray me! Do not ask it!"

So many distinguished and noble personages at last joined in the request, that her majesty was fain to yield, and made a long set oration in excellent Latin. The commencement and conclusion of her speech we translate for our readers, in order to give them an idea of the slowness of royal speakers in those days; but perhaps, after all, they are not much different at the present. The first paragraph of the speech commenced thus:

"Although womanly shamefacedness, most celebrated university, might well determine me from delivering this my unlaboured oration before so great an assembly of the learned, yet the intercession of my nobles, and my own good will towards the university, impel me to say somewhat."

The "this my unlaboured oration" is most exquisite, and says no less for the nerve of the royal actress, than the control over the risible muscles of their countenances exercised by her auditors—amongst whom, in all probability, was the poor scholar who had written and prepared it; neither is the concluding sentence less amusing:

"It is time, then, that your ears, which have been so detained by this barbarous sort of an oration, should now be released from the pain of it."

At the conclusion of the speech, there was a marvellous shout of applause, and loud cries of "Vivat Regina!"

"Taceat Regina!" replied the queen, with a modest look; moreover, adding her heartfelt wish that all who had heard her poor and unskilled attempt might drink of the waters of Lethe.

On the 10th of the month of August, Elizabeth left Cambridge, and progressed by another route towards London.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which taken at the flood leads on to fortune.

SHAKESPEARE.

ELIZABETH had not long returned to London, before her pride and jealousy were alarmed by the discovery that the Archduke Charles—one of the most accomplished princes and generals in Europe, who had formerly been a suitor for her hand—was about to conclude a treaty of marriage with the widowed Queen of Scots. Had Mary—the still innocent and unsuspecting Mary—been permitted to conclude this alliance, supported by such a husband—a man whom she could at once have esteemed and loved—how different would have been her fate; but her evil genius, in the form of her cousin, again interfered to mar her happiness. Elizabeth not only wrote to her to say that she considered the alliance as every way unsuitable, but instructed Cecil to write to the Duke of Wurtemberg, to hint to the emperor that his son might renew his addresses for her own hand, with every prospect of success. His imperial majesty, more clear-sighted than Mary, was not, however, to be deceived. The latter in an evil hour consented to break off the treaty rather than do anything to forfeit the affection of her dear sister, when she at the same time requested to propose a match more agreeable to her views.

To the astonishment and indignation of both countries, Elizabeth named her own favourite, the Earl of Leicester—who, with good reason, was suspected of being her lover—for the distinguished honour of espousing the Queen Dowager of France, Queen Regnant of Scotland, and heiress of the English throne: a proposition which at once marks the treachery and insincerity of her character—since her own attachment to that vain and heartless noble was too generally credited to lead any one to suppose that she was serious.

Dudley—the ambitious son of a yet more ambitious father—nearly ruined himself by partially falling into the snare. Whilst the affair was upon the tapis, his pride and insolence were remarked by all the court—particularly by his enemies the Cecils, who rejoiced at the opportunity of embroiling him with the queen, and probably of removing him from her presence for ever; for Elizabeth was not likely ever to forgive the man who preferred the hand of her rival to the uncertain tenure of her own capricious favour.

Leicester had been summoned to a private interview with his royal mistress, who for several days had been distracted with jealous doubts and mortification. Fortunately he had a friend far more clear-sighted than himself, who was continually near the presence of the queen: which friend was no other than Mistress Sands, her bed-chamber woman—an avowed enemy of Mary Stuart—a sycophant and a heartless flatterer, but shrewd and quick at guessing at the humours of her mistress—whose restless air and dissatisfied looks she had noticed whenever the subject of the earl's marriage with the widowed queen was alluded to. It was her duty to conduct the favourite by the private stairs to the closet of the queen—and she resolved to avail herself of the occasion, to warn him of the perilous position in which he stood.

"So, my lord," she said, with a satirical smile, as Leicester made his appearance, "I have to congratulate you at last upon a royal marriage—albeit it is not the one we both once contemplated!"

"Yes," replied the earl, with a self-satisfied air, "our gracious sovereign has proposed that I should marry her cousin the Queen of Scots. Her majesty, no doubt, feels it necessary to have some devoted friend on whom she can rely to manage the affairs of that distracted kingdom: and who more fitting than the man whom she so long honoured with her friendship and—"

"Love!" added the lady, concluding the sentence for him; "my lord! my lord! I blush for your credulity!"

The haughty noble looked surprised and displeased. "You, of all men," continued the speaker—who knew the character and temper of Elizabeth—"to have been so deceived! She hates her cousin, both as a sovereign and a woman. To pleasure her she would not part with a dog she valued—much less the man she loved. You are nearer to the Tower than Holyrood—your head is more likely to become acquainted with the axe, my lord, than the crown matrimonial of Scotland!"

"You jest!" exclaimed the nobleman, whose confidence, however, in his rising fortune was considerably shaken.

"I'll jesting at such a moment, or on such a subject!" replied Mistress Sands. "Had you not been dazzled by the glittering prize, you must have seen the triumph of the Cecils, the contentment of your enemies, the confusion of your friends. The queen has sent for you, my lord," she added, "to try your fidelity—the worth of your oft-repeated protestations. Her love is alarmed—her jealousy excited. This very morning she demanded of the Chancellor whether one of her nobles contracting or attempting to contract a marriage with a foreign sovereign, would not be construed into an act of treason."

"And his answer?"

"Yes."

"The traitor!" muttered the favourite; "why, he hath spoken with me upon the subject a hundred times!"

"But not officially."

"The queen herself proposed it to her council."

"But never intended it!" answered the bed-chamber woman and confidant of Elizabeth. "Her majesty has never proposed the marriage with her own lips to you?"

"Never," said the earl.

"Then all may be repaired, and the fortunes of Robert Dudley rise higher than ever! Elizabeth expects you! It is her intention, I am sure, to sound you on the subject; for she is tired of the heart-ache it has caused her. Should she go so far as to propose the hand of the young Queen of Scots, positively reject it! Declare that you prefer death—banishment—anything—to the thought of marrying one who is her enemy; of being banished from her presence. But why do I prate thus?" she added. "The Earl of Leicester is a courtier, if he is not a lover, and knows better than my poor skill can teach him, how to touch the chords which make music or discord in a woman's heart! Follow me, my lord; the queen expects you!"

With a step far less haughty and assured than when he had entered the palace, the favourite followed the speaker to the ante-room conducting to the royal closet.

Elizabeth was seated at a table, which was incumbered, rather than spread, with a mass of correspondence and state papers. She was in one of those soft, yielding humours in which the woman triumphed over the sovereign. The fancied defection of Leicester had wounded her pride—we might almost add, her affection; for there is little doubt that, at this period of her life, she was warmly attached to him.

"A crown!" she murmured bitterly, to herself. "And I am to help him to it! I would sooner see him dead—headless, like his father—than in the arms of Mary! The very thought of such an union adds to the hate I bear her!"

There was a slight knock at the door of the apartment.

The speaker rose from her seat, and, advancing to one of the mirrors set in frames of flagee silver—a present from the Venetian republic—carefully arranged the jewels in her hair and person, and forced her features to wear a smile: we say forced, for it was no deeper than her lips.

Satisfied that all traces of her recent emotion had disappeared, she re-seated herself, and struck upon a bell held between two enamelled figures in the centre of the table. It was one of those toys which the skill of Benvenuto Cellini had rendered so fashionable in the boudoirs of queens and princes. The hangings were drawn aside, and the Earl of Leicester—his face radiant with smiles, as if he felt the happiness of being admitted to her presence—knelt and kissed the hand which Elizabeth extended to him.

"Welcome, my lord!" she said. "We are happy to see you wear a countenance so cheerful!"

"Could it be otherwise, madam," replied the noble, once more pressing the hand which he retained in his with well-acted passion to his lips, "it would be a traitor to my heart—for it would ill express its feelings! Dew to the flowers, sunlight to the earth, is not more welcome than the sight of his adored queen to the eyes of poor Robert Dudley!"

"Flatterer!" replied Elizabeth, with secret pleasure. "You will persuade me next that it would break your heart to exchange this court for that of Scotland—the friendship of your queen for the love of Mary?"

Leicester remained silent, with well-acted surprise.

"Why do not you answer me?" continued the speaker, with a slight tone of harshness in her voice. "I said that it would content you, my good Lord of Leicester, to exchange this court for that of Scotland?"

"You did, madam!"

"And my favour for that of Mary's! We have heard of some such project. You would not be the first subject who has obtained a crown by marriage."

"For pity's sake, inform me, madam," exclaimed the earl, throwing himself at her feet, "how I have offended you, that you speak thus cruelly—thus mockingly? If your council, for purposes of state, have debated such a subject, am I to blame for that? If you have permitted it, was it for me to question my sovereign's will?"

"You at least, my lord, should feel grateful!"

"No, madam, I do not feel grateful!" exclaimed the earl, rising with affected anger; "the members of the council are my enemies, who would gladly consent even to my marriage with the Queen of Scots, to remove me from your presence! They cannot attack my loyalty, so they strive to wound my heart!"

"Your heart, Leicester?" repeated the queen, in a softened tone.

"Ay, my heart!" repeated the noble; "it has been presumptuous—mad! Sometimes, in my frenzy, Elizabeth,

"I would uncrown you, to bring you nearer to my level, that I might love with hope! I deserve your anger—death—anything but banishment from your presence: I have not deserved that!"

"The Queen of Scots," whispered the queen, "with her hand can confer a crown upon the man she weds!"

"But not the hand I love!" said Leicester, raising Elizabeth's to his lips; "what heed I of a title which would be a mockery to my heart? No, Elizabeth—no! Poor Robert Dudley, the creature of your bounty, only asks to live and die near to the idol of his dreams—he has no wish to wear a crown!"

"He shall wear it!" exclaimed the queen, with gratified vanity.

"Never, madam—never!" replied the earl.

"Not if my hand bestowed it?" demanded Elizabeth, casting down her eyes.

The favourite seized her hand, and, with passionate joy, assured her that he should consider that a treasure more precious than the gift which it would bring.

Neither were sincere in their declaration: it was but a sentimental flirtation on the part of his royal mistress, who never had any serious intention of marrying him; and Leicester would have preferred the crown, even of the barren realm of Scotland, to the hand of the Venus herself, could it have been proffered him.

A FROLIC WITH FORTUNE.

"ELLEN, did you know that this is St. Valentine's Day?"

"True, Bella; so it is. How strange! I had not thought of it before."

"And I have not selected a valentine for the year!"

"Nor I, Bell; indeed, I had quite forgotten all about it. I had not thought the day so near; and here it is, right upon us!"

"Perhaps it is not too late even now."

"Very well; I leave it to you, Bell."

"Do you? Well, then, I have a plan. See here!"

The two young girls between whom this short thread of conversation had run, were at the time seated in the cosy little parlour of a country clergyman's house.

The bright sun flooded the room with its morning light, and irradiated the fair faces of the speakers with a look of joy. The storm of the night was succeeded by a morn as serene and clear as that which first dawned on the creation. The trees in the yard bore heavily of their unscathed fruitage, their branches and light sprays bending far down beneath the burthen. The whole scene was beautiful; the more serenely so from the holy silence that brooded over everything.

Bella was the only child of the Reverend Mr. Bellingham, and he her only living parent. Endowed by qualities of beauty sufficiently singular to attract attention from those to whom such possessions first recommend themselves, there was likewise a grace, an impulsiveness, an inexplicable charm in her manner, that much transcended her other qualifications, and gave her person a radiant beauty peculiarly their own.

In the matter of intellectual endowment she could boast even of profuseness. Her mental qualities were quick, ready, and brilliant. The life of her soul sparkled and shone in her deep, dark eyes, above which was a brow for a handsome woman to boast of. It was not high,—prejudicing the beholder with the idea of a woman all intellect and no heart; but broad and well-proportioned—its full and balanced developments suggesting only a thought of calm strength, and unruffled purity and peace.

Thus far had Bella received a careful education, both at the hands of well-paid instructors, and of her father. Early had her mind been impressed with the duties of affection and obedience; and with paternal care had the links of that chain been rivetted, to draw her to her true destiny. Yet there was a secret germ in her heart; so minute, that even her father's microscopic vision could not detect it; yet so full of vitality, that hands much more active than his could not effectually have uprooted it. In other words, the heart of the good clergyman's daughter was imbued with an elf-like spirit of frolic and gaiety, such as soon began to bring to light all the hitherto hidden recesses of her character. Her temperament was tinged with an impulsive ardour; and, withal, she was not altogether a stranger to romantic sympathies and dreams. Anything that had the first hue of real romance, possessed for her an immediate interest and importance.

Yet, with all these qualities of mind and heart, she was a girl of much more than ordinary firmness of character. People were in the habit of saying that this was but a rightful inheritance from her father. That father was a man naturally of the rigid, puritanic stamp; not only carrying his influence properly with him into his pulpit of a Sunday, but likewise wearing it about him through the other six days of the week. He was governed—and he generally governed others—by an iron will and an indomitable purpose. And as a matter of course, he possessed great weight of character. The country around his parish was made up almost entirely of wealthy and aristocratically inclined persons, whose individual characteristics had been firmly welded together by the active and superior power of their strong-minded minister. So that the little village of Woodlawn held up its head quite as high, in the matter of pretensions, as almost any corporate city.

Ellen Lane was Bella's companion in the parlour of the parsonage, on this golden morning of St. Valentine—a girl differing not much from the latter in point of years, yet much more cool and collected in her judgment. She was Bella's warm and tried friend. Indeed, the two girls seemed as inseparable as sisters. Together they had plucked the flowers from many a fleeting hour, and together sat down to make rosy wreaths out of their sweet remembrances. And it was on one of these genial reunions that the conversation turned, as I have begun to relate, on the subject of a valentine.

"See here! see here!" cried the overjoyed Bella, her eyes dilating with pleasure, and her whole countenance glowing with a warm expression.

She snatched a pamphlet from the table, and held it up triumphantly before the eyes of Ellen.

"Pray, what have you got there?" inquired the latter, not at all surprised by this very common impulsiveness of her manner.

"A college catalogue," said Bella; "out of this we will each of us find a valentine! What say you to it, Nell?"

"What a capital idea!" responded Ellen.

"But just let me tell you, Nell, how we will proceed. We will look through the whole list of these names, and you shall select the one that best suits your fancy, while I do the same for myself. After we have gone through all, I will shut the book, and we will each tell the other what name has been selected."

"I agree to it!" quickly replied Ellen.

The two girls fondly twined their arms each about the other's waist, and for a considerable time were intently engaged in poring over the pages of the catalogue.

It would have been extremely interesting to watch the varied expressions that successively chased each other, as in some magnetic circuit, over their blooming countenances. Throughout the whole, too, there was a play of excitement over their features, and more especially within their eyes, that greatly heightened the charm of their expressions.

The long lists of names were at length gone through. The book was closed, and the white hand of Bella laid authoritatively upon the cover.

"Who is it?" asked both girls, in one and the same breath.

"What is your name?" questioned Bella.

"Henry William Sterling," readily replied Ellen.

"Never!" exclaimed Bella.

"But why never, Bell?"

"Oh—such a common name!"

"True enough; but it is at least a sterling one," retorted Ellen, gleefully. "Now for yours, Bella! What is it?"

"Alphonse Wildebrand. There's a name for you, Nell!"

"I should think so. Italian, too!"

"Yes, Italian. It wasn't I who was going to select one of your common names! Besides, there is a mystery here about this person. I know nothing at all of his early history. I know nothing about his family. I cannot even imagine how he should find his way here from far-off Italy. There's a romance here, Nell—believe me!"

"And that's what suits you," returned Ellen, pleasantly.

"Well, but no matter. Here are pens and ink, and there is note-paper. Will you sit down and write your valentine now? There is a volume of poetical selections—'beauties,' I believe they are called—and you can glean from them what seems most apt for your purpose."

"Yes, but then what will you do? This is your only book."

"I?" and Bella could not conceal a roguish smile. "Oh, trust me for that! I am going to give my friend Mr. Alphonse some of my own rhymes!"

"But I am not so gifted as you, Bell: I shall therefore content myself with employing the language others have prepared for me. Which is the book?"

Instantly both the frolicsome friends began their task: Bella all the while laughing till the room rang with the echoes of her musical voice; and Ellen growing more and more confused in proportion as Bella became noisy and collected. And it would have wreathed the most ascetic face with sunny smiles, to behold the pitch of merriment to which they had temporarily wrought themselves: not altogether by words and tangible expressions, but by the hastiest exchange of playful glances, and the most trivial betrayals of ill-suppressed laughter.

Some considerable time was naturally consumed in this business, and at length each reported that she had finished the task undertaken. Then succeeded a proposition that the two notes should be read aloud before sealing; and then came the reading itself.

Ellen's was no more than an indefinite and exceedingly general sentiment, nowise particular in its application, and apposite only to the sentiment in hand. It was brief, pointed enough, and transcribed in a fair, girlish, legible hand.

Bella, on the contrary, had poured out upon her white sheet what glowed with the brightness and warmth of a flame of fire. Though entirely impromptu with her, it was crowded with intense meaning, and gleamed all over with the sparkles of a true and earnest feeling. To a stranger—and particularly to a young and susceptible stranger—such words would come as the expressions of a deliberately formed partiality. A warm spirit would at once take fire with them, especially as they came from a source so completely enveloped in mystery; than the closely woven in, too, with the golden threads of such romantic associations.

Bella laughed heartily on completing the reading of her production, esteeming it all a good joke—in fact, the very best joke she had ever yet played off on any one. She had, however, gone much beyond jocular limits, in that she had as fervently addressed the Italian student as an ideal character, rather than a flesh-and-blood personage. But the result would in good time develop itself. She averred she cared for nothing now so much as the joke.

The two notes, therefore, were forthwith sealed up and intrusted to the hands of Ellen. She designed leaving them at the post-office on her way home.

Before night, they were on their way to their destination.

A week rolled round. It was a week crowded with the usual seasonable joys to the inseparable friends, not a few of whose hours were passed in gravely and gaily speculating upon the denouement of their bold proceedings. Each had made a venture far more daring than she had ever attempted before.

Bella happened to meet Ellen in the post-office, on the last afternoon of the week. They mutually smiled on recognising—as each thought she did—the hidden and impalpable feelings each of the other.

"Is there a letter for Miss So-and-so?" inquired Bella, of the official—who just at that moment, too, was frowning a frown of official dignity—giving him the fictitious name she had appended to her valentine.

The postmaster favoured her countenance with a searching glance; and, without reaching forth a hand, replied that there was.

"And is there one for 'Olivia'?" asked Ellen, scarcely successful in repressing the smile that insisted on playing about her mouth.

"Yes," glumly answered the general government's deputy.

"We should like them, then," said Bella, her eyes brightening perceptibly.

Forthwith the man of the pigeon-holes seemed to come to himself again; for he instantly went about fumbling over his pile of miscellaneous letters, although he well enough knew that the objects sought were not among them. This, however, was an artful pretext to afford him time to study the features of the two roguish beauties from over his iron-bowed spectacles: which delay he improved to the full of his advantage.

The girls at last received their missives, and left the office in the highest glee. Breaking the seals in haste, they silently read the contents as they walked on. Both were too deeply interested to utter a loud syllable.

Their surprise was unbounded to find that their epistles were signed by the real names of the young men whom they had addressed. There certainly was no disguise there. As it chanced, moreover, to turn out, each writer requested the great pleasure of a continuance of the correspondence.

Bella read her note to Ellen first, when they had finally reached the house of the latter, and Ellen in turn gave up the contents of hers to Bella.

At first blush it seemed to them as if the two students might have acted conjointly, and with some double purpose, in thus requesting a continuance of the correspondence. Yet there was nothing, after all, but pure suspicion on which to hang such a conclusion. It was possible that the young men did not so much as know each other. Then how any conclusion?

They debated the matter thoroughly, and in perfect confidence, between themselves. Ellen's cool judgment never contrasted so strikingly with Bella's wayward impulses as at this time.

"What are we to do now, Nell?" asked Bella; "to tell you the truth, I am not a little perplexed."

"My mind is made up," replied Ellen.

"To what?" inquired Bell, anxiously.

"Why, I think the matter has gone far enough—just as far as it should," said she.

"And you are satisfied to drop it where it is?" said Bella, a rich carmine beautifully suffusing her neck, cheeks, and forehead.

"Certainly; to drop it just where it is, Bell," replied she, with firm determination.

"You are afraid!" exclaimed Bella, essaying playful intimidation.

"I mean to be prudent, Bell!" was Nell's reply.

"For my part, Nell, I confess I am unaccountably interested. That is all. My curiosity has become awakened, and I should just like to pry further into this mystery."

"No—no, Bell; a joke is a joke; but there may be such a thing as carrying it too far!"

"I admit it. Yet I have no fears in my case, dear Nell!"

"What do you propose, then?" asked Ellen.

"To continue the correspondence," replied Bella.

"Why just see how fervently the Italian youth pleads for it! I declare, I haven't it in my heart to deny him so trifling a favour!"

"Then I won't attempt to advise, Bella; but I am going to act as becomes me. I think I shall let the matter stop where it is. We have had a good frolic over it already, and that is all we set out for."

"And I think, Nell, that I shall write just one letter more, to have the pleasure of being convinced that there is some reality in so illusive a dream. Only one, however."

"I hope no disappointment, then, may overtake you, dear Bella," replied her friend; and not long after, the two girls separated for the night.

If there was one single thing that Isabella Bellingham could do very much better than any other, it was writing a letter. In this respect she was herself pretty well aware of her superiority.

To any one it is an art that must prove itself a very valuable, as it certainly is a most comfortable acquisition. Nor must it necessarily be imagined a possession that can mysteriously be acquired simply with the wish. It costs quite as much labour of preparation, is earned only on condition of as much preliminary pains-taking, and is perfected only after quite as much practice, as any one of the arts that are welcomed to a far higher rank in the public estimation.

Bella had the name, too, in this respect, of being just what she was. She wrote dashing, brilliant, and often-times even eloquent letters. There was no mark of that formality that prevents ease and grace. She seemed to hold a pen with a diamond point; yet with all the graphic lines that pen could at most times be made to draw, there was no lack of lustre or genial warmth.

The first and chief charm about the letters was their simplicity. There was no betrayal of an effort after effect. There was no apparent studiousness of language—no trickery of mere words—no adornment only of phrases—with which so many confound true beauty of expression and true depth of feeling. And happily married to this vein of simplicity that ran through her letters, was an earnest directness, which is the only channel upon which sincerity, and, of course, hearty pleasure, can be borne.

She reached her room again, and threw herself within the embracing arms of a huge easy chair, that stood before the glowing fire—awaiting, apparently, her return. Throwing off her hood, and dismantling her shoulders of the warm garment she wore about them, she laid her head back—far back on her chair, and gave herself up to the exciting and engrossing dream of the moment. What thoughts passed through her brain; what charming fancies wove themselves into a beautiful broiery for those thoughts; what unreal hopes flashed and glittered, like brilliant fragments of diamonds, before her bedazzled vision, it is out of all possibility to tell. No imagination, even, could successfully follow on in the path so impulsive, so rich, and so warm a nature as hers would necessarily strike out; much less could a pen trace upon paper even the faintest outlines of that path which such an imagination might succeed in detecting.

She awoke at length from the depths of her dream—or, rather, from the quiet into which she had been apparently plunged; she was ushered at once into an atmosphere of high excitement. There was a burning flush upon her cheek, and her dark eyes swam with the flood of sudden enthusiasm that had overtaken her. With all this betrayal of feeling, too, a secret pride had been awakened in her breast, which would wreak itself on the burning thoughts that were about to bestrew the fair sheet before her. It was a pride that in her breast ever asserted itself—to impress strangers—and now this stranger in particular—with the brilliant and dashing qualities of her character.

She took up her pen, and began a letter to her distant and unknown valentine.

Her pen glided swiftly over line after line of the fair page, yet never keeping pace with the tumultuously stirred current of her feelings and thoughts. The first page of her sheet was covered—the second—the third. She stopped not, however, there. Her heart was wofully mixed up with her work, and her judgment followed but blindly on. She turned over her fourth and last page.

There was such a mystical blending of the real and unreal to her in this business, she could hardly answer herself whether she was addressing a living being, with active and far-reaching sympathies, or only some etherealised idea—some fragment of a fancy, some painted emblem of an illusive dream.

She wrote to the Italian stranger of the land of his nativity; of its sunny hill-slopes, purpling with the clustering grapes; of its orators and poets; of its dreamy and delicious scenery, changeful ever in its never-ending beauty; of its grand and glorious history; of its vine-wreathed temples, and fountains, and columns, and grottoes; of its breathless yet breathing sculpture; its music, and its song.

In language whose hidden depths none could explore so well as the Italian youth, she depicted the fresh disasters that crowded, like the clouds of oncoming doom, around his country's horizon; and evoked from her warm heart the most earnest prayers for its final restoration to a condition better worthy its early history.

All this she meant merely as impersonal. It was, in real truth, farthest from her deliberate purpose to do more than express a not uncommon sympathy for any child of a fair but down-trodden land. But her enthusiasm had led her much beyond the limit she had at first defined for herself. As I said, her impulses led, and her judgment followed.

This letter was duly dispatched to the young man by the mail of the following day. And but few days elapsed thereafter, ere a reply came back. The blood of the young and ardent Italian had fired at once with her burning words. His nature kindled to an enthusiasm far transcending her own. Language that she had deemed only common-place and complimentary, seemed to him to have an intensity of meaning.

In consequence, his letter in reply was full of the most ardent expressions and the warmest protestations. He felt flattered that he had found so gifted a person, and one who entered with so much zest into his own feelings, one who betrayed such a contagious and irrepressible sympathy for his native land.

From generalities, it was but too easy for him to descend to the contemplation of individual tastes and sympathies. With a peculiar felicity and delicacy of expression, he merged at once all his impersonal sympathy for his native land into an individual, personal sympathy for Miss Bella Bellingham; and she became interested in his words beyond her power to explain. So sensitive and impressible a mind as hers was the last to be heedless of such appeals.

When Bella received this epistle from the stranger student, and after she had read it all carefully though excitedly through, she again sought the friendly embraces of her huge easy-chair, and passed long hours alone in most delightful reflections connected with the subject. The matter had already gone but a little way, and as yet no friendship that promised to be lasting, had been formed, and no olden sympathies torn up. While it remained thus, all seemed like a pleasant dream. As yet there were no forebodings in the sky—no premonitions from lengthening shadows across the landscape of the future. Her heart was still free to revel in its wonted round of impulses and sympathies, and could be brought back by no golden chain held in another's hand to a circle of diminished limits. She resolved to continue so pleasant a correspondence for a time longer.

A letter followed not long after from her pen; and this again was speedily succeeded by another from the young student. For some time the communication was thus kept up, Bella all the while strictly maintaining the incognito she had at first assumed.

At length she received one beseeching her, in a very earnest manner, to allow an interview. From almost any other stranger the proposition would have struck her with surprise; but her heart had so unconsciously become interested in the eloquent stranger, and her sympathies had gathered themselves so closely about his very name, that she betrayed no alarm whatever, even to her own self. The proposition was, however, for the time declined. Bella pleaded varied inability to comply with it, yet vaguely and encouragingly hinted at the pleasure and possibility of a meeting at some future day.

The young student was not a little annoyed by this reply; for, while it had no such effect as to dampen the ardour of his hopes, it nevertheless cruelly deferred the fruition of his desires. He wrote again to Bella. This time he besought her, if she would not gratify him with a personal interview, at least to give him some adequate description of her personal appearance.

The unwonted and increasing fervour of the young man could not at this point escape the recognition of Bella. Already she felt warned against proceeding too hastily, and going too far. In addition to this, that roguish, fun-loving element in her character now partially asserted itself to her; and between these two wide extremes of fear and fun, she soon afterwards sat down to give her stranger friend an idea of her personal peculiarities.

The description, as may well be imagined under the circumstances, was a ludicrous combination of the true and the fanciful. She would frankly commence an outline of her features in all sincerity, and straightway branch off upon the most ridiculous and absurd unrealities. Could her countenance have been drawn as she actually depicted it, her friends would have laughed it down as the oddest of all the oddities conceivable. She gave herself squinting eyes, and hinted ominously at her ignorance whether her tresses had yet relinquished auburn, and adopted red. And so through the entire picture. But the brilliant and sterling qualities of her mind—it was beyond the power of her roguery to misrepresent them. Of these he had already had an earnest, in the warm and eloquent effusions of her pen.

The whole letter—at which she laughed unconsciously on reading it over—was crowned with a request, made half playfully, that he should favour her with an account of himself, and of his personal appearance, in turn.

The letter was sent. Bella thought the whole matter over again. "Perhaps," said she to herself, "I have gone too far now; but I haven't yet committed myself; and he certainly knows nothing yet of my personal appearance, or even my name. Yet it may be quite as well to have the matter at once cut short here. I will go no farther!"

This was the advice her judgment gave her. Then there stole over her again those fragrant breaths of romance, and of indescribable—because mysterious—sensations, that intoxicated her soul anew, and enticed her still farther on towards the pleasure that should have been prohibited. And thus was she sorely puzzled between the demands of duty and the allurements of her inclination.

At this very inopportune time, and before she had yet expected to receive a reply from the young student, her father chanced one day to drop in at the village post-office while the mail was being opened. When he was once alone with the worthy official, the latter took the liberty to acquaint him with the fact that his daughter Bella was conducting a correspondence, under a fictitious name, with a gentleman. As a true friend of his, he assured him he had felt it to be his duty to say this much.

The honest clergyman was thunderstruck. He had not heard a whisper of all this before. It was most astounding and unwelcome intelligence to him.

"There is here at this time," quoth the obliging postmaster, "something from that quarter for Bella!" "Impossible!" stamped and exclaimed Mr. Bellingham. "Pray let me have it at once!"

Forthwith the devoted man of letters drew forth from a hidden pigeon-hole a letter and a small package, both tightly sealed. They were, as usual, addressed to the name which Bella had assumed to the student.

Fired almost to frenzy, the doating yet proud father hurried home to his study. He excitedly broke the seal of the letter, and read.

It was an epistle—unfortunate as it may seem—full of the warmest expressions of admiration and attachment. The young man had poured out his heart upon the page. All he had—all he was—all he ever hoped to be—he offered, freely and fully, to the possession of the lady. He confessed the whole burthen that lay at his heart, and fervently besought her not to reject his suit.

The deeply-excited father, having perused all this with such equanimity as he then could best command, proceeded to break the seal of the package. It contained the daguerreotype of a young man of decidedly fine looks, with a face of a highly intellectual cast, and a complexion that denoted foreign birth.

The clergyman could scarcely contain his feelings. A man, however, of his wonted promptness and resolution, was at no loss how to proceed. He instantly sat down to his table, and began a letter of the severest rebuke and most burning indignation to the young gentleman. He assured him that he would receive both his last letter and his miniature by the same mail that bore him this merited castigation.

Mr. Bellingham in his mind as yet declined acquainting his daughter with his discovery of her secret; sagaciously concluding, that if he could himself effectually rebuff the stranger, the purpose desired would be attained equally well. By receiving no more communications from her admirer, Bella would very naturally conclude that he had unaccountably forsaken and forgotten her.

This might all have well happened, exactly as her father had designed. But Bella herself chanced to drop in at the post-office not an hour after her father had been there; and, to her chagrin, learned that he had carried away what had just reached her fictitious address. Of course the postmaster had nothing to reveal of the very industrious part he took in the matter—of course not!

The poor girl, hitherto feeling absolutely secure in the intrenchments of her pseudonym, rushed frantically home again. Unobserved by any of the family, she entered her room, and, sitting down in her chair, began to wonder what it was best to do.

Her father even then was engaged in exhorting the fine sensibilities of the distant lover.

Just at that moment, as the strangest of fortune would have it, her father was summoned below by the sudden arrival of visitors. She heard his footstep on the stairs with inexpressible delight; and when the slam of the parlour door fell on her ears, she flew into his study. She was determined to know what the character of these two missives was, and to read and see them with her own eyes.

Entering the quiet study of her father, she was startled to find the objects of her anxious search on the table directly before her. There was the letter from her passionate lover—there his own "counterfeit presentment!"

Hastily snatching up the latter first, she gazed upon it with enraptured eyes and a wildly-beating heart, and pressed it with impulsive tenderness to her lips. She read through the student's letter with rapidity and excitement. It was only what she had expected from him.

Then she seized the other letter—that of her father. It was not yet finished; yet, from what had been written, she was able to gather the terrible whole of his stern purport.

Her mind was quite as resolute, however, as his. Again entering her own room, she sat down, and hastily penned a letter to her lover, acquainting him with the sad misfortune that had overtaken her, and detailing the fixed design of her inflexible parent. She assured him, too, that she had seen his miniature.

Hurrying stealthily from the house, she proceeded instantly to her bosom friend, Ellen, and acquainted her with all that had happened. A brother of Ellen volunteered his services, under an injunction of strict secrecy, as bearer of this letter of Bella's to the post-office in the neighbouring town, to which point the young student had been likewise directed to address his reply. By this activity on Bella's part, her letter gained a whole day on the fulfilments of her father.

As yet Mr. Bellingham was ignorant that his daughter so much as suspected his knowledge of her secret. Accordingly, he determined to act without betraying to her any special motive. He encouraged her to pack off, and make a visit to some of his and her friends in a city not far away. She was inwardly loth to go; yet she felt that it would be her worst policy to venture excuse or attempt delay. And as soon thereafter as seemed to him sufficient time to satisfy Bella that she would hear no more from her lover, she was sent away to her friends.

Bella carried away with her a fresh letter from her lover in her pocket. It came through the post-office of the neighbouring town.

She had been absent from home but a little time before every arrangement was completed to bring about, at last, an interview with the young student. He would arrive on a stated day.

The day came. The lover came. He came—as he hoped—to greet his future bride. He reached the house that had been designated, and inquired of the servant for her. On some pretext, she had been sent for by her father to return home that very day! His fond hopes he might now feed on the dry ashes of disappointment.

Bella reached home, but only to receive positive instructions from her father to make another journey to a still more distant city, and there pass the remainder of the winter with friends. Possibly he had had no suspicions of her conduct since leaving home the first time; yet there was a vague and indistinct fear brooding in his brain. It haunted him by night and by day. She was, accordingly, a second time dispatched to friends at a distance, and in perfect safety arrived among them.

A fortnight had elapsed, and the Italian youth was at her feet! For the first time now they met. He was fired with her beauty, as his soul had been with her sympathies. Again he offered her his hand; and this time he felt the burthen lifted from his heart.

He was a foreigner, as it appeared, of distinguished birth; was possessed of great wealth; had a soul of the finest and purest sensibilities; an intellect that admirably illustrated all; and a person that would not have failed to recommend itself to a woman predisposed to love.

The proud and unyielding father was at length apprised of all, over the united signatures of his daughter and the stranger. Again plunged into a vortex of terrible excitement, he hastened at once to the place whither Bella had been sent, and there confronted the lovers together. They, however, were calm, self-possessed, and determined.

But the interview was productive of vastly more good than could have been foreseen. By some magical influence, the father was brought over to give his unreserved consent to their desired union. Perhaps the sagacious reader may know, without being told, what that influence was.

The young man received his diploma that summer; and not a great while afterwards, in the house of her own father, the beautiful Isabella Bellingham was united in marriage to the choice of her romance and her heart.

The interesting ceremony was performed in the same little parlour where Bella and Ellen had concocted their valentine scheme only the winter before. Ellen, too, was Bella's bridesmaid, just as she had ever been her dearest and truest friend. The happy pair immediately set sail for Italy—their favouring gales laden with the prayers and blessings of the yet deeply-loving father.

From over his iron-bowed spectacles the inquisitive glance of the postmaster still peers; but he has grown unaccountably more glum, and is said by the good village people to find quite all he wants to do, in simply minding his own business.

ESSAYS.

NO. CXCLII.—POPULAR SONGS.

THE legislature has been extremely jealous of the drama. The stage has had its censor for upwards of a century. Had the present strict supervision existed in the days of Elizabeth and James, it is quite possible that the immortal dramas of Shakspeare might have been shorn of some of their splendours—for it must be admitted, some of his political allusions strongly savour of a bold democratic spirit. But in these days there had been no such fearful precedents for caution as a war with the American colonies—no French revolution, or the invasion of the Jacobite songs and cavaliers of Scotland. Warned by such terrible political convulsions, the drama is carefully kept within the boundaries of domestic passions. Politics and the stage are strangers. Not so the music-shop. There the political partisan has undisturbed sovereignty, and that, too, in spite of the well-known fact that the Jacobite song nearly lost the crown of these realms to the progenitors of Queen Victoria, and that the Marseillaise brought Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette under the knife of the guillotine. But the truth is, the song-writer is beyond the reach of the law. He cannot be caged like the dramatist—his stage is the world, and so long as a pulse beats or a heart throbs, so long will the song-writer ply his stirring vocation. This freedom cannot be quarrelled with—it is one of the best guarantees for political liberty extant; but when its expositions have degenerated, swerved from their original purposes—in fact, gone out of the path of their mission, and become wicked as well as puling, giggling, and sniggling, we are entitled to examine them by the worst light in which they can be exhibited. And in continuation of some remarks we made on this subject in a former essay, we would direct the most earnest attention to what may be styled the emigration songs.

What are they. Why, incitements to discontent and domestic rebellion. They place winter's ice instead of summer's love on the old hearthstone, sever the holiest ties, and, by crushing affection for home and country, break up the foundations of society. Were Britain or Ireland over-populated, there would be ample and natural provocation to complaint; but as neither land is—nor is likely to be for many ages—the present wholesale flight to the United States of America and the colonies is positively unjustifiable—it is a mania quite as furious as that which agitated the public mind in the middle ages—when, under the influence of the preachings of that prince of fanatics, Peter the Hermit, men, women, and children moved towards the Holy Land in countless bands. Emigration, under moderate circumstances, is a necessity—it has contributed largely to the elevation and glory of Britain; but now that it has changed its character, it cannot but excite the most serious apprehensions. Formerly it was only those of ardent temperaments—the “the ne'er do wells” at home—who ventured to attempt to better their condition, or find a wider field for their exuberant passions in a foreign land; now it is everybody: even women and children have caught the gipsy enthusiasm, and sigh and sing about lands in the west, and the gold fields of California and Australia. National school boys bawl and whistle “Cheer, boys—cheer,” to the grinding accompaniment of a street organ, until the very atmosphere of our large towns rings again with discordant exhortations to a general exodus. And then, again, the emigrant is induced to leave his native land with bitterness and revenge smouldering in his heart. We know that many of our institutions are bad—that they press heavily on the industrial classes; but when we know that they are capable of being amended, and that flying from them is the coward's expedient; and also, when we know full well that nine-tenths of the misery and poverty that afflict society has been caused by ignorance, indolence, and moral darkness, we are entitled to denounce emigration as a violent passion, in the strongest terms, and hold up to condemnation those who promote it.

We charge the emigration song-writers with pandering to this morbid feeling, and bringing the mother country into contempt and hatred. Take the “Irish Emigrant,” one of the most popular of this class of songs. The story is that of a young husband sitting on a stile, mourning over the decease of his girl-wife and baby-boy. The first three verses are pretty, and unexceptionable in sentiment—for, in a heart-stirring yet manly tone, they express the natural sorrow of a husband at the loss of a beloved wife; but the last two breathe poison—they are false, and, considering their consequences, wicked. Here they are:

I'm very lonely now, Mary,
For the poor find no new friends;
But oh! they love the better still,
The few our Father sends.
And you were all I had, Mary,
My blessing and my pride:
There's nothing left to care for now,
Since my poor Mary died.

I'm bidding you a long farewell,
My Mary kind and true,
But I'll not forget you, darling,
In the land I'm going to.
They say there's bread and work for all,
And the sun shines always there,
But I'll not forget old Ireland,
Were it fifty times as fair.

The lines we have italicised, are those to which we object. They charge upon those who govern this country something which sounds very like the murder of his wife and child. At least the innuendo is pretty clear, that if he had had more work, both would have been alive. You might as well say that the sparrow killed in the last thunder-storm might have been saved, if it had built its nest in the eave of a rich man's house. But the obnoxious portion of the song is, the discontent it breathes and excites. It is killing the national sentiment in favour of country by degrees. It is murder by slow poisoning—just like a faithless spouse undermining her husband's constitution, by every day putting a grain or two of arsenic into his portage. And the same may be said of all the emigration songs. They depress the national energies, enervate instead of stimulate the national industry, and, by breaking up family associations, sow the seeds of mutiny and black ingratitude to the “old house at home.”

As to their ability and musical character, we cannot indulge in any commendation. The music is stilted and artificial, and the rhythm very bad. Some of the images are also very poor. In the “Irish Emigrant,” the poet says, the “Red was on your lips, Mary.” Where else should it have been?—would he have it on her nose? Now, as this is a revolutionary song—and one very popular, withal—we will contrast it, both in style, language, and versification, with another song, still appreciated, thank goodness, among those who know what songs really should be. After the reference to the rural meeting-place, and the red on the lip, this modern brochure thus continues:

The place is little changed, Mary,
The day's as bright as then,
The lark's loud song is in my ear,
And the corn is green again;
But I miss the soft clasp of your hand,
And your breath warm on my cheek,
And I still keep listening for the words
You never more may speak.

Contrast this lackadaisical, halting, wooden-legged verse with the following:

Here's a health to them that's awa,
Here's a health to them that's awa,
And wha winna wish guid luck to our cause,
May never guid luck be their fa':
It's guid to be merry and wise,
It's guid to be honest and true;
It's guid to support Caledonia's cause,
And bide by the Bonnets of Blue.
Hurrah! for the Bonnets of Blue,
Hurrah! for the Bonnets of Blue;
It's guid to support Caledonia's cause,
And bide by the Bonnets of Blue.

Here is music in words—in fact, a ballad. The other is grief wedded to a whine, which terminates in an atrocious insinuation against the majesty of society, the justice of the laws, and the humanity which is common to both rich and poor.

Passing from these emigration songs—which we must candidly admit we have always regarded with intense dislike—and without alluding to the strikes throughout the country this summer, which they vastly contributed to bring about, we are introduced to another class of compositions, which we may denominate the “heroic sentimental.” First we have the “Arab Steed:”

Oh! bring me but my Arab steed,
My princely Rienzi's right,
And I will to the battle speed,
To guard him in the fight.

His noble crest I'll proudly wear,
And gird his scarf around;
But I must to the field repair,
For hark! the trumpets sound.

Those who cherish “Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled,” and

Ye mariners of England,
Who guard our native seas,
Whose flag has braved a thousand years
The battle and the breeze, will sympathise with us, when we pronounce this Arab steed war-song a production of the equestrian circle. It belongs to the atmosphere in which daring individuals in flesh-tights do a little tumbling on the backs of steeds as docile as a boy's hobby-horse. And then wearing his “noble crest!” How heroic! How poetical! Clipping the horse to adorn the rider. Why not wear his mane, or his tail? The latter would be bristly enough for the fiercest warrior that ever looked grim in burnt cork and false hair, in any circus in Europe. The beauty of these songs consists in their obscurity. Of course the writer intended to allude to the crest and scarf of a sovereign; but, being on the top of Parnassus, he could not distinguish between the horse and the man. A happy difficulty; for had he selected the monarch, the latter must have gone into battle bare-headed. Then, in company with this popular song, we have

Hurrah! o'er Hounslow Heath to roam,
Hurrah for the stilly hour,
When the moon looks pale from her lofty dome,
As a maid from a battle tower.
When sparks of fire from my corsair steed,
Spring flashes at every goad,
And the distant sound of wheels I greet,
Then hurrah! hurrah for the road! Hurrah! &c.

Sparks of fire from a corsair steed is brightly original. The misdeeds of the master are saddled on the innocent brute, and the horse is compared to a fire-ship commanded by Paul Jones. Frigates and seventy-fours vanish. Here we have a British highwayman's horse, who carries thirty-two pounders in his flanks, and discharges grape-shot from his heels. Then the moral of the song is affecting. The accomplished rider—who made ladies' scream, and men glow with rage—must “swing high to the dismal bell.” Fate refuses to cut the cord of destiny. And this is the trash that Englishmen tolerate. In an age which has ignored both midnight and mid-day ruffians, and even hints that the wine-cup, and its adjunctive irregularities, might safely be dispensed with! But if manias and fanaticisms are suffered to emasculate the public mind, what else can be expected? So, leaving the theatrical Arab steed and Dick Turpin class of songs to their admirers, let us take a ramble in the forest. What do we discover? “A gipsy queen.” Listen to this precious pastoral lay.

Oh! 'tis I'm a Gipsy Queen!
And where's the queen like me,
That can revel upon the green,
For ever blithe and free.
What though my cheeks be brown,
And wild my raven hair,
A red-cloth hood my crown,
And the sceptre the wand I bear.

With my kingdom I am well content, &c.

So is every slattern with her slatternness, and every thief with his plunder. But we are not to bawl their praises. A gipsy is a gipsy—an unwashed piece of forest goods, in large brown feet, matted hair, and walnut-stained visage. She luxuriates upon a short black pipe, and knows the flavour of blue ruin better than that of the clearest spring-water. And then the company she keeps. But stay, here we have the gipsy king. Hear his bold, unasked confession.

I confess that I am but a man,
My failings who pleases may know;
I'm fond of my girl and my can,
And jolly companions a row;
My subjects are kind to me,
They don't grudge me the largest glass;
Nor yet that I hold on my knee
At this moment the prettiest lass.

These eulogies of theft, vagabondage, and immorality, terminate with a chorus—the burthen of which rests on the two words “I'm,” and “gip.” They are popular with young men in their beery hours, as is also another of the class—“A Song to the oak, the brave old oak.” And yet those who bawl these green-wood ditties, probably would yawn over Bernard Barton's splendid eulogy of England's oak.

My favourite and the forest king,
The British oak shall be!
Its stem, though rough, is stout and sound,
Its giant branches throw
Their arms in shady blessings round
O'er man and beast below;

Its leaf, though late in spring it shares
The zephyr's gentle sigh,
As late and long in autumn wears
A deeper, richer dye.
Type of an honest English heart,
It opes not at a breath,
But having opened plays its part,
Until it sinks in death.

But in the whole range of modern popular ballads, we may seek in vain for either originality or excellence. There is no intellect in them—no lofty suggestions—no glorious aspirations to make the human pulse beat quicker—all is brought down to the level of mediocrity. Even the “good time coming” ballad, has something sickly and despondent in its composition. In sentiment, it aims at making the people dissatisfied with their condition, without showing them how they would be benefited by a change, which would involve the most terrible of disasters—a civil war. It destroys confidence in the present—the preliminary to all fortunate realisations—to conjure up a phantom hope of the future. And if we take a higher range, where shall we find the chivalry of Scott, the vigour of Campbell, the brilliancy of Moore, the pathos of Wolfe, the manliness of Dibdin, or the large utterance of that anonymous class of song-writers who flourished when Byron's rapid muse thrilled through the heart or the civilised world, and Moore's sweet strains were heard at midnight, even in the capital of Persia. We are convinced the search would be protracted and unprofitable; and if we turn to the modern popular love songs, we find the most stilted sentiment, the baldest images, the vilest caricatures of both sexes, and the most wretched namby pambyism ever penned. In fact, they show us the grand passion in tatters, drivelling and snivelling after a very calf-like fashion.

FACETIÆ.

ALCOHOL.—A clothes-brush celebrated for destroying the coat of the stomach.

"WHAT is the difference between me and a new novel?" inquired a highly-ringed damsel of her beau. "It is this," said he; "a novel is read because it is interesting; you are interesting because you are red."

QUERY?—Spiggles wishes to know if war-whoops can be used to advantage in repairing old barrels.

ASPIRATION OF A HUSBAND.—Oh, that the fashions would last as long as the bonnets!

A man who retires from business and lives on the interest of his money, may be said to be resting on his overs.

A person the other day, in the vicinity of the Hippodrome, was boasting that he had sprung from a high family. "Yes," said a bystander, "I've seen some of the family so high that their feet could not touch the ground!"

WIDOWS.—They are the very—deuce. I've heard the heathen called benighted; but they have seen enough to burn widows when their husbands die, and that's a step further in civilisation than we have taken. There's nothing like 'em. If they make up their minds to marry, it's done. I know one that was terribly afraid of thunder and lightning, and every time a storm came on she would run into Mr. Smith's house (he was a widower) and clasp her little hands, and fly around, till the man was half-distracted for fear she would be killed, and the consequence was, she was Mrs. John Smith before three thunder-storms rattled over her head.

AN ILLUSION DISPELLED.—A lawyer built himself an office in the form of a hexagon, or six-square. The novelty of the structure attracted the attention of some Irishmen who were passing by: they made a full stop, and viewed the building very critically. The lawyer, somewhat disgusted by their curiosity, lifted up the window, put out his head, and addressed them. "What do you stand here for, like a pack of blockheads, gazing at my office? Do you take it for a church?" "Sure," said one of them, "I was thinking so, till I saw the devil poke his head out of the windy!"

PADDY AND THE PILL-BOX.—A surgeon had occasion lately to prescribe a couple of pills for an Irishman, which were sent home in a small box, bearing the direction, "The whole to be taken immediately." On visiting his patient afterwards, the doctor expressed his surprise on learning that the desired effect had not been produced, and asked Pat's better-half if she had really given him the medicine. "Faith, that I did, Sur," she replied; "but maybe yer honour, the lid hasn't come off yet!" The poor sick man had been made to swallow, not only the pills but the box as well!

"OLD age is coming on me rapidly!" as the urchin said when he was stealing some apples from an old man's garden, and saw the owner coming.

BRAINS AND DIGESTION.—The question, "Why authors did not succeed as well as brewers?" was thus answered: "Because authors work for the head, and brewers for the stomach; and where twenty men have stomachs, but one has brains!"

A FRENCH PRACTICAL JOKE.—Rousseau introduced his head through the open casement of a porter's lodge. "Good day, my friend!" "Good day, sir!" "Will you please to tell me the name of this nice bird in your window?" "A linnet, with a black head, sir." "But why do you prefer a linnet with a black head?" "Because it sings so well. Listen!" and the porter, with hand on hip, face all radiant, and head humouring the time, enjoyed the song of his favourite. "Ah, very nice, indeed! You are a married man, I suppose?" "Yes, sir. My third darling is alive!" "And where is this darling wife of yours?" "You mean to say my spouse, I hope, sir?" "Oh, certainly, your spouse, by all means!" "Sir, she is above, with our lodger of the fifth floor!" "Ah, ah! and what business has she with your fifth-floor lodger?" "Putting his rooms in order." "Is he young or old, this fifth-floor tenant?" "Middle-aged, sir." "Very good! and where are your children?" "Sir, I have none." "And what have you been about all the time of your three marriages?" "I beg pardon, sir; are you looking for any one here?" "Not one." "Is there anything I can do to oblige you?" "Nothing whatever." "But you have been heaping questions on me these fifteen minutes?" "Yes, to be sure." "And to what are these questions apropos?" "Apropos to nothing at all!" "And why, then, does Monsieur do me the honour?" "Oh, it is quite simple. I am passing: I read over your window, 'Speak to the Porter,' and I do so!"

THE Livery of London have not only got a new Key to their chamber door, but a Bar-on-it into the bargain.—Diogenes.

ANYTHING BUT THAT.—An honourable member said the other night, that the British constitution required a tonic now and then. We hope it won't be compelled to try change of air.—Ibid.

A BAD EXAMPLE TO THE NATION.—The Lords having rejected the bill for the alteration of oaths, have shown their determination to keep up their old custom of swearing.—Ibid.

A MAN'S "BETTER HALF."—A wife is usually called her husband's "better half." In all matters of public subscription, the Queen is found to give twice the amount subscribed by Prince Albert. Her Majesty is therefore regarded by the officers of most public institutions as not merely the Prince's "better half," but as exactly his double.—Ibid.

THE LINEN—MARK IT.—According to the reports of various manufacturers, we find that "a large quantity of linen has gone off lately." We hope to be in a position to refute this statement, after a careful examination of our next week's washing.—Ibid.

"CONSTANT dripping wears away stones," and constant kitchen-stuff causes a cook to wear away silks.—Ibid.

THE HEIGHT OF ABSURDITY.—To call a drunken groom a stable man.—Punch.

AN ANOMALY.—Sending a man back to his constituents for bribery, and saying he was not returned.—Ibid.

CUTTING THE KNOT.—How to deal with bribery at elections seems to puzzle legislators. Why not legalise it at once, under the name of a Poll Tax?—Ibid.

AN UNFAILING OMNIBUS CHARACTERISTIC.—We never were in an omnibus yet, but some lady was sure to drop her money.—Ibid.

PRINCE MENSCHIKOFF'S MESS.—The state of affairs at Constantinople has been described as a pretty kettle of fish; but may be more correctly denominated a pretty dish of kiebobs, which is a Turkish broil.—Ibid.

THE LAST LOOK.—We do not know anything so painful—so full of sorrow and regret—so overflowing with unfathomable love, as the last look which an alderman gives a haunch of venison just before it is being carried away.—Ibid.

THE ELECTION MARKET.—When Mr. George Smythe was told that the little "Earthmen" (now exhibiting in Regent Street) lived, like rabbits, in burrows, in their own native country, he exclaimed, most piteously: "Well, I only wish England was like Africa—you'd be able to buy up a borough cheap then!"—Ibid.

THE GREAT INDIAN DEBATE.

The Speaker was about to take the chair, as usual, at four o'clock, when

An Irish Member, objecting, complained that Irishmen should be compelled to submit to the tyranny of Saxon dials. He moved that Dublin time should be kept in the House—namely, about half-an-hour's difference from London time.

Another Irish Member was indignant, and demanded Tyrone time. This discussion, enlivened by a good deal of abuse, disposed of the half-hour in question, and the Chair was taken.

Sir Charles Wood rose to announce the Government intentions on the subject of Indian government. India was, he said, the most interesting problem of the day. (Hear, Hear.)

An Irish Member rose to order. No man should say that, while Ireland lay like a jewel on the bosom of the Atlantic. (Hear, Hear.)

Sir C. Wood proceeded to sketch the history of our conquest of India, the gradual extension of our empire, the character of the various races we had to govern, the present form of administration, and the plans proposed for its alteration. He was listened to in tolerable silence, except that whenever the word "superstition" was used, Mr. Lucas looked up savagely, as ready in case the speaker should be going to apply it otherwise than to India; and that at every repetition of the term "tyranny," Mr. Moore groaned deeply and significantly. Sir Charles having concluded, and the question being put,

Mr. Duffy said that they had heard a good deal about Juggernaut, but the state carriage of the Queen of England was the Irish Juggernaut Car, and his blood boiled to hear so much about a disquiet surf at Madras, when there were a million of disquiet serfs in Munster.

Mr. Conolly said that Irish bulls were much finer animals than Brahmin bulls, but he should not oppose the motion on that account.

Mr. Lucas said that Protestantism was the same in its persecuting nature, whether India or Ireland were its sphere of action. On Sir C. Wood's own showing, England had, with a strong hand, put down infanticide and the burning of widows. What right had the Protestant to refuse the church of Brahma its spiritual development? No more than it had to say that an Irish priest should not flog voters and instigate what were termed riots, but which were only Catholic developments. (Cheers.)

Sir Denham Norreys said that there was another affinity between India and Ireland. India produced spring rice, and Ireland produced Lord Montague. (Loud cheers.)

Lord John Russell suggested that as Ireland had precedence on the paper for every other day in the month, they should now confine themselves to India, if only for a few hours.

Colonel Dunne complained that that was the way Irishmen were treated, if they ventured to point out the wrongs of their country. He himself had been rebuked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for accidentally bursting into a loud laugh in the middle of one of the latter's speeches on Ireland. But that was another proof of the levity with which the English discussed Irish subjects.

Mr. Fitzgerald had detected, beneath Sir C. Wood's assumed bonhomie, a series of studied insults to the venerable prelates of his, Mr. Fitzgerald's, church. When Sir Charles spoke of "ajlect slaves to domineering priests," the scene was in India, but the sneer was for Ireland.

Another Irish Member complained that Sir C. Wood had said that the quantity of land irrigated in India was larger than the quantity cultivated in Ireland. This was a gratuitous insult; and if the fact were so, it was caused by the crime of the oppressors of Ireland.

After considerable discussion, it was agreed that the bill should be postponed, in order that the House should proceed to inquire into the case of an Irish priest, at Ballymahowl, county Kilkenny, at whom it was alleged that a Protestant magistrate had made a face as he passed the reverend gentleman in the street; and this occupied the House until half past three in the morning; the discuss on being; then adjourned, on Lord J. Russell giving it precedence for the next day.—Punch.

DEATH OF A ROSE.

Red blushing 'midst the leaflets green,
A rose I spied one soft May morn,
Her flushed cheek bright with limpid sheen
Of glistening dew in starlight born—
Ah, she was beautiful!
Her fair form steeped in lucid light
Stood bending to the kissing gale,
That lingered on its changeable flight
To woo with many an amorous tale
The rose so beautiful.

But vain was wooing—sighing vain;
The rose remembered one lone star
That nightly walked the glittering plain,
Hard by the moon's refulgent car,
In radiant solitude.
As late he trod the spangled blue
He peered down on the dream-bound world,
There spying, bathed in sorrowing dew,
The rose with all her charms unfurled,
In blushing solitude.

Then forthwith from her beauteous cheek
She smiling shook the limpid tear,
And upward turned her face to speak,
In voice of perfume none may hear,
Of love unchangeable.

Down softly stole an answering beam—
It slid down through the moonlight sad,
And lighting, like an angel's dream,
Brought to the rose the tidings glad
Of light unchangeable.

The gale departed with a moan,
Yet on its wings the perfume sweet
Still lingered, like a silent tone
That dwells where shades and echoes meet
In halls of memory;

Where love's sweet song, though stilled for ever,
Steals like the lost lay of a lute,
Where hopes lie dead, though buried never,
For unseen shades and echoes mute
Do dwell in memory.

Next fading 'midst the leaflets green
I spied the rose one summer night,
Her pale cheek bright with limpid sheen,
Her wan form steeped in pensive light;
Yet she was beautiful.
Her blighted charms soon strewed the ground,
And every tuneless wind that blows
With muffled wings came murmuring round,
To sing the requiem of that rose,
In death still beautiful.

A thousand trembling drops of light,
Like flaming dew, the sky besprent,
But hers of all most pure, most bright,
A starbeam from her mansions sent
With joy unspeakable,
To bear from earth's ephemeral bowers
Her perfumed soul, so light, so free,
Up to the spirit-land of flowers,
Where odours mute sing audibly
Of bliss unspeakable.

Thou like that rose in life's fresh spring,
Oh! maiden fair, may'st bloom and smile;
Like evening gales that blithely sing,
Love's siren notes may charm awhile
A rose so beautiful;
But when mild death, that seraph bright,
Shall robe thee in undying bloom,
Thy being born on wings of light
Its purer essence shall assume,
In heaven most beautiful.

SINGULAR HABITS OF CELEBRATED MEN.

BEETHOVEN, the composer, had two imperious habits, by which he was constantly swayed—that of moving his lodgings, and that of walking. Scarcely was he installed in an apartment ere he would discover some fault in it, and commence looking out for another. Every day after dinner, despite rain, wind, hail, or snow, he would issue forth on foot, and take a long and fatiguing walk.

Sartines, the Lieutenant-General of Police under Louis XV., had a strange mania for wigs: his immense collection, amounting to upwards of eighty specimens, all well curled, powdered, and pomatumed, were carefully arranged in a glazed bookcase in his study, precisely as a library of books might be.

One J. B. Lulot, a learned Champenois, who died in 1771, was accustomed to make use of the corporeal strength with which nature had endowed him in order to try all the experiments which he imagined might prove useful to science. In the depth of winter he would cast himself into the icy waters of the Seine, in order to ascertain, by personal experience, the most intense degree of cold that could be endured by the human frame; and one day his friends had the utmost difficulty to dissuade him from entering an oven heated to the highest point, as he wished particularly to ascertain if it were possible for mortal flesh and blood to endure the heat.

The illustrious naturalist, Spallanzani, to the end of throwing light on the theory of the digestive functions, pursued upon himself a course of the most dangerous experiments: for instance, he would introduce into his stomach various aliments enveloped in little linen bags, and would swallow oat tubes filled with certain substances. He died in 1798.

Louis XIII., who had rigorously prohibited all games of chance throughout his kingdom, was so passionately fond of chess, that he played even in his carriage. The piece were made with pegs, so that they could be inserted into the squares of the chess-board without danger of being displaced by the motion.

The Abbé le St. Martin, who, in the seventeenth century, rendered himself so ridiculous with his pretensions and his manias, always wore nine skull-caps upon his head to keep off the cold, with a wig over all, which, by the way, was always awry and dishevelled, so that his face never appeared to be in its natural position. In addition to his nine skull-caps, he wore also nine pairs of stockings. His bed was made of bricks, underneath which was a furnace, so constructed as to impart the precise degree of warmth he might require: this bed had a very small opening, through which the abbé used to creep when he retired to rest at night.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

It is only great souls that know how much glory there is in being good.

THERE are some that live without any design at all, and only pass in the world like straws on a river; they do not go, but are carried.

THE footprint of the savage traced in the sand is sufficient to attest the presence of man to the atheist who will not recognise God, whose hand is impressed upon the entire universe.

HONOUR, like the shadow, follows those who flee from it, but flees from those who pursue it.

HONESTY obliges us to make restitution, not only of that which comes to us by our own faults, but of that which comes to us by the mistakes of others. Though we get it by oversight, if we keep it when the oversight is discovered, it is kept by deceit.

NOTHING can excuse a want of charity to a fellow-creature in distress. He is poor, perhaps, through his own folly or that of his ancestors; and we are rich, perhaps, through our own roguery, or that of our ancestors: we need not often insist on the difference of merit as the reason for a difference of condition.

THERE is something higher in politeness than Christian moralists have recognised. In its best forms, as a simple, out-going, all-pervading spirit, none but the truly religious man can show it. For it is the sacrifice of self in the little habitual matters of life—always the best test of our principles—together with a respect, unaffected, for man, as our brother under the same grand destiny.

MAN AND WOMAN.—Between male and female there is a difference of kind only—not degree. Man is strong, woman is beautiful; man is daring and confident, woman is diffident and unassuming; man is great in action, woman in suffering; man shines abroad, woman at home; man talks to convince, woman to persuade; man has a rugged heart, woman a soft and tender one; man prevents misery, woman relieves it; man has science, woman taste; man has judgment, woman sensibility; man is a being of justice, woman an angel of mercy. These comparative characteristics represent man as the head, woman as the heart; or, man the intellect, woman the affection. And in so doing, we submit that no position derogatory to woman is involved therein. We are, as a simple fact, more influenced by our hearts than our heads—by our love than our conviction. While physical and mental endowments make a forcible appeal to the senses, yet it is susceptible of experimental proof that moral power really controls and decides the fate of the world; and, as it is in this latter that woman pre-eminently shines, we should contend, so far from her being man's inferior, that she is, at present at least, his decided superior. With this view of their relative position before us, we shall be the better able to definitely calculate the value of the sexes to each other.

MISCELLANEOUS.

EVERY-DAY LIFE.—From morning till night is the human mind restless as the troubled sea! No sooner do men enter the world, than they at once lose their taste for natural and simple pleasures, so remarkable in early life. Every hour do they ask themselves, what progress they have made in the pursuit of wealth and honour? And on they go, as their fathers went before them; till, weary and sick at heart, they look back with a sigh of regret to the golden time of their childhood. Nature is not to blame for this. We are the offenders, and deserve to be unhappy.

BEAUTY—MENTAL AND SUBSTANTIVE.—So long as mind and matter shall exist, there will be a sympathy between mental and substantive beauty. Every form is perfected by the perfection of an idea. The daisy of the field, the moss on the mountain, the lily in the valley, the shell by the sea, the stars in the firmament—are all and each complete by the completeness of our perceptive qualities. If it were not so, these objects would appear the same to every individual. The poet would see in them no more superiority than the most worldly man observes. The intimacy of form and idea affects the course of our whole social and moral life.

INFLUENCE OF TEMPER ON THE VOICE.—The influence of temper upon tone deserves much consideration. Habits of querulousness, or ill-nature, will communicate a cat-like quality to the singing, as infallibly as they give a quality to the speaking voice. That there really exist amiable tones is not an unfounded opinion. In the voice there is no deception; it is, to many, the index of the mind, denoting moral qualities; and it may be remarked, that the low, soft tones of gentle and amiable beings, whatever their musical endowments may be, seldom fail to please; besides which, the singing of ladies indicates the cultivation of their taste generally, and the embellishment of their mind.—Mordaunt.

A PERILOUS SITUATION.—So accurately had the Indian calculated time and distance, that I was hardly at my place when a huge bull thundered headlong by me, and received a shot low and close behind the shoulder as he passed. He stumbled on for about ten paces, and lay quietly down. I waited to re-load, and on going up found him stone dead. The Indian then joined me, and said that the other two bulls had not gone far, but had taken different directions; so we agreed that he should pursue one, and I the other. I soon came in sight of mine. He was standing a little way off on the open plain, but the skirting willows and brushwood afforded me cover within eighty yards of him: profiting by which, I crept up, and, taking a deliberate aim, fired. The bull gave a convulsive start, moved off a little way, and turned his broadside again to me. I fired again, over a hundred yards this time: he did not stir. I loaded and fired the third time: whereupon he turned and faced me, as if about to show fight. As I was loading for a fourth shot, he tottered forward a step or two, and I thought he was about to fall—so I waited for a little while; but as he did not come down, I determined to go up and finish him. Walking up, therefore, to within thirty paces of him, till I could actually see his eyes rolling, I fired for the fourth time directly at the region of the heart, as I thought; but, to my utter amazement, up went his tail and down went his head, and, with a speed that I thought him little capable of, he was upon me in a twinkling. I ran hard for it, but he rapidly overhauled me, and my situation was becoming anything but pleasant. Thinking he might, like our own bulls, shut the eyes in making a charge, I swerved suddenly to one side to escape the shock; but to my horror, I failed in dodging him—for he bolted round quicker than I did, and, affording me barely time to protect my stomach with the stock of my rifle, and to turn myself sideways as I sustained the charge, in the hopes of getting between his horns, he came plump upon me with a shock like an earthquake. My rifle-stock was shivered to pieces by one horn, my clothes torn by the other; I flew into mid-air, scattering my prairie hens and rabbits, which had hitherto hung dangling by leathern thongs from my belt, in all directions, till, landing at last, I fell unhurt in the snow; and almost over me—fortunately not quite—rolled my infuriated antagonist, and subsided in a snow-drift. I was luckily not the least injured, the force of the blow having been perfectly deadened by the enormous mass of fur, wool, and hair that clothed his shaggy head-piece.—Palliser's Adventures in the Prairies.

TRUE LOVE.

—'Tis made of every fine emotion,
Of generous impulses and noble thoughts:—
It looketh to the stars, and dreams of heaven;
It nestles 'mid the flowers, and sweetens earth.
Love is aspiring, yet 'tis humble, too;
It doth exalt another o'er itself,
With sweet heart-homage which delights to raise its object.

THE WIFE'S PINT O' ALE.—A calico-printer in Manchester, on his wedding-day, was persuaded by his wife to allow her two half-pints of ale a day as her share. He rather winced at the bargain—for, though a drinker himself, he would have preferred a perfectly sober wife. They both worked hard; and he, poor man, was seldom out of the public-house, as soon as the factory closed. The wife and husband seldom saw each other, except at breakfast; but as she kept things tidy about her, and made her stinted and even selfish allowance for housekeeping meet the demands upon her, he never complained. She had her daily pint, and he, perhaps, had his two or three quarts; and neither interfered with the other, except that at odd times she succeeded, by dint of one little artifice or other, to win him home an hour or two earlier at night, and now and then to spend an entire evening in his own house; but these were rare occasions. They had been married a year; and on the morning of their wedding anniversary, the husband looked ashamed at her neat and comely person, with some shade of remorse, as he said: "Mary, we'n had no holiday since we were wed; and, only I haven't a penny in the world, we'd take a jaunt down to the village, to see thee mother." "W'ldst like to go, John?" said she, between a smile and a tear, so glad to hear him speak so kindly—so like old times. "If thee'd like to go, John, I'll stand treat." "Thou stand treat!" said he, with half a sneer. "Hast got a fortune, wench?" "Nay, said she, but I'n gotten the pint o' ale." "Gotten what?" said he. "The pint o' ale," said she. John still didn't understand her, till the faithful creature reached down an old stocking from under a loose brick up the chimney, and counted out her daily pint of ale in the shape of 365 threepences, i. e., 4l. 11s. 3d., and put them into his hand, exclaiming, "Thou shalt have thee holiday, John!" John was ashamed, astonished, conscience-smitten—wouldn't touch it. "Hastn't thee had thy share? Then I'll ha' no more," he said. He kept his word. They kept their wedding-day with mother—and the wife's little capital was the nucleus of a series of frugal investments that ultimately swelled out into a shop, a factory, warehouses, a country seat, and carriage.

QUEEN VICTORIA AND THE MISSIONARY.—The following statement appears from the pen of a lady of rank, whose brother is one of "the household," and was an eye-witness: Mr. Crowther was at a Church Missionary meeting at Windsor. After the meeting, Lord W. Russell (brother to Lord John, a pious clergyman, and member of the Evangelical Alliance) told him that her Majesty wished to see him at Windsor Castle. When at the palace, he met one of the ladies in waiting, who was collector for the Church Missionary Society, and who addressed herself to him as such, and as one deeply interested in the progress of the Society, and anxious to shake hands with him as her brother in the Lord. He then passed on to a room in which was Prince Albert, who immediately addressed him most kindly; and they were in deep conversation on missionary subjects, when a lady walked in and joined in the conversation. Mr. Crowther, taking it for granted it was the lady he had met in the ante-chamber before, took no particular notice of her, further than continuing in most earnest discourse, pointing out places on the map, describing the various stations, &c. At length Lord W. Russell said something apart to make Mr. Crowther aware that he was speaking to the Queen of England. He was a good deal abashed, both at the presence of royalty and the honour conferred upon him. In the gentlest manner (like a loving mother to her people) her Majesty set him quite at ease, and continued her close inquiries on subjects connected with the Church Missionary Society and Sierra Leone. They had not quite light enough at the table where the maps were spread out, and the Queen fetched a light from another table, which Mr. Crowther, in turning over the leaves of the atlas, put out, to his great distress; but the Queen (evidently not wishing the delay and interruption of calling a servant) immediately lighted it herself, and continued the conversation, asking many questions about the African missions. My brother asked Mr. Crowther what sort of questions the Queen asked. He replied: "A devoted lady collector could not have asked closer questions on the spiritual wants of the people, and the working of the missions." Her Majesty also inquired about the appointment of a bishop, and the suitability of Mr. Vidal, recently nominated. In giving his very decided testimony to their need of an overseer, and the peculiar fitness of the bishop-designate, Mr. Crowther particularised his wonderful knowledge of languages; whereupon her Majesty turned to the Prince, and said, with a smile: "Ah, Albert, you see there are other good linguists besides Germans!"

A WELCH CURATE OF THE LAST GENERATION.

ENERGY, AND THE WANT OF IT.

THIS story is from a late number of the Edinburgh Review. The names are, of course, fictitious, but the facts are true: "The Rev. David Jones was a curate in Cardiganshire, and had long watched the failing health of his neighbour the Vicar of Dim Saesoneg. At length he received the news of his friend's decease, of which he had secured the earliest intelligence. No time was to be lost. His pony was instantly saddled, and off he rode, the shortest cut over the mountains, to Abergwili, the residence of the bishop. The distance was fifty miles—half bog, half torrent; but hope lent wings to David, and soon he was in sight of the palace chimneys. Suddenly a pang shot through his heart. He had forgotten his credentials! He had obtained, only a week before, a letter of recommendation to the bishop from an influential member of the squirearchy; and this letter he has left at home in the pocket of a week-day garment! What is to be done? It is useless to attack the bishop without a letter. He must return for it at all hazards. Luckily he has a cousin who keeps a country inn not far from Abergwili. There he borrows a fresh horse, and pushes back with all speed. It is a moonlight night, so that he can follow the mountain track without difficulty; and before dawn he astonishes Mrs. Jones by his unlooked-for appearance beside the nuptial couch. But he vanishes from her sight again, like a vision. He has found the precious letter, and, buttoning his coat tightly over it, he hurries to the house of a friendly neighbour, who lends him another steed. While it is being caught and saddled, he snatches a hasty breakfast, and is off again to Abergwili. Faint and saddle-sore he felt (so he told our informant), when once more he came in sight of the palace. Nevertheless he tarried not for refreshments, but hastened on to the episcopal mansion. Tremblingly he rang the sonorous bell at the entrance; and when the door was flung open by the purple footman, in the excitement of the moment he accosted him as "My Lord." The servant was not disconcerted, being quite accustomed to such titmily elevation. He showed Mr. Jones quietly into the library, where the bishop soon after made his appearance, and inquired, with an air of bland dignity, into the business of his visitor. The matter was soon explained, the squire's letter was produced, and the bishop, having received no prior application, bestowed the desired preferment on the enraptured curate. In the highest elevation David retired to his inn, when whom should he meet in the stable-yard but his neighbour, Thomas Williams, who filled the next curacy to his own. At sight of Jones's joyful countenance, a deadly paleness overspread the face of Williams. He felt that he was too late. But hope is tenacious, and he refused to believe in his rival's success till he had himself seen the bishop. He rushed to the palace, and was admitted to an audience, but it was only to receive a confirmation of the unwelcome intelligence, with the additional mortification of an episcopal rebuke. "Sir," said the prelate, "Mr. Jones was obliged to ride one hundred and fifty miles to obtain this living. Had you possessed his energy, you might have been here long before him, and secured the preferment for yourself."

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

HENRY READ.—The second marriage was illegal. In point of fact it was no marriage at all, because the first had not been dissolved. The law in a similar manner restrains the wife. Both may be prosecuted.

W. W.—Should your sister-in-law have been injured through the negligence of the parties who had charge of the machinery in the factory, she has a good cause of action against the proprietors, and a jury would be certain to give her proper damages.

WILLIAM.—The Easter custom of lifting or heaving is exceedingly vulgar. Fifteen years ago it was brutal and indelicate in the extreme. Of course it is an assault, but the police and improved intelligence among the people have almost put down the nuisance.

A FOOLISH FELLOW has correctly designated himself. He doubts his sweetheart, because she is timid and bashful in company. When he becomes maudlin, she says: "There, get along with you." Very proper. The girl respects herself. Besides, it is silly to be perpetually gibbering a young girl because she has reciprocated a young man's liking.

M. N.—Consult the list of unclaimed dividends, exhibited gratis at the Bank of England.

R. ALLEN.—We have not received the coin.

CAROLUS.—The coin is a half-crown of the time of Charles II. It is not scarce.

J. K.—Voluntary separation between husband and wife, even for any period, long or short, does not authorise either party to marry again. It would be a crime to do so. The law is severe, and we think not very wise, but still it is the law.

W. S.—An apprentice to a particular trade or profession cannot be compelled to do the duties of an errand-boy. Your remedy is by summons before a magistrate.

J. N. R.—There is no register-office in the metropolis for clerks out of employment. Notices are allowed in the passages of some of the law-courts, and at the law-stationers.

H. T. W.—Your song of the "Wave" is irregular, and in a bad style of versification. The first verse is very bad. The two middle ones are tolerable, and might pass muster in the crowd of wretched ballads with which the public are favoured. We subjoin them:

As a riplet small, sometime I fall
O'er the beach, so gently fair,
That I scarcely efface the gentle trace
Of a maiden's footstep there.

But I can sweep o'er the mighty deep,
With a fierce and majestic roll;
And rear my crest on its foaming breast
As I thunder from pole to pole.

T. HEALITISARCHER.—Ants are destroyed by opening the nests, putting in quick-lime, and throwing water on it.

ORTHODOX.—Quite immaterial, but it is more business-like and clearer to write, "18 June," instead of June 18th. In the latter case, the figures of the month run into those of the year.

R. P. M.—Wait until the twelve months have expired. Bonds to keep the peace won't bear tampering with. Besides, at the end of that time you ought to have grown more forgiving and wiser.

F. & W. A.—The Birkenhead steamer was wrecked on its voyage to the Cape of Good Hope, when not far from its destination.

MELNOTTE.—We cannot recommend the stage as a profession to any young man, however clever or strong his liking may be. The stage in the present day is more in the hands of scene-painters than either authors or actors. Besides, the taste of the public is so fastidious, that it is only clever managers who succeed in pleasing it. Look out for something more certain.

H. E. H. L.—A memoir of Mr. Macready will be found in Vol. VII. of this Journal. The height of the Duke of Wellington, when in his prime, was about five feet seven and a half inches.

J. MORRE (Hanley).—The gentleman to whom you have alluded was not the author of the essays in question. The initials attached to one of the articles occurred through the mistake of the printer.

KATE W.—The son of an English father and Irish mother, born in British America, is in law an Englishman. If he had been born in the moon it would have been the same.

W. W.—When we have received MSS. which after a perusal we have deemed unsuitable, we simply acknowledge the receipt of the communication. We never, under any circumstances, undertake to return rejected MSS.

MISS R. asks, What is love? It would be as pertinent to ask what is a star, or the moon, or anything we can believe in, but don't quite understand. If such a question had been put to Bishop Berkeley, he would have said love was nothing—a mirage. We can afford to be less sceptical, and can assure our fair correspondent that love is the divinest of mysteries—and that is all we authoritatively know about it. Universal and immortal, it defies analysis. It is the impalpable link between earth and heaven. Rooted in every heart, it works invisibly to mortal ken. It is the source of every human happiness when rightly appreciated, but when perverted spreads a ludicrous leprosy over the surface of society. Passion is not love. The god-like sentiment in its purity is as generous as the life-giving, light-bestowing sun.

MILES.—You are decidedly wrong. The Irish emigration cannot but be regarded as a calamity. It is endangering the vital interests of the empire. According to the last census, the population had decreased 1,659,430, or at the rate of twenty per cent. Since March, 1851, emigration from Ireland has rapidly increased, and, upon a moderate computation, cannot now be less than at the rate of three per cent. per annum, a process which would exhaust the population of Ireland in about thirty-four years. This is not natural, in the face of the fact that Ireland could comfortably maintain forty millions of inhabitants. And yet you contend that emigration is doing Ireland good. What is telling people that they will never do any good for themselves in Ireland, doing Ireland good? That is galloping to a conclusion. In economical politics it is far safer to walk slowly.

SILVESTER.—To make Ginger Beer: Pour two gallons of boiling water on a quarter of a pound of cream of tartar, one ounce of sliced ginger, two pounds of lump-sugar. Let it stand six hours, then add two table-spoonsful of yeast. Let it stand six hours more, strain through a fine sieve, put it into stone bottles, tie down the corks, and it will be fit for use in twenty-four hours.

PAY.—To a property-tax there can be no honest objection—for who are more bound to contribute to the national finances than those classes for whose benefit the greater portion of the money collected is disbursed. The rich are more benefited by our costly government machinery than the poor; and therefore it is only fair that they should be made to pay for that directly which they obtain directly. Wholesale indirect taxation makes the numerical majority contribute more than their fair proportion. A property-tax of some kind or another is assuredly a state necessity, but an income-tax is not—for the term in reality is but a fiction—or rather, in a fiscal sense, a misnomer for a tax on labour—in effect a poll-tax, without its honesty—for in the majority of instances it is levied by stratagem, and in the remainder by arbitrary and harsh assessments.

A. M.—Registration of births is compulsory on the parents. If made within six weeks after the birth, no charge is made; afterwards the fee to be paid to the registrar is five shillings.

G. R.—A discharged soldier may hawk goods without a license, but he must make previous application to the magistrate of the district.

BARBARA B.—It will not be possible to open the Crystal Palace, at Sydenham, earlier than in the ensuing year.

Gus.—Shakespeare does not take rank as a mere poet. He occupies the highest position possible in the literary and mental world. He was more than a poet—he was a philosopher and a brilliant essayist.

A SOLICITOR.—What we boldly contended for, in the course of our answers to various questions on the subject, was a thorough revision of the laws relating to imprisonment for debt, with the view to their total repeal, except as regards the dishonest. Trade, commerce, and the multitudinous pursuits of life demand protection against fraud—they are entitled to demand every practicable and wise safeguard for all their operations; but surely no such security can be found in the tyrannous ability to make the weak weaker, the fair-dealing man a sly rogue, the unfortunate one a martyr to circumstances, and the wicked one a teacher of wickedness. But if the system is to be maintained, what we should particularly insist upon would be, that in all cases of commitment to prison for debt, the debtor should, as in the case of the felon and the misdemineant, undergo a previous examination before a competent authority, either on the day of his arrest or within twenty-four hours afterwards, in order to open the door to a fair and reasonable adjustment of the matter in dispute, or to afford the opportunity of his being bailed cheaply and promptly, in order that he may not be taken from the management of his affairs. At all events, such an arrangement would do away with goals, except for the stupid and fraudulent, and curb the powers vested by the barbarous usages of past ages in the hands of irresponsible sheriffs.

E. O. D.—The population of the Burman Empire consists of various distinct nations or tribes. The aggregate population is about eleven millions. Travellers have not given us an exalted opinion of their character. They are said to be abjectly submissive towards their superiors, to strangers audacious, in power rapacious and cruel, in war treacherous and ferocious; in their dealings litigious and faithless, in appetite insatiable and avaricious, in habit lazy, and in morals offensively objectionable. They, however, have courage, and are strict observers of the ceremonial parts of their religion, charitable to their priests and poor, and in the country hospitable. They are crafty and cunning, and we may mention that, among all the worshippers of Buddha, cunning is esteemed as a virtue. The deeply-rooted opinion that address in stealing ranks as an accomplishment next to valour, prevails all over the East, not only in the Buddhist states, but India and Egypt; and the Spartan legislator only borrowed his law from institutions still existing among the mountain tribes of Asia. With such characteristics, we British, we fancy, ought not to be very anxious to annex Burmah to our already gigantic eastern empire.

L. N. THORNTON informs us, that in the editions of the poetical works of Ebenezer Elliott, the following fine lines "On receiving a copy of Sacred Poems," is incorrectly quoted. He sends us a copy from the original MS.

"Scorn not the bard of humble worth,
Whose muse of modest power
Hath like a daisy "glinted forth,"
To share the passing hour—
For loveliest flowers with Gospel dews
Are often sanctified,
And from small discs the spirits' hues
May cast a radiance wide."

P. S.—Railway companies are not properly managed. The system is indefensible. In the first place, the directors are incompetent. They for the most part consist of members of the Stock Exchange, retired merchants, half-pay officers, with here and there a peer as chairman, or vice-chairman, to conciliate the landowners of the district. What can such men know of so complicated a mass of machinery as a railway and its adjuncts? Where is their science—their experience? Undoubtedly in their purses, for the plieoric condition of which they betray an amazing affection. To appease their constituents, they resort to every expedient to swell their half-yearly dividends, cut down salaries, and, as a consequence, reduce the competency of the persons in their employ; stint the line of engines, carriages, and working materials; patch up, instead of efficiently repairing the permanent way,—and what is the result of all this squeezing and screwing down? Why, accidents! Depend upon it, our railways, sooner or later, will be placed on a very different footing to what they are now.

MARY.—We have heard of men who hated women, and we have heard men say they did—but we were not quite so unsophisticated as to believe them: we accepted their declarations at their real value. In several instances, we subsequently received ample confirmation of the soundness of our judgment. One married within the year, another nearly realised the predicament of that miserable mortal who is supposed to be in Bedlam, and seeing her dancing in the hall, and heeding him not, while a third made himself so ridiculous in his attentions to a lady of higher rank than himself, that his friends had him married right off-hand to a poor girl, who made him an admirable wife. So that a downright woman-hater must be a myth, or worse—the annihilation of an idea a moral scarecrow. But, as a rule, we must tell the girls to put on the cap of wisdom at the first approach of these men. If not labouring under an illusion, they are very deep. Some will be courted. The majority, however, are more contemptible than dangerous.

TEMPLAR writes us a letter, some portion of which we are entitled to transfer to our pages. He states that he owes the LONDON JOURNAL a deep debt of gratitude. But we had better give his own language. "I was about fourteen when I commenced reading your Journal; a little more than fifteen when I left school a consummate dunce. I was then suffered to do as I liked, go where I thought proper, rode a hunting, and even had a race-horse with which I won several races. In this course of life I continued for about two years, during which period I often thought of the future—which thought was invariably caused by perusing your pages; for when I meditated for hours upon the morals and precepts depicted by your tales, and ever finding that virtue conquered vice, I began to see that I was not on the road to domestic happiness, but to profligacy. It moreover aroused in me a pang of jealousy, and I envied your writers their abilities. It also caused me to like study, which, in my school-days, was exotic to my nature; and when about eighteen I quitted the field, the race-course, and companions, and entered upon one of the most arduous professions—that of the law. I have since pursued a course of energetic study. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at that I should feel grateful for having been checked in a course of idleness, and placed in an honourable profession, solely by your Journal having given me the original bias to do right," &c.

ADELA HAMILTON, a dark-haired, loving, affectionate, and accomplished girl, aged twenty-two, being quite tired of a single life, would like to correspond with a gentleman desirous of entering the married state. Adela is possessed of a small fortune, and is well calculated to render a home happy.

MUSICAL A.—How could we encumber our pages with the music of a polka, or a love-sick, nonsensical ballad?

H. J. K.—Being a lineal descendant, you would be entitled to use the arms of your father's family.

ARTHUR GORMAN.—Gambling is truly frightful to contemplate under any aspect; but when the play is double or quits for fifteen games, supposing one party to lose each game, and the stake at first was one pound, the amount lost at the conclusion of the fifteenth game would be £16,384.

E. JONES.—Toothache with many persons is constitutional, with others it arises from neglect, and in all, from decay and consequent irritation of the nerve. The best cure is scariation of the gums, or bleeding, by means of leeches, and then having the hollow part filled up so as to exclude the atmosphere. At the same time aperiens medicines should be taken.

ONES.—Christianity was introduced into England in the first century, but it never took deep root until St. Augustine undertook his celebrated mission. Tradition says that St. Paul, during his travels, visited Britain, but, being unsupported, it is scarcely worthy of being mentioned.

ADONIS.—The language of flowers is the unknown tongue. Young girls and boys can speak and read it very early: You are one of the foreigners, but do not be alarmed: when you can read yourself, you will be able to read and understand this mysterious language. Dark hair and whiskers on one side, and flashing eyes and rosy lips on the other, assist the mental faculties wonderfully in these dilemmas.

COSMOS.—Your face flushes in the evening, and yet you never taste spirituous liquors. Very likely. The excitement undergone during the day produces nervous reaction. And probably, in avoiding one indulgence, you have plunged headlong into others. Smoking immediately after meals will cause the face to be flushed.

PETER SIMPLE, a draper's apprentice, must conform to the rules of the house in which he is engaged. If one of those rules be that he shall not leave the shop after it has been closed for the night, he must submit or leave. A magistrate under such a circumstance, would not insist upon the strict interpretation of the deed of apprenticeship. It is doubtless a hard case, but it is only one in a thousand. The employer may be cruel, but the system is to blame. And, we must add, if parents will persist in putting their sons to businesses only fit for women, they must expect them to be ill-treated.

ISAHEL has lately become acquainted with a gentleman whom she has met several times, and who has behaved most politely. The last time she met him he promised to send her tickets for the theatre the following week—which promise he has broken. What should she think of him? Why, that he is a very extraordinary gentleman. His rudeness was inexcusable, in the absence of an apology. Men who break their little promises to ladies seldom perform their great and serious ones.

J. W. B.—It has been decided that a house infested with bugs, when the circumstance at the time of taking was concealed, was a misrepresentation, and that the tenant was not bound to fulfil the terms of the lease. You had better consult your solicitor.

A YOUNG CAMBRIAN.—Your miscellaneous reading will be sure to come in useful by-and-by. But do not read without an object. And, if possible, among all your reading, follow up closely one particular pursuit.

J. O. (Nottingham).—Consult a solicitor. The representatives of the deceased parties have power to act.

C. J. MORO.—"The Will and the Way" commenced in No. 398, and the "Lives of the Queens of England" in No. 399 of this Journal.

ELLEN DE VERE.—Ink spots may be removed out of linen or calico, by taking a piece of mould candle, and melting it—then dipping the spotted part into the melted tallow: When washed, the spots will have disappeared.

LANCASHIRE.—The price of an ensign's commission in the Life Guards is about £1200.

CHAPTER CXXI.

Women are worse or better far than men—
Creatures of heaven and earth, so strangely mixed.
When good predominates, like angels sent,
They teach us Eden was not all a fable.
When ill, they fix the sullen sceptic's creed—
For who could trust in Paradise, doubting
Their faith?

HERM OF THE SEPT.

COLONEL and Lady Mowbray were seated in the drawing-room of the mansion which they had lately taken in Berkeley Square—at the period of our tale one of the most fashionable localities in London. The recent events at Carrow—the arrival in England of the much slandered widow of Sir William, armed with a mother's wrongs, a mother's claims—together with the exposure of their unworthy treatment of Ellen, had considerably shaken the confidence which they had hitherto felt in the security of their position. More than once the gentleman expressed a disposition to retire to the continent, and abandon the game which something whispered, was hopeless. His evil genius, in the form of the bold, bad woman he had married, still urged him to persevere.

"Ridiculous!" she exclaimed, each time that he alluded to the taking of such a step. "Renounce, like a timid girl, the fortune you have played so boldly for! Dispute it to the last! Meeran and his wretched accomplice are both dead, without breathing a word which can implicate you!"

"They could not do so!" replied her husband; "I am innocent of all participation in their crime!"

"In act, certainly!"

"Not a word ever passed between us on the subject," added the colonel, with increased earnestness.

For several minutes her ladyship regarded him with an expression of undisguised contempt: not for the paltry equivocation he had uttered, but for the weakness he had shown in supposing he could deceive her.

"There are deeds," she answered, "which require no compact, written or spoken—but it is not the less implied; your brother's death was one of them! You may deceive the world—yourself—but not me! Instead, therefore, of a vindication no less ridiculous than unnecessary, call up your energies to the task of defeating the machinations of those who would dispossess you of the fruit of your crimes!"

"Crimes!" repeated the cold-hearted man of the world.

"Colonel Mowbray!" exclaimed his wife, impatiently; "there are very few persons to whom I express what I really think or feel—and you are one of them! If I call things by their right names, it is that we may the better understand each other: a truce to affectation, and let us consider the best means of achieving our aims! Your brother's widow has returned to England?"

"Yes; you know she has!"

"With the means of proving her innocence?"

"Beyond the possibility of a doubt!" replied her husband. "Lucas deceived her with a trumped-up tale of Sir William's being obliged to fly to the continent, in consequence of a duel with a political opponent, and having commissioned him to conduct her to him. When the mask fell, and she discovered his true purpose, she vindicated her honour, by one of those terrible acts which —"

"I know—I know!" interrupted the lady, impatiently.

"She killed the silly fellow for his pains! The worst of it is, that it invests her with a certain degree of interest. Her story has created quite a sensation—her own family have taken up the question warmly. The principal families in town besiege Devonshire House with their visits. But what has that to do with us—or rather with you?" she added; "were you in any way a party to the attempt of Lucas?"

"No!"

Lady Mowbray regarded him fixedly.

"At least," he added, "no proof exists that I was in any way a party to it!"

"Which is much the same thing!" answered the female Machiavel. "As for the rest, n'importe—you can settle that with your own conscience! What can you possibly fear?"

"Public opinion may —"

His wife shook her head incredulously: she knew that he had long since callously braved it.

"Well, then," replied the colonel, who found that it was useless to attempt mincing the question further, "immediately after the death of Captain Lucas, and the temporary insanity of my victim, his brother, the abbate, sent the child to England."

"To you?"

"Yes; and, like a fool, I acknowledged the arrival of the boy, in a letter which I wrote to the priest: which letter the influence of the Duchess of Devonshire with his superiors in Rome has obtained."

"This is unfortunate!" observed the lady, with the air of an Old Bailey lawyer taking instructions from some prisoner whom he was employed to defend. "How could you be so imprudent?"

Colonel Mowbray looked as if he felt that it was imprudent.

"And what became of the brat?" coolly inquired his wife. "But I need not ask: doubtless it was a sickly child—pined for its mother, perhaps, and—died!"

There was a terrible meaning in her glance, as she pronounced the word died! The blood of the miserable man ran cold as he heard it—for it displayed in its true light the character of the fiend to whom he had linked his destiny.

"No, madam!" he exclaimed; "it did not die! Bad as the opinion you entertain of me is, I am incapable of taking the life of an infant!"

"Doubtless you contented yourself with abandoning it to the tender mercies of the world!" observed her ladyship, with a sneer; "to starve, or be bred up a thief, as accident might determine!"

"Neither one nor the other, Lady Mowbray!"

"Then you are a greater fool than even I imagined!" exclaimed his wife, impetuously. "Where is he?"

"Dead!"

"Dead?" she repeated, joyfully.

"Murdered!" continued the wretched man.

"Hush!" whispered the female fiend; "not so loud—such words should be breathed only in the ear of the dead!"

"I have nothing to fear!" continued her husband.

"You yourself heard the young fellow whom my brother's mad partiality designed for the hand of Ellen, relate the manner of his death. Walter Mowbray, whom the world so long considered my son, was in reality my nephew; as my heir he would, in the course of nature, have succeeded me in the title and estates; so that you see, after all, my crime has been less than you imagined!"

Lady Mowbray regarded him for some moments in silence; there was a smile of incredulity upon her lip. It was evident that she did not believe one word of the story he had uttered. It is one of the characteristics of an evil nature never to give the world credit for being better than it had imagined it. Her husband read the thought which was passing in her mind, and, walking towards a cabinet at the opposite end of the room, opened and drew from it two papers bearing the seals and signatures of the British consul at Nice. One was a certificate of the death and burial of his first wife, who had died there; the other of their infant son. He placed the documents before her, and requested her to peruse them.

"Well, madam!" he said, after she had slowly perused them, and carefully examined the writing and official seals; "I trust you are convinced?"

"Not in the least!" replied the lady, coolly; "but I shall act as though I were. As for your secret, keep it—I have no wish to share it: those papers will answer my purpose."

"Is it possible that you still doubt?"

"A truce, colonel!" interrupted his wife. "I cannot push my complaisance any further than to appear to credit the statement you have made! I witnessed your surprise, when Henry Ashton first suggested the idea that Walter was the son of your late brother. But it will do!" she added, thoughtfully; "it will do! Armed with such proofs we may defy them!"

"On my nephew's account I am perfectly easy," replied her husband. "Our treatment of Ellen—the attempt made to force her into a marriage with Meeran Hafaz—"

"May be explained," said her ladyship; "at least we have the Chancellor in our favour. I have good reason to believe that he is most indignant at any one having presumed to withdraw her from the guardian which he had appointed, and insists, before he will hear any application on the subject, that she once more places herself under our authority. His lordship is a man of doubt and precedent," she added, with a smile, "and will only proceed according to rule. Ellen once more in our hands, we can make what terms we please with her friends."

Shortly after the above conversation, Mrs. Captain Herbert and Major Mottram were announced. It was the first meeting of mother and daughter since the death of Meeran Hafaz.

"Show Mrs. Herbert to my boudoir, and the major to the library," said her ladyship to the footman, who handed her the cards upon a salver; "I must speak seriously with Isabel," she mentally added; "this flirtation with Mottram is growing serious!"

So saying, she left the room to receive her daughter.

About half an hour afterwards a message was sent to the major, to say that Lady Mowbray being unwell, Mrs. Herbert would remain and pass the day with her. The gentleman immediately adjourned to the club, to meet his friend George Herbert.

"Isabel," said her mother, as soon as they were seated in the tastefully-arranged boudoir of the latter; "you know that I never object to a little harmless flirtation—it is the privilege of our sex, especially when married; but there is a point beyond which —"

"I know, mamma," interrupted her daughter, petulantly, "all that you would say about the world's opinion, George, duty, and the long list of moral et ceteras, which every one believes in, but few people observe; but spare me to-day, for I am really very, very unhappy!"

"What could you expect," replied the philosophic parent; "marrying a poor man?"

"It is not that. George is becoming so indifferent—so cold!"

Her ladyship shrugged her shoulders with something like an air of contempt.

"You have been married more than three months!" she observed.

"Well, mamma?"

"Love in that time," continued Lady Mowbray, "generally subsides into respect. True, I have known la grande passion last a year, or even more; but in your case, you ought not to expect it."

"And why not?" demanded the young wife.

"Because George has sacrificed a princely fortune on your account. Like all men, he is extremely selfish, and sure to regret it."

"But I love him!" said Isabel, bursting into tears; "devotedly, truly!"

Again her ladyship shrugged her shoulders; but this time there was an expression of incredulity in her air. She could not reconcile the declaration of her daughter's love for her husband and her flirtation with his friend, Major Mottram.

"And the major?" she said, with a smile.

"A dear, good fellow!" exclaimed her daughter; "and not at all the kind of person you imagine: he sees George's neglect, and sympathises with me. Our flirtation is only a little plot between us to make George jealous—nothing more."

"A dangerous game, Isabel—a dangerous game!" observed her mother, in a serious tone.

More than once during the day the young wife felt inclined to confide to her parent the project of her pretending to elope with the major, in order to test the affection of her husband; but the dread of her ladyship's satirical humour prevented her. Had she done so, Lady Mowbray's prudence would have taken the alarm, and the misery of her future life in all probability been prevented.

Isabel was full of hopeful confidence in the success of her stratagem: she fancied that within the last few days she had detected symptoms—unequivocal symptoms—of jealousy in the captain. Poor girl! how little did she know him: the heartless egotist was only acting!

Leaving Lady Mowbray and her daughter to their tête-à-tête, we must accompany Major Mottram to his club, where he had gone in search of Captain Herbert. He found the ex-guardsman smoking a cigar in one of the conversation rooms.

"So soon back!" he observed, as his obliging friend made his appearance. "Anything occurred between you and Isabel?"

Although the question was carelessly asked, to a nice observer like the major, it was evident that the speaker attached considerable interest to the reply.

"She remains to dine with Lady Mowbray, who is ill."

"Humph!" ejaculated the captain; "if Isabel should be fool enough to tell her mother of the intended elopement, the affair is at an end: the artful woman would see through it in an instant! I don't know any other woman in town who could have hooked Mowbray as she has done. See here," he added, passing the Morning Post to his friend; "we have no time to lose."

The paragraph to which he pointed, was headed—"Approaching Marriage in High Life. We understand that the gallant General Bouchier, who is about to be united to the lovely and accomplished daughter and heiress of the rich Indian director, Sir Jasper Pepper, has taken a noble mansion in St. James's Square, which is being fitted up in the most superb style. Report estimates the fortune of the bride at above a million. The happy bridegroom himself is immensely rich. His marriage will make him one of the wealthiest commoners in England."

"This looks serious!" observed the major, laying down the paper; "do you think the affair too far advanced to permit him to retract?"

His friend assured him that he was perfectly satisfied on that point.

"And the lady?"

"Will not object to exchange an old husband for a young one!" replied the captain. "As for my uncle, the exchange will be a positive relief to him. I know that he detests the idea of marriage—he is so intensely selfish. I hate selfish men!"

The gravity with which this was uttered, slightly moved the risible muscles of Major Mottram, who had a keen perception of the ridiculous. It was finally arranged, that if Isabel could be persuaded, the pretended elopement should take place on the following evening.

"Do you think she will consent?" inquired her husband, with an anxious look.

"I have no doubt of it!" replied his confederate. "I have succeeded in exciting her imagination—painted to her your transports, and repentance for your past neglect, when we confess our little plot to reclaim you. Excite a woman's imagination," he added, "and you may persuade her to anything. Besides, she looks upon me as her sincere friend."

"You will write me the letter?"

"It is written," said the major, handing it to him. "I think that will do—you can glance it over; but my valet had better deliver it to you."

Herbert nodded assent.

"What do you think of it? The touch or conscience and remorse at having violated your hospitality and friendship was well put in!"

"Very!"

"There will be no mistaking the inference?"

"Impossible!" said the philosophic husband. "By heavens, Mottram, you are the best friend I ever had! Let's see—I am to overtake you, with my witnesses, the first stage on the Dover Road?"

"Yes."

"Don't you think," he added, carelessly, "that we had better fight? It will give a tone to the thing—the world will expect it of us; only you must act the generous," he added, in a confidential tone, "and fire in the air. I shouldn't like to run any risk. I know your reputation as a shot."

The last observation was adroitly put in. Major Mottram was an excellent shot—one who practised daily with his weapons, in order to achieve a reputation sufficient to deter any one from calling him out—for in heart he was a coward. Suspected, if not known as such, the opportunity of retrieving his character for courage by a sham duel, was too tempting to be resisted: he caught like a gudgeon at the bait.

"You need not be alarmed!" he said.

"I am not in the least!" answered the captain, with a smile; "my death would not only deprive you of your bet of twenty thousand pounds, but hamper you with a woman, whom you don't care a straw about! No—no!" he mentally added; "I am quite sure that Mottram will not shoot me!"

From the above conversation, it was evident that the reserve with which they had at first approached the subject—the veil which, under the mask of a bet, covered but did not conceal their mutual baseness—had long since disappeared; and they talked over the affair in the most business-like manner.

Herbert saw that his friend was beginning to reflect: probably some observation of his had struck him, and he had his own private reasons for diverting the current of his thoughts.

"You must not return to England," he said, "till after the divorce."

"Of course not!"

"And my second marriage."

"Make yourself perfectly easy on that score!" replied the major; "the probability is, that I shall never mix in society in England again."

Herbert thought so, too. But the reasons on which they had come to the conclusion were widely different.

At last the two worthies, after dining together, parted. The major to escort Isabel back to her cottage ornée at Richmond, and Captain Herbert, as he said, to pass away a few hours at the opera. Although the theatre was crowded, and Catalani in magnificent voice, the music had lost its charm. Calling for a hackney-coach, he entered it, and directed the man to drive to an obscure alley in Holborn.

"Sixty-three, I believe," he said.

"Ay—ay, sir!" replied the driver; "I know it—shooting-gallery over the door!"

CHAPTER CXXII.

Since laws were made for every degree,
To curb vice in others as well as in me;
I wonder we ain't better company
On Tyburn tree. THE BEGGARS' OPERA.

GREAT and general was the sympathy felt in fashionable circles for the widowed Lady Mowbray, whose romantic adventures, sufferings, and wrongs were the theme of conversation in the drawing-rooms and salons of the metropolis. Many who had known her as the blooming wife of Sir William, were inexpressibly shocked at the ravages which grief, more than the hand of Time, had made in her once lovely features. The circle of which she had once been one of the brightest ornaments, had it been permitted, would have welcomed her return with pleasure, eager to atone for the involuntary wrong its former judgment had inflicted; but every attempt to woo her back to society was made in vain. True, the poisoned arrow which had so long rankled in her heart was withdrawn—but the wound remained. The only pleasure she appeared to experience, was in the society of our hero and Ellen. She would sit with them for hours, planning bright schemes for their future happiness. At times she almost forgot her own bereavements in the contemplation of their felicity.

Dr. Orme had consulted the most eminent members of the bar, as to the steps necessary to be pursued in order to establish his legal right of guardianship to the person of the orphan. All agreed that the first step must be to conform to the previous order of the Chancellor, and restore her to Colonel Mowbray. The next, to petition for a hearing of the case.

It was in vain that the worthy rector urged her uncle's will, and the infamous manner in which the trust had been abused. The gentlemen of the long robe shook their heads, and advised him to submit. They did not know the quiet but determined character of their client: who resolved, rather than Ellen should even for an hour return to the house of the colonel, to unite her in marriage himself with his adopted son, and send them both abroad till the majority of the heiress should release her from all future persecution on the subject.

"He can but imprison me for contempt!" argued the rector. "So that they are happy, I care but little what can happen to myself."

With this heroic resolution, on the morning of the day preceding the one on which Ellen and himself were to appear before the Chancellor, the speaker directed his steps towards Devonshire House, where the orphan and the widow of Sir William were both on a visit to the warm-hearted dowager. He had already made himself an especial favourite with her grace, and was determined to ask her opinion, before he definitely decided on the step he meditated.

He found the ladies in the drawing-room of the duchess, and Henry Ashton with them. Her son-in-law, the duke, who had lately come into possession of his immense estates and the accumulations of his minority, was a year or two older than our hero. Even royalty bowed to the prestige of his colossal fortune: he was a frequent guest at Carlton House, where play was carried on to a great extent. The garter which his grace ultimately obtained, would have been amply paid for, even though George IV. had given him the collar and jewel in diamonds.

Ellen involuntarily drew closer to the side of her lover, when she saw the expression of grief and disappointment in the face of Dr. Orme: instinctively she guessed the cause.

"Alas!" she murmured, "our trials are not over yet!"

"Have you seen the lawyers?" inquired the duchess.

"I have, your grace," replied the rector; "and although they entertain no doubt that the Chancellor will ultimately reverse his decree, and confirm the will of my lamented friend, appointing me the guardian of his niece, they are equally of opinion that for a few days, at least, she must submit to the authority of Colonel Mowbray."

"Not for an instant," said our hero, passionately, "shall Ellen be again exposed to the machinations of that bold, bad man, and his yet more artful wife—my heart would rather consume in its own impatience! Is this the boasted justice of England?" he added; "that their dearest rights must be violated to maintain an idle form—an empty dignity! The Chancellor must hear reason!"

"He will listen only to law and precedent," observed his aged friend; "every thought, action, and feeling of his life is regulated by them! The fixity of his ideas is only to be equalled by the obstinacy of his temper: he ought to have been chancellor to the Medes and Persians," he added, bitterly; "where the laws were as unchangeable as himself! I see but one way of avoiding the painful effect of his decree."

"There is a way, then?" exclaimed Henry Ashton, eagerly. "Bless you, my dear sir—bless you—for those few words: they have removed a weight of agony from my heart!"

The orphan looked towards the venerable rector, and smiled: the transition from terror to hope on her pale countenance was like a cloud passing from the face of nature, or a sunbeam suddenly falling on a gloomy picture. Little did she divine the means proposed. His explanation covered her cheeks with blue hes, and added a fresh charm to her beauty.

"Ellen," said the old man, taking her kindly by the hand, "I am sure you will not for an instant suppose me capable of giving the sanction of my character and sacred office to a step which propriety or female delicacy opposed. It is impossible that you should return to the protection of Colonel Mowbray. I feel that every risk ought to be encountered rather than that! Give Henry, then, a husband's right to protect you—I will myself perform the ceremony. Lady Mowbray and the duchess will no doubt sanction it with their presence. The instant it is concluded," he added, "you must both start for the continent, and remain abroad till of age—when the authority of the Chancellor will cease."

The instant our hero heard the word "marriage," he fell upon his knees, and passionately and eloquently implored the orphan to listen to the counsel of her guardian—confirm his happiness, and place a barrier between it and the plottings of her uncle and the unprincipled woman who bore his name.

Poor Ellen was bewildered: her heart secretly responded to his prayer; but that instinctive delicacy which is the best safeguard of the sex, whispered to her that the world might condemn her precipitation.

"No—no!" she murmured; "it is not thus we ought to unite our destiny!"

The appeal of her lover became more earnest. He promised to be all that a devoted affection and gratitude for the sacrifice could inspire; painted in colours vivid and terrible the character of Colonel Mowbray and his lady—whose past conduct proved how little scrupulous they would prove for the future.

It is hard—very hard—to resist the prayers of those we love, especially when the pleadings of our own heart second the supplications. Ellen turned towards her aunt, and, hiding her blushes in her arms, whispered:

"Decide for me—I cannot speak!"

"I must decide for you," said the duchess, smiling; "the resource which the rector proposes is a resource—but it must be the last! Do not interrupt me," she added, turning to our hero, who looked at her reproachfully. "I know beforehand all that you can say—all that you would urge—but I repeat my opinion: if this hasty marriage can be avoided, it ought to be. We are not now in Italy, but in sober, proper England—where Ellen, from her name and fortune, must one day hold no undistinguished place in society: let us respect even its prejudices—harsh as they may seem, they are sometimes the safeguard to virtue."

"Duchess—duchess!" exclaimed Henry Ashton, "you have destroyed my happiness!"

"Not so," replied her grace, good-humouredly; "perhaps I have only postponed it! Patience is a quality which your sex so seldom exercise voluntarily, that it does them a positive service to impose it. Remember, I do not positively disapprove of this hasty marriage; I only say that it must not take place till every other means have failed; but Lady Mowbray has not yet tried what her influence can do to serve you!"

"My influence," repeated the widow, with a sigh; "alas! what can my influence effect?"

"Much," answered her grace, "if you choose to exert it. Previous to your marriage, you were lady of honour to her majesty?"

"True."

"Who, since your return to England, and the exposure of the infamous plot of which you were the victim, has graciously expressed not only her sympathy but willingness to receive you. I will accompany you to Buckingham House," added the speaker, "demand an audience—which, as a peeress of England, I am entitled to—present you to her majesty—solicit her interference—private, of course—with this odious Chancellor. Should she graciously promise it, rely upon it his lordship, with all his slavish love of precedent, law, and etiquette, will not venture to refuse her request."

"But should her majesty refuse?"

"In that case," replied the duchess, "I will use what little influence I possess over the mind of my young friend to accede to the project of the rector."

It required all the strong affection which Lady Mowbray felt for her orphan niece, and the interest she entertained for the happiness of Henry Ashton, to reconcile her to the extraordinary step of appearing once more in the presence of majesty. Her long seclusion from the world had made her both timid and nervous. She at last, however, assented—to the satisfaction of our hero, who, despite his ardent passion for Ellen, and natural impatience to call her his, was yet too generous and right-minded not to see the propriety of the alternative which the duchess proposed.

The rector and his adopted son shortly after took their leave; but not till the latter had whispered in the ear of the blushing girl his thanks for the implied promise she had given of accepting his hand at once, should circumstances render such a step necessary, to avoid the hated authority of her unnatural relative.

At the period of which we write, the unpopularity of the Prince Regent was at its height. The heartless egotist had disgusted the moral, and, we may add, the national feeling of England, by his unmanly persecution of his unhappy wife. The aged queen, his mother, shared in the odium, from the decided part she had taken against her daughter-in-law.

Charlotte of Mecklenburg, queen of George III., was one of those persons whose virtues and vices were of a negative, rather than a positive character. During the time she occupied the throne, the court became purified from the gross immoralities which disgraced the two previous reigns. It is a well-known fact, that she refused to receive the Margravine of Anspach at the drawing-room, although requested to do so by the king—on the suspicion of that lady having, whilst Lady Craven, lived with his serene highness as his mistress. Parliament, on the declared insanity of her husband, appointed her to the guardianship of his person; and, to her credit be it spoken, she seldom or ever interfered in politics. Her chief pleasure was to save money, which she regularly remitted to her poor relations in Germany. By the nobility of England she was respected, but not liked; by the people her majesty was both respected and hated.

"There has been a drawing-room to-day, I perceive," observed Dr. Orme to our hero, as he passed down Constitution Hill, after leaving Devonshire House; "see how the park is thronged."

At any other time his companion would have been amused at the crowd of splendid equipages and groups of pedestrians assembled in the park. Many of the latter expressed their disapproval of the policy of the government of the day in no very measured terms, and hissed or applauded the various political personages as they passed, according to their adherence or opposition to the measures of the cabinet. Lords Sidmouth and Castlereagh came in for the most virulent demonstrations of public feeling. The former bore it with easy indifference, scarcely appearing to notice it; the latter, less master of his feelings, perhaps, with anger and ill-disguised contempt.

The garden-gate of St. James's opened, and a party of the yeomen of the guard appeared, bearing a sedan-chair, surmounted by the crown. It was followed by the gentlemen of the household of her majesty, who was returning from the drawing-room to Buckingham House: not the paltry gawgaw of the present day—but the plain, old-fashioned brick building, which George III. purchased as a residence for his queen, and afterwards sold to the nation—making a profit of thirty thousand pounds by the transaction.

There was a cry of "The queen—the queen!" from the mob, many of whom began to hiss, and press round the chair.

"Gracious heavens!" exclaimed the rector, "it is her majesty! See, the people are insulting her!"

"Hoo, snuffly! who killed the princess?" roared several of the most daring of the crowd—for an idea generally prevailed amongst the lower orders, that the lamented heiress of the crown had been poisoned, and that her grandmother was no stranger to the transaction.

The mob are generally most credulous where the horrible and improbable are concerned. There are few things too monstrous for their gullibility to swallow.

A stone was thrown, which struck the gilded crown on the top of the sedan-chair. There were one or two cries of "Shame—shame!" from the few respectable persons who were present; but their protestations against the outrage were drowned in the storm of yells and hisses which followed.

No sooner did Henry Ashton perceive that the queen was really in danger, than he left the side of his companion, and made his way through the dense crowd, which began seriously to impede the progress of the bearers. By dint of great exertion, he reached the side of the chair: as he did so, a second stone struck him upon the temple, and inflicted a cut not sufficiently deep to deprive him of his senses or self-possession, although it caused the blood to trickle down his indignant, animated features.

"Shame!" he said. "I blush to believe that you are Englishmen! Is this the way you treat an illustrious, aged lady, whose life has been a pattern to the mothers and daughters of England?"

"Listen to the aristocrat!" cried one.

"Down with him!" roared several others.

To the astonishment of the mob, the yeomen of the guard, who were carrying the sedan, stopped—and her majesty, letting down the glass, showed herself to them distinctly. Her countenance was pale, but firm: it was perhaps the only occasion, during her long life, on which Queen Charlotte displayed both courage and dignity.

"Why do you insult me?" she demanded. "I am more than seventy years old, and for upwards of fifty years have been Queen of England! What action of my life has merited such treatment?"

Again the cry of "Shame!" was renewed. The few respectable persons present, taking courage from the firm tone of the aged speaker, began to gather round the chair.

A cry was raised that the Guards were coming, and the most violent of the mob, as is usual with them in such cases, immediately took to their heels.

Many noblemen, officers, and gentlemen returning from the drawing-room, alighted from their carriages, and, drawing their swords, joined themselves to the escort of her majesty, whom they accompanied to Buckingham House.

We can assure our readers that the outrage we have described is not the mere imagination of the writer: it really occurred on the occasion and in the manner narrated. We have given the words of Queen Charlotte literally, without exaggeration or addition.

On alighting from her chair, her majesty returned her thanks to those who had voluntarily formed themselves into an escort for her protection, and, taking the arm of her vice-chamberlain, who was in waiting to receive her, began slowly to ascend the great staircase; when, suddenly recollecting herself, she stopped, and directed one of the officers of her household to ask the name of her defender, and express a hope on her behalf that he was not seriously hurt.

"My name is Henry Ashton," replied our hero.

"A gentlemen?" demanded the messenger—who, like most of the attendants of the old queen, was a German.

The reply was made by giving the querist his card, on which—in addition to his name, "Attaché to the British Legation at Naples" was written.

"Ah! very well!" exclaimed the officer, after slowly reading it; "I am glad you do not peloug to de horrid peoples! Mine Got! to tink dey should insult a queen, and not shoot dem—rascal traitors!"

Henry was too little of a courtier and too much of an Englishman to coincide with the surprise of the speaker: he therefore bade him good morning, and returned to the park, to seek for the worthy rector, whom he fortunately encountered close to the palace.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed his anxious friend, "you are hurt!"

"A scratch—I scarcely feel it! Nothing more, believe me!"

"How did it occur?"

His protégé related everything that had taken place. The rector thought the affair of sufficient importance to be instantly communicated to the duchess—who, with that ready tact which distinguished her, saw in an instant how it might be turned to the advantage of the lovers.

No sooner did the Prince Regent hear of the outrage which had been offered to his mother, than he commanded a strong detachment of the Foot Guards to take up their quarters at Buckingham House, where many of the ministers and nobility called to express their indignation and abhorrence at the insult offered to the wife of their sovereign. Amongst the latter, the Duchess of Devonshire and Lady Mowbray. From the high rank of the former, they were at once admitted to the presence of her majesty.

"Ah, Lady Mowbray!" said the queen; "we are happy once more to see you, and assure you of our sympathy at your unmerited sufferings! Should we live to hold another drawing-room," she added, "it will afford us pleasure, by seeing you publicly, to express our feelings towards you!"

Although the august speaker listened with patience to the tale of the duchess—for she was a great lover of gossip—she was too much ruffled with the adventure of the day to promise the slightest interference on behalf of the lovers.

"I can do nothing," she said, relapsing into her usual broken English—which she did when her style became conversational, or she was very much out of temper. "My Lord Liverpool has just left me, and he says that government can do nothing—absolutely nothing—unless dey catch de ruffian dat threw de stones at my chair!"

"Perhaps the lover of Miss De Vere," observed her grace, "can point out the man."

"Who?" demanded her majesty, sharply.

"The lover of Miss De Vere," repeated the duchess; "the gentleman who had the happiness of being of some slight service to your majesty, and was wounded by one of the mob!"

"His name, duchess—his name?"

"Mr. Henry Ashton!"

"Ah, yes! dat is his name!" replied the aged queen; "and he, you say, is de young gentleman you speak of! Well—well! he shall find dat I am not ungrateful: I will speak to de Lord Chancellor!"

At this moment a page entered the royal closet to announce that the first law officer of the crown had arrived at Buckingham House, and requested permission to offer his respects to her majesty.

"I will see him in de green drawing-room. Remain here, duchess," she added, as she rose from her seat to leave the apartment; "I will not detain you long."

Contrary to her promise, nearly an hour elapsed before her majesty made her re-appearance. When she did so, both the ladies observed that her countenance was red with anger: knowing the obstinacy of the Chancellor, they feared that even her intercession had failed to shake his resolution—they were mistaken: with all his firmness, Queen Charlotte was the more obstinate of the two.

"Has your majesty succeeded?" anxiously and respectfully inquired Lady Mowbray.

"Succeed! humph!" muttered the queen; "de Chancellor is as stupid as my Lord Liverpool! He talk of contempt of Chancery—precedent! And when I ask for punishment for de man who insult me, he shrug his shoulders, and say: 'Government can do nothing but what de laws permit!'"

"Is it possible!" exclaimed the duchess—who, with infinite tact, displayed more indignation at the indifference, as she expressed it, of the great law officer of the crown to the outrage offered to her majesty, than anxiety on the subject of her request.

"It is true," continued the aged speaker; "but I did not forget your friends. You may tell de gentleman, from me, not to fear. Your niece," she added, addressing Lady Mowbray, "will not return to her bad uncle!"

The widow of Sir William knelt and kissed the withered hand graciously extended towards her.

"You may tank me," resumed the queen; "for I had to be fery sharp with him! It was not till I threatened to give de young lady an appointment in my household—which I know he want for Lady Munton—dat he promise me. De best ting he could do!" added the august speaker, with a smile; "for, once in my service, even my Lord Eldon would pause before he venture to take her from my protection. Dere is no precedent for it!"

Here she laughed heartily at the idea of having checkmated the Chancellor at his own game of precedent and authority.

On the following morning, when Ellen, accompanied by her grace, Dr. Orme, and our hero, appeared before his lordship, to the surprise of the court and mortification of Colonel Mowbray, instead of ordering, as a preliminary, that the heiress should purge herself of the contempt she had incurred, and return to the guardianship of her uncle, he entered at once into the merits of the case. Never had he been known to take so little time in coming to a decision. It was, that—for the present at least—the orphan was to remain under the joint guardianship of the rector and the Dowager Lady Mowbray: both of whom, by the terms of the decree, were prohibited from giving their consent to the marriage of their ward, until the validity of the will of the late baronet had been decided in a court of law—or his sanction to such an arrangement should be obtained.

All but Henry and Colonel Mowbray were delighted at the decision. The former saw the bliss he anticipated suddenly postponed to an indefinite period—months—perhaps years; the latter foresaw the exposure and shame which awaited him at the trial of the cause.

"Could I obtain that fatal letter to the Abbate Lucas," he thought, as he left the court, "I might defy them still!"

CHAPTER CXXIII.

There is no friendship 'twixt dishonest minds.

OLD PLAY.

DESPITE the warnings of her more experienced mother, Mrs. George Herbert had not abandoned the idea of exciting the jealousy of her husband, and testing his affection towards her, by pretending to elope with his friend Major Mottram, whose manner and conversation were so kind, yet passionless, that the imprudent wife placed the most unlimited faith in his friendship and honour. Had the word "love" once escaped his lips, she would have taken the alarm. But no; the cold-blooded, calculating man of the world was too careful to endanger the success of a scheme which was to put twenty thousand pounds into his pocket.

The fact was that Isabel, like many a young wife and girl, was the victim of her own imagination. Romance had painted to her the alarm and agony of her repentant husband. How delightful it would be to see him once more at her feet; listen to his vows of affection, his protestations for the future, and to confess the little episode she and the major had invented to reclaim him.

Still her heart failed her when the hour arrived to put the plan of the major into execution. Something whispered to her that she was risking her future happiness, and treading upon dangerous ground. Had her adviser displayed the least impatience or disappointment, even at the last moment she had been saved.

On the contrary, he merely laughed at her irresolution; and observed how Herbert would rally her on his return.

"What!" said his dupe, "have you sent the letter?"

"Of course I have, my dear Mrs. Herbert," was the reply; "a most eloquent one, in which I inform him that, moved by the deep interest I feel in your happiness, and shocked at his unworthy conduct towards you, I have prevailed upon you to exchange the protection of his roof for that of mine."

The last consideration decided her. The idea of her feelings being made the sport of her husband, on his return, should he find that she had failed to put her resolution into practice, was galling to her pride—and she entered the carriage with her friend.

"You are sure George will know where to overtake us?" she said.

"Certain; I gave my valet every instruction," answered the gentleman; "he cannot miss us!"

"He will be terribly angry!" added the lady, who began to feel a vague sense of the imprudence of the step she had taken.

"At first, doubtless!" replied the major, carelessly; as if he felt the most assured conviction that all would end as she imagined; "but the warning, when he learns the truth, will not be lost!"

"Heaven grant it!" sighed the unhappy wife.

"And you must forgive him!" continued the artful villain, who had so cleverly plotted, as he fancied, to destroy the happiness and reputation of a defenceless woman—and for what? For gold—for the means of gratifying his luxurious tastes and habits; plotted it coldly and remorselessly. Unfortunately there are but too many such men in the world.

"Oh, yes!" replied Isabel, with a faint smile; "I will forgive him!"

"But not too soon—try him a little first!"

During this time the carriage continued to roll towards London.

George Herbert was seated in the club-room of the Guards, chatting with several of the officers, when a letter was put into his hands: he read it, and tried to turn pale. It was the one written by Mottram, but very differently worded from the description he had given to his victim: such a letter might not have answered their purpose.

It commenced by declaring, in the most unmistakable language, that, having wronged his friend Captain Herbert in the tenderest part, he could no longer accept his hospitality, and concluded by an announcement that he had withdrawn Mrs. Herbert from his protection.

"Anything the matter, George?" demanded one of the group with whom he had been conversing.

The bereaved husband groaned, and kept up his assumed despair so far as to strike his forehead with his clenched hand. The Guardsmen were astonished: such a circumstance as any display of feeling was most unusual amongst them.

"Poor fellow," whispered one, "he is mad!"

"Or his uncle married!" added a second.

"Read, Ilford—read!" exclaimed the captain, throwing himself into a seat. "I am distracted—advise me how to act!"

"Shoot the fellow, of course!" drawled the young nobleman to whom the appeal was made. "An impertinent scoundrel—a fellow from the line—to take such a freedom with one of our regiment! If you require a friend," he added, "dispose of me!"

Herbert pressed his hand.

"We must pursue the fellow at once!" added his lordship.

"Instantly!"

"What route do you imagine he has taken?"

"To Dover, doubtless!"

An hour later, Captain Herbert, accompanied by Lord Ilford and the honourable Cornet Graham, drove from the club-house of the Guards, in the travelling carriage of the peer, as fast as four post-horses could convey them. The window of the reading-room was crowded with Guardsmen to watch their departure.

"What is up?" coolly inquired one of the gentlemen.

"A bet?" demanded another.

"That fellow Mottram," replied one who was better informed than the rest, "has run away with Herbert's wife. A sad affair, after the ridiculous sacrifice he made, too, in marrying her: cost him his uncle's fortune, and compelled him to sell out."

Several present thought it quite as well that he had sold out.

"I am not in the least surprised," observed a lieutenant-colonel of the Blues, who was present. "What can be expected of men who associate with persons from the line?"

"Of course Herbert will shoot him?"

"Possibly!" observed the first speaker; "and yet, after all, it is but the choice of two evils: it will be almost as ridiculous to shoot the fellow as to let it alone."

Here the conversation dropped; the subject was exhausted: the Guards never approving of anything which created a sensation.

"By Jupiter!" observed Major Mottram, looking from the back window of the carriage, as it rolled along the high and pleasant road to Dover; "but George is on our track!"

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed Isabel, who began bitterly to regret the step she had taken.

"Shall we proceed?"

"No—no! stop here at once, and explain all!"

"You must permit me to do that," replied the major; "a few words will pacify your husband's anger, and I shall bring him repentant to your feet."

Calling to the postillions, he directed them to draw up by the side of the road: the fellows looked surprised. They expected, on the contrary, to have been directed to proceed at their quickest pace.

"A rum cove, that, Jem!" whispered one.

"Pluck to the backbone!" said the other.

The carriage, with the pursuing party, at last drove up, and stopped within a few paces of the major's. True to the character he had undertaken, he advanced with a bold front towards Captain Herbert, whose countenance appeared distorted with passion.

"Pon my soul," thought his confederate, "but he does it admirably! I never gave him credit before for being such a capital actor!"

"I guess your purpose, Captain Herbert," he said, aloud; "and will not disappoint you! We had better withdraw to some more retired spot: there is a lady in the carriage, whose feelings we would both spare."

"Major Mottram will address himself to me!" hissed his lordship. "I act in this affair as the friend of Captain Herbert."

The preliminaries were soon arranged. The case of pistols was removed from the carriage of the speaker, and the entire party directed their steps towards a little wood at the end of a field by the road-side. It was settled that the honourable Cornet Graham, who in years was a mere boy, should act as second to Mottram.

The seconds examined the pistols.

"Of course you will hit him?" whispered Lord Ilford to the captain, who had already taken his ground.

"I'll try!" was the answer, accompanied by a bitter smile.

"Are you quite ready, Mottram?" demanded Graham, with an air of the most business-like importance.

"Quite!" replied the major, confident in the arrangement between himself and Herbert. "It is not my intention to fire," he added. "Poor George! I have wronged him sufficiently already!"

"Very proper, major!"

"I shall stand and receive his fire as long as he wishes," continued the coward, who rejoiced in the opportunity of securely acting the man of courage. "If I fall, I can trust to your gallantry that no insult shall be offered to the lady!"

"Certainly not. Ilford or I will take care of her."

Isabel no sooner saw the gentlemen quit the highroad, and direct their way over the fields, than her courage failed her. All the consequences of the imprudent step she had taken rushed upon her mind. Instead of seeing her husband penitent, as she anticipated, at her feet, he was engaged in a duel with his best friend—for such she still considered the major.

Springing from the carriage, she hastened to follow them, determined to explain everything, and endure the just ridicule and anger of her husband for her share in the transaction.

"George—George!" she exclaimed, as she approached the ground where the gentlemen—each confident in the result—stood awaiting the signal to fire; "only hear me!"

He did hear her, and looked immediately towards his lordship, who—with his handkerchief in his hand, ready to give the signal—stood equidistant from himself and Mottram.

"I can explain everything!" shrieked the agonised wife.

"Too late!" thought the major, with a triumphant smile.

"Too late!" mentally repeated her husband. The signal was given, and both parties fired. Mottram—as he had promised—in the air; but somehow or other—~~was~~ presume accidentally—the bullet of Captain Herbert whistled through the brain of his confederate—that busy brain which had so lately plotted the misery of a fellow-creature.

"Is he dead?" demanded the successful duellist of Cornet Graham, who looked very pale. Poor fellow! it was his first affair of honour!

"Quite dead!" he replied.

"Then I am satisfied."

"George! what have you done?" demanded his wife, who, pale and breathless, approached the spot. "Murdered your best friend!"

The captain coolly bowed, and, taking the arm of his second, left the ground.

Then it was that all the horror of her position broke upon the mind of Isabel.

(To be continued in our next.)

GIVE ME THE NIGHT.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

GIVE me the Night, love, the beautiful Night!
When the stars in the heavens are glittering bright;
When the flowers are asleep on their pillow of leaves,
And no murmur is near, save the sigh the heart heaves:
When the spirit of tenderness hallows each scene,
And Memory turns fondly to days that have been,
When the valley's sweet waters reflect the moonlight,—
Oh! give me the Night, love, the beautiful Night!

GIVE me the Night, be it starless and long,
When the gay hall is sounding with music and song,—
When the genius of poetry breathes her deep power!
And, oh! Love itself is more lovely that hour,—
When the dark curls of beauty more gracefully shine,
And the eyes bright by day are at evening divine!—
When all is enchantment that blesses the sight;—
Oh! give me the Night, love, the beautiful Night!

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

THERE must be truth in the assertion that we all must die—for Madame la Comtesse De Lagny is dead at last—and certainly if there had been an exception to the rule it would have been made in her favour. She herself was wont to declare, till the very hour of her death, that she saw no reason, because everybody had been called away, that everybody should be summoned—and so went on amusing herself, laughing and meandering to the very end. She was ninety-six, and yet stood in her shop till within a few hours of her decease—for Madame la Comtesse De Lagny, after ninety-six years' experience of the world's bitterness, declared there was no state like that of a small boutiquier for insouciance and real enjoyment of liberty and happiness. She loved to tell her story to her customers. It is one of the most curious ever played out by any of the poor players summoned to act their part on the world's stage.

In her youth she was called la belle marinière, from the father's trade—that of salt merchant to the royal household. You will find her name sung by the very first poets of the day, and can behold her portrait at Versailles in the famous picture Etats Généraux. Notwithstanding her beauty, which brought her many lovers, she remained unwedded until past the usual age. She loved her independence, and looked forward to the prospect of keeping the salt shop, as the greatest happiness fate had power to bestow.

She was one day standing at the door of the shop, when a rush of people flying in all directions alarmed her so much as to cause her to close the shutters immediately, and while she was on the outside, a charge of cavalry passed by at full gallop, cutting away at the crowd right and left, without mercy. It was the Prince de Lambesc; at the head of his regiment of Royal Allemand, pursuing the harmless promenaders, and unconsciously commencing the great French revolution!

The belle marinière fled back into the shop, barred and bolted it within, and then discovered a stranger lying upon the blocks of salt with which the place was filled, bleeding in torrents from a wound in his head. It was a young officer of Lambesc's regiment, who had fallen from his horse just at the threshold, having been beaten down by an iron bar from the hand of the blacksmith next door. The belle marinière was wise enough not to seek assistance—she nursed the young man in secrecy, and hid him through all the storms and threats which the suspicion of concealment created amongst her neighbours.

She married him some years afterwards, and shone as the most devoted and high-souled amongst the émigrées at Brunswick. At the Restoration she was installed in the estates of the family, and when her husband died she gave them up to his brother's child. The civil list of Charles X. was providing for her in comfort, sufficient for her modest pretensions, which never sought anything beyond the happiness of others, when the Revolution of 1830 left her without the means of living; and old as she was, she obtained no help from those who had surrounded her in prosperity.

So, finding she was not expected to maintain any aristocratic rank, she turned once more to her old associations, and again returned to her salt-shop, where she succeeded so well that she lived in affluence for the last twenty years, and has left a small and comfortable fortune to her husband's grand nephew, whose property has been completely dilapidated by political vicissitudes.

[THE ENCAMPMENT ON CHOBHAM COMMON.]

THE CAMP AT CHOBHAM.

EXACTLY half a century ago, King George III. used to "drop in" upon the camp at Chobham, in a quiet way, just to see how things were going on. His visit did not create much commotion, for the men were accustomed to his homely ways; and, it must be confessed, rather liked the fatherly-looking old king. Sometimes he was accompanied by Queen Charlotte or one of his corpulent sons, but never by the Prince of Wales or one of his ministers.

On review days, Pitt stole a day from the toils of business, and showed his haggard countenance on the common. Sometimes Fox and Sheridan, in the train of the prince, were there, and, it may safely be assumed, were not particular at what mess they discussed the merits of a bottle of wine; and it is even said—at least so saith the babbling dame, Tradition—that staid Quaker, Gurney, would sometimes be seen on one of the eminences that surround the common, looking down upon the proceedings below with grim delight. But the most frequent visitors to the camp were fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters. They were sunburnt, dusty, and fatigued; for they had walked all the way from London, and some of them had come even from the midland and northern counties. Their errand was sanctified by love—for, as in those stirring days the artillery of Napoleon incessantly roared throughout Europe, those they came to see they might never see more.

The camp was composed chiefly of recruits and militiamen. The latter, harassed by long marches, were brought to Chobham to be drilled into a laudable desire to enlist into one of his majesty's regiments of the line. The press-gang recruited the navy, the militia the army. And whenever a regiment left Chobham, it was for the majority a farewell to England and home: therefore was it that the embraces and partings on that common, half a century ago, were peculiarly sad and tearful.

How different is the aspect of this day. Then England was engaged in one of the most stupendous contests in which a country was ever involved. Single-handed she fought with the Colossus of modern times, with the resources in men and material of all Europe at his command. But England had the empire of the sea. That alone rendered her invincible, and able to pour small armies on points where she considered Napoleon was the most vulnerable. So that as George III., and the princes of the royal blood, and the ministers, and celebrities, and pale-faced fathers, and sobbing mothers, passed through the camp of Chobham, in 1803, they saw before them, and cheered and coaxed, the men who were to go forth to perish amid the swamps of Holland, and die on the burning plains of India, shiver amid the snows of America, and in Spain and Portugal teach the French that the descendants of the heroes of Cressy and Agincourt had still hearts that could beat wildly to the hot thrill of battle, and eyes that could kindle, and muscles that hardened when the trumpeter sounded the charge. On sea and land England was gloriously represented by her sons. But it should never be forgotten that the "unreturning brave" of Corunna, Salamanca, Vittoria, Badajoz, San Sebastian, the Pyrenees, Toulouse, and Waterloo, were mostly young men, who had been dragged or coaxed from the plough-tail, through the agency of the ballot and the militia.

Happily for England and the world, this valiant spirit—the inheritance of a thousand years of national existence—still survives; and those living—alas! how few—who remember how George III. was delighted with his heavy Staffordshire Blues, his tall, muscular north-countrymen, his "bonnets of blue"—braw lads from the hills of Caledonia—and his mad-cap, cup and lass-loving Connaught Rangers, can earnestly affirm, that in man, discipline, and courage, the British army can still present a brilliant, undaunted front to the enemy. It has rather improved than degenerated, and this has been amply proved by rough, hard, and sanguinary service in India; and the material in its perfection may now be seen encamped on that same Chobham Common, which fifty years ago was visited only by the royal, noble, and wealthy, and those who were richer still—for they had hearts that throbbed for sons and brothers, and eyes unused to flow that did flow unabashed and unchecked amid the heather that surrounded that wild encampment.

After the lapse of fifty years, British troops are again encamped on Chobham Common. But what a difference between the periods! Then, all was warlike and rude; the times were savage and brutal. Now, peace has put forth her heavenly blossoms, and the song of industry rings through the world like a hymn pealed by immortal voices. The soul of man is richer, and has gained higher attributes. It soars loftier, and takes more sweeping flights. But, amid all the magnificence of peace, the hoarse murmur of war comes upon the senses like the mutterings of thunder broken by the between and far-off hills. War is still a necessity. It still engages the hopes and chivalry of the strongest and most lion-hearted men; and women, whose cheeks turn pale when the newspapers announce a victory in India or Burmah, look upon a soldier, with his squared shoulders, erect head, and disciplined audacity of manner, as the very type and model of a man. It will be so, until we have a new dispensation. It is natural that it should be so—for it is "only the brave who deserve the fair," so let us accept the institution as one we cannot do without, and regard it as a very excellent and useful portion of the machinery of society. The army keeps the peace, because it is able to enforce the observance of peace. Sentimentalists may exhort; but while they are exhorting, people are tearing each other to pieces; and in the mêlée stray bullets may find a way into the pious bosoms of peace-mongers.

War, then, open or disguised, in the present state of society cannot be avoided; and we think the crown and responsible executive of this country act wisely in endeavouring to make the British army as efficient as rigid discipline and experience of some of the vicissitudes of soldier-life can make it. All the continental powers accustom their troops to camp exercises, and miniature campaigns; and for the first time since famed Waterloo, England has followed their example. About ten thousand soldiers of all branches of the service are this summer encamped on Chobham Common—a rough, uneven plain, about four miles from the Chertsey station, on the London and South-Western Railway. They were marched into camp in one day, and about the same hour.

The force assembled comprises four regiments of Cavalry, three battalions of Guards, two brigades of Infantry, each comprising three regiments; one troop of Royal Horse Artillery, three batteries of Horse Artillery, a company of Sappers, and a Pontoon train. The cavalry is composed of the 1st Life Guards, the 6th Dragoon Guards, the 13th Light Dragoons, and the 17th Lancers, commanded by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. Colonel Henry Bentinck commands the battalions of Grenadier, Coldstream, and Scots Fusilier Guards. Sir De Lacy Evans commands the 1st Infantry Brigade, which consists of the 38th, the 93rd, and the 2nd battalion of the Rifle Brigade. Major-General Fane commands the 42nd, the 50th, and the 95th, forming the 2nd Infantry Brigade. Lieutenant-Colonel Bloomfield commands the Royal Artillery, Lieutenant-Colonel Vicars the Sappers and Miners, and Colonel H. D. Jones the Pontoon train. The entire division is under the command of Lord Seaton; Lieutenant-Colonel B. Wood being Assistant-Adjutant-General, and Colonel Torrens Assistant-Quartermaster-General. Thus it will be seen that a force has been brought together, completely appointed in all respects, more considerable in strength than has for many years been assembled in this country, and representing every arm of the service. Cavalry, infantry, and artillery will each have their efficiency and discipline tested, separately and in combination.

The line formed by the whole encampment is that of an extensive, irregular semicircle. The centre is occupied by the second infantry brigade, under Major-General Mildmay Fane, and consists of the 42nd Highlanders, and the 50th and 95th. The right centre is formed of the first infantry brigade, under the command of Major-General Sir De Lacy Evans, M. P., which is composed of the 38th, 93rd Highlanders, and the 2nd battalion of the Rifle Brigade. The left centre is formed of the brigade of the Guards, consisting of the 1st battalion or the Coldstreams, 1st battalion Scots Fusiliers—which, as the younger regiment, occupies the central position in the brigade—and 1st battalion of Grenadiers. Joining the flank of the right centre are the head-quarters. The right wing of the army consists at present exclusively of cavalry. The 1st Life Guards are posted on the extreme right, and next to them are the 13th Light Dragoons, then the 17th Lancers, and the 6th Dragoon Guards, or Carabiniers. The left wing is formed of one company of Sappers and Miners, one troop of Horse Artillery, and three batteries of Royal Artillery. The tents of the infantry are pitched by companies in columns six deep, and to the rear of these are the officers' and field officers' tents, canteens, kitchens, mess-rooms, and hospitals. In the arrangements of the cavalry, the stables—of which there is one for each troop—are placed three deep, and occupy the front; the men's tents, formed in column, are placed on the flanks of the stables. At the rear of the stables is a line of troop officers' tents; behind these, and in the centre of the row, are the two for the field officers, having upon each side those of the staff officers. The mess tents and kitchens are the rearmost. In the front of each regiment are advanced tents for the quarter-guard, and in the rear for the rear-guard, from which lines of sentries are thrown round each encampment.

To provide for such a vast body of men, besides a large contingent of camp followers brought together in a moment, taxed the resources of the commissariat department rather severely. As for the dwelling accommodation, of course it was only tents that could be provided; and on the 14th of June, Canvas Town—the name given to the encampment by the troops—rose on the common, just like a field of gigantic mushrooms, but in regular order. Our illustration was taken from one of the eminences that surround the common, and afford spectators an admirable view of the military experiences of an army fit—as “the Duke” would have said—“to go anywhere and do anything.”

The soldiers had to assist themselves a good deal in their domestic arrangements, but the sappers and miners attended to their sanitary and culinary comforts.

They, with contingents from each regiment, prepared the ground for the purposes of an encampment. They sunk wells, formed reservoirs, erected stables, and made kitchens. These kitchens, constructed by them, are a decided improvement on the old form in use during the Peninsular war, and which some of the regiments, we observe, still practise. They economise fuel, and enable cooking to be carried on more quickly and in larger quantities; but, on the other hand, they are, perhaps, a little more troublesome to construct. The experience and practice of the camp mainly centered on this point—for, of course, when the men came on the ground, after their tents were up, the first thing requisite was to feed them. It must not be supposed that the culinary arts, as practised in the midst of war's alarms, are an uninteresting object of study. Anything more rude and accordant with campaigning it is hardly possible to conceive. A trench is dug, with a short mud chimney at one end; a fire is lighted at the other, and the top of the trench being covered over with turf, pots are stuck down into holes made for them in this covering to boil; this is the Sappers' mode. The earthen kitchen approved of by the existing regulations is a still rougher contrivance; and one's thoughts, in looking at either, naturally revert with satisfaction to sea-coal fires, ranges, ovens, hot-plates, and all the other appliances of modern gastronomy. The Artillery, like the Sappers, are obliged to be able to turn their hands to any sort of work more than the men of the line—and they have given excellent evidence of their expertness.

The dietary arrangements have been settled by the Commissariat Department, and those who may have some curiosity on the subject of a soldier's food, may derive some valuable information from their study. The following are the regulations:

BREAD AND MEAT.

Each soldier is to receive, as his daily allowance, one pound and a half of well-baked bread, of the quality known under the name of “seconds,” and three-quarters of a pound of good, sound, and wholesome meat (either ox or heifer beef, or wether or ewe mutton), for which ration of bread and meat, together, the soldier is chargeable with the cost price, not exceeding 6d. Servants, not being soldiers, in the proportion of two per troop or company, and washerwomen for each troop or company, in the proportion of one to every 20 men, are permitted to receive bread and meat at the cost price, payment for which is to be made by the regimental paymaster at every settlement to the contractor, or to such other person as may be appointed to receive it.

When biscuit or salt meat shall be issued, the daily ration is to consist of 1 lb. of biscuit and 1 lb. of salt meat.

FUEL.

Each soldier is to be allowed a daily ration of 3 lbs. of wood; and, to prevent unnecessary waste, it is to be delivered only for the effectives present on the field.

Servants and batmen, not being soldiers, in the proportion of two to each troop or company, and washerwomen for each troop or company, in the proportion of one to every 20 men, are permitted to draw a daily ration of 3 lbs. of wood. The sick in the regimental hospitals are to be allowed each two daily rations of 3 lbs., if required.

The colonel or commanding officer of a regiment is to be allowed eight daily rations of 3 lbs.; the field-officers, four daily rations each; the paymaster and surgeon each four; the adjutant, quartermaster, assistant-surgeon, and veterinary surgeon, each two; and the officers of each troop or company, eight rations for their own use and the supply of the sutler.

General officers are to draw what wood they may have occasion for, not exceeding 100 rations per day of 3 lbs. each for a general, 70 for a lieutenant-general, 50 for a major-general, and 40 for a brigadier-general.

Coals may be issued at the rate of 1 lb. for 1 lb. of wood, if wood cannot be procured, or if the encampment should be so located as to make it more economical to provide coals.

When coals are issued, camp grates are to be provided in the following proportions: Six for each troop or company. One, or two, if necessary, for the hospital, one for each field-officer in camp, and one for the officers of each troop or company.

Such coal-baskets as are indispensably necessary are also to be provided.

An allowance is to be made for the purpose of kindling fires of 1 lb. of small firewood, or four small turf-sods, for every 30 lbs. of coals issued.

The deliveries of bread, meat, and fuel are to be made at such times, and for such number of days together, as the officers commanding may direct.

STRAW.

Is to be allowed at the rate of one truss of 36 lbs. to each pallasse for two men, being a full bedding; at the expiration of 16 days to be refreshed with half a truss to each pallasse, and at the expiration of 32 days the whole is to be removed, and a fresh bedding of one truss is to be given, and so on every period of 16 and 32 days.

Thirty trusses per troop or company are allowed on first taking the field, for thatching the women's huts.

Regiments not having pallasses are allowed straw at the following rates:

On taking the field two trusses of 36 lbs. each to every five men, at the end of eight days to be refreshed by one truss, and at the end of eight days more to be refreshed again by the same quantity. At the end of 24 days the whole to be removed, and an entire new bedding to be given, and refreshed as before—viz., two trusses for every five men, &c.

Straw is to be allowed for the quarter and rear-guards in proportion to their strength, according to the regulation for men not having pallasses.

Two trusses per troop are to be allowed for batmen or servants, not being soldiers, and three trusses per troop or company for the washerwomen not having pallasses, to be renewed every 16 days.

For the sick in the regimental hospital the straw is to be changed as often as it may be deemed necessary.

The use of mats is recommended in preference to loose straw, and good old straw is the most suitable for mats, and, generally, for camp bedding.

Supposing from 12 to 14 men are placed in each tent, two trusses of 36 lbs. each for every five men, will give to each tent about 100, at 8 lbs. of straw. This will generally be found sufficient to make mats; but, if from the quality of the straw, or other causes, a larger supply in the first instance should be deemed indispensable for this purpose, it is left at the discretion of the officer commanding to direct that an additional quantity should be issued, provided the total quantity supplied for the 24 days does not exceed four trusses of 36 lbs. each for every five men—an allowance which is considered sufficient even during the prevalence of heavy rains; but if the weather should be fine and dry, a less quantity will be required.

Whether mats are used or not, straw not absolutely necessary for the comfort of the men ought not to be drawn, as it causes much litter in the camp.

FORAGE.

The ration is to consist of oats, hay, and straw, in such quantities as may from time to time be fixed by the Secretary at War, and is only to be issued from the magazines for the effective horses actually belonging to and standing at the pickets, or in the stables of the camp, according to returns to be signed upon honour by each individual officer, inserting in his own handwriting the number of effective horses he actually has in camp.

The general officers and staff are to draw forage (strictly upon honour) only for the effective horses they have with them in the field.

The rations for general officers, their aides-de-camp, and staff are not to exceed the number stated in the list annexed, nor for regiments of dragoons that are in list II. In regard to regiments of infantry, the mounted officers in camp receive the ration of forage in kind.

These instructions, or rather regulations, together with our pictorial embellishment, will materially assist our readers in forming a conception of what a camp really is. That it is not a paradise may readily be imagined; but at this season it is not attended with the discomforts that civilians would suppose were attached to camp life. The men declare themselves to be “as jolly as sand-boys;” and it has been remarked that a more orderly and sober set of men were never before collected together. The schoolmaster has been in the army, and heaven bless him for what he has done for it!

Every soldier is a reader, and the day we visited the camp we observed that the weekly newspapers were in active demand, and that the most attractive of the popular periodicals were eagerly sought after. This is extremely gratifying, and to confirm it as a valuable testimony to the good conduct and intelligence of the modern British soldier, we may mention, although perhaps it is unnecessary, that the office of the provost marshal is almost a sinecure.

The interlopers and light-fingered gentry cause him the only annoyances of a serious character to which he is subjected. The troops themselves are unexceptionable in conduct.

Of their appearance we cannot write in terms of too warm commendation. On the days when they are brought out for the purposes of reviews, surprises, sham battles, and all the pomp and circumstance of war, they are really brilliant. The number of soldiers assembled is certainly small, but the men are unsurpassed by any army in the world for size and strength, correct discipline, and material excellence of equipment. Should they ever be employed in actual service—which is extremely probable, for the affairs of the world are drawing to one of those climaxes which necessitate a terrible convulsion, a kind of thunderstorm in the mental and moral atmospheres—their valour, we are assured, and everybody is positive, that it will be as splendid, and their discipline as perfect, as that of the glorious little army which Wellington conducted in triumph and victory from Lisbon to Madrid, and from thence over the Pyrenees to the Bay of Biscay.

THE PARK GATE.

FROM THE FRENCH OF FREDERICK SOTLIE.

ABOUT twenty years since, Monsieur De Leutal was the owner of a fine mansion near Autenil. The fame of his hospitality and good dinners, and the brilliancy of his fêtes and entertainments, were proverbial, and drew together, in one common focus, the élite of the fashionable world. Monsieur De Leutal was a bachelor, and lived with his niece, who did the honours of his house.

Let it be our pleasant task, gentle reader, to introduce to your notice this extraordinary creature—a being so perfect, so ethereal, who appeared scarce to press the earth on which she moved. It is something very refreshing to meet with features such as we have never seen before, whose animated and excessive loveliness would make them appear constantly new; and a mind as yet unblunted and unhackneyed, “like an intellectual kaleidoscope, ever changing, ever brilliant, and beautiful in every change.” She was about eighteen. There was in her manner a kindness and cordiality, united with perfect breeding, enhancing the effects of the latter, like a warm background throws out and gives a tone to the most finished picture. Few faces could better bear minute investigation. Above the middle size, she had all the dignity of height, without its awkwardness. Her features were small, and beautifully chiselled; her eyes were darkly and beautifully blue, and the long, dark fringes that shadowed them gave a Murillo softness to her cheek when she looked down. Her complexion would have been too brilliant, had it not changed as often as the “rose-clouds in an Italian sky.” It varied as though each passing thought reflected its shadow upon her face. Her mouth and teeth would have baffled the imagination of a painter, or the description of a poet; and her smile was bright,

Like some fair lake that the breeze is upon,

When it breaks into dimples, and laughs in the sun!

How lovely she looked when she was singing! As Burke once elegantly expressed it, it gave one the idea of the spirit of music having hid itself in the ambush of a rose and sending out every note perfumed by its leaves.

Such, reader, was Emilie, the ward of Monsieur De Leutal. It was his intention to bestow upon her a rich dower—such as a princess might envy; and at his death she was to become heir to his immense wealth. But to this he had attached one condition: never to encourage the addresses of any suitor unknown to her uncle—and especially those of a military man. It was not that he entertained any prejudice against the profession, but he objected to military men as husbands; and especially in time of war. His late sister, the mother of Emilie, had bestowed her hand upon a colonel of the Imperial Guard, who, three months after his marriage, had fallen on the field of honour, while leading on his division to the charge at the memorable Battle of Aspern. His widow, some months after, died of a broken heart, while giving birth to Emilie, leaving the orphan to the guardianship of Monsieur De Leutal. And well did he perform his task. He devoted upon his ward as if she had been his own child, and determined that her future happiness should not be endangered or disturbed by the casualties of war.

Among the crowd of persons who assiduously frequented the chateau, and courted the society of Mlle. Emilie, was the Count De St. Clair—a gentleman of high lineage, of great intellect and information, who had already acquired a great degree of military reputation, and stood high in the estimation of the Emperor Napoleon.

It is not our purpose to give a minute description of the nature of the passion which the count entertained for this beautiful girl, nor the particulars of the early stage of their reciprocal affections. Let us proceed to relate the occurrence which is so intimately connected with the title of this tale.

One lovely morning, just before the break of day, in the sweet maiden time of the year—the gentle month of May. It was still dark. At one of the angles of the chateau a casement was open—a female stood before it: opposite that window, a few paces distant, was a chee-nut-tree, from the midst of whose wide-spreading foliage a gentleman was seen noiselessly descending, who had been conversing with the lady at the open casement, whose anxious glances followed him to the ground. On beholding him reach it in safety, she made him a tender sign of satisfaction. The count—for it was he—acknowledged the sweet token of adieu, and hastily retired amongst the labyrinth of shrubs and trees that surrounded the chateau. Emilie did not leave the window until she had suffered the necessary time to elapse to enable the count to reach the park gate—she then retired; but whether the hinges of the wicket had creaked on their pivots—whether the gate itself had been closed with less care than usual—or whether it was the cry of a human being, Emilie knew not; it was, however, certain that an unusual noise fell upon her ear: she hastily reopened her casement, and listened once more; but she heard nothing further to excite her alarm; and the deep silence that ensued calmed her apprehension.

The daylight dawned, and at length the hour of breakfast arrived. Emilie descended to the breakfast-parlour, to perform the honours of the table to her guardian and his numerous guests that were sojourning at the chateau; and, as usual, the conversation was gay and lively, the chief topic of discourse being the ball which was to take place that evening, to celebrate the birthday of Emilie.

Every one was prepared to be amiable and agreeable upon so interesting an occasion; when suddenly the gamekeeper, whose name was Raoul, without giving any notice, abruptly rushed into the room, giving vent to the violence of his feelings in loud and hasty exclamations:

“Oh, dear!—oh, dear!” cried he; “what have I found?—We are all done for! the country right and left will be laid waste! Oh, sir! the robbers have entered the park: whether they be Jacobins, Red Republicans, or Socialists, I know not!”

“Who has dared to trespass on my inclosures?” demanded M. De Leutal, interrupting the ejaculations of Raoul.

“Who has dared to enter your domain, sir?” repeated the gamekeeper.

“Yes! Who has dared?”

“Why, assassins—sir,—villains! republicans with false keys, that open the sally-port that leads into the forest!”

Emilie now perceived that her cheeks had lost all their bloom at this moment. But Raoul vociferated so lustily, that the attention of every one was directed towards him. Monsieur De Leutal again silenced him in the midst of his lamentations, and demanded what had taken place to cause so extraordinary an ebullition of woe?

"Behold, sir!" ejaculated the terror-stricken gamekeeper, now almost driven to madness. "Behold what I have found!"

And with these words, he drew from his pocket a handkerchief, and cast upon the table before his master two fingers horribly mutilated.

Every person present drew back in unfeigned horror, while Emilie uttered a piercing shriek. But in a moment she recollected that her own happiness and that of her lover depended upon her prudence and self-possession. She accordingly succeeded in mastering her feelings. During the silence that took place, after the cry of horror that had escaped the lips of Emilie, at the sight of the mutilated fingers lying on the table, the gamekeeper had time to continue his clamorous narrative.

"Yes, sir," said Raoul, in a loud voice, "they were caught in the park gate, and what proves the thing was done by robbers, and that the rogues were numerous, is in the fact, that the spring wicket had only smashed the fingers—for they were afterwards taken off. It is not possible one man could have courage enough to operate in so terrible a manner upon himself."

Monsieur De Leutral examined the fingers with gloomy looks and deep attention; and then suddenly glancing round the room, without fixing his eyes upon any person in particular, he said, with a bitter smile:

"The skin of these mangled fingers is very white, and those nails are kept in too good order to be those of a robber."

Every one of these words fell like scorching drops of boiling lead upon the heart of Emilie. Her teeth chattered; she felt that her brain whirled, and that her eyes became dim. But the various opinions which M. De Leutral called forth from the guests created too much confusion to allow her emotions to be perceived. The indignation of his friends concealed the confusion of Emilie.

Presently, M. De Leutral having made a sort of half apology to his guests, demanded of Raoul if the traces of blood that were left afforded any particular ground of suspicion.

"Impossible!" replied the gardener; "they stop at the foot of the wicket."

"And you have discovered nothing more?" inquired Monsieur De Leutral. "Nothing that can put us upon the right scent—no fragment of a garment, no riding-whip, no key, or anything, in fine, which the wounded may have left?"

"No, sir,—no! I have found nothing," replied the gamekeeper; "but another fact, which proves that the villains were numerous, or, rather, there were more than one, is that the knife was wiped upon a piece of paper—a thing that no wounded man could think of doing. This is the paper I allude to."

"Give it to me!" cried his master, eagerly; and he anxiously seized upon the blood-stained paper which Raoul handed to him.

He examined it long and attentively; and during his investigation, while every one was silently gazing upon the host, Emilie could hear her heart beating in her breast. Suddenly her guardian raised his eyes towards her, and said, without exhibiting the most remote suspicion:

"If you examine this, you will think as I do. Here is the mark where the blade was wiped; and the trace clearly proves that the amputation was performed with a flat poignard, and not with a knife!"

"Exactly what it is!" shouted Raoul. "Those brigands always carry poignards! The villains—the ruffians—the murderers!"

M. De Leutral ordered the gamekeeper to leave the room, while Emilie took the paper and mechanically passed it to her right-hand neighbour, so soon as she had glanced cursorily over it. That person scrutinised it with the utmost curiosity, and against awoke the slumbering terrors of the wretched Emilie, by saying:

"Yes, there is something written beneath the blood."

"Let me see it!" exclaimed M. De L., his eyes flashing fire, and his voice almost choked with emotion.

The paper was passed to him once more, and, after a great deal of difficulty, he gradually deciphered these words: "M. De Leutral and Mdlle. Emilie have the honour to invite —"

He stopped—the paper was torn just there. The syllables of this phrase, thus seen, sounded like the call of death in the ears of Emilie. M. De Leutral crushed the paper in his hands with terrible violence, and now, for the first time giving vent to the tempest that raged within him, he addressed his ward in an angry tone, and said:

"Tis well—this evening we shall see which of our guests will be missing!"

He hastily left the room, followed by his friends, in a state of moody and suspicious silence. Emilie remained alone, and was now, for the first time, enabled to examine the terrible object of accusation. She gazed upon it—and so well is each beautiful feature of a lover registered in the tablet of his mistress's memory, that she recognised and secured the sad relic.

The devotion of the noble count to the welfare and honour of his mistress—to mutilate himself—was terrible! But that which he subsequently did was far more chivalrous still.

It were impossible to depict the misery—the agony—the despair that rent the bosom of Emilie throughout that unhappy day! Years—long years of woe, were outdone by that single day of bitterness—of reckless prospect, and of unutterable distress! A vain hope—ever attendant upon those cases where the result of misfortune is not yet known—occasionally penetrated to her wounded soul. The sense of her duties, and the necessity of attending to her domestic avocations, also came to her assistance; and she thus partially soothed her agitated mind.

In the evening she appeared in the ball-room, resplendent and calm! In proportion as the hour of danger advanced, she felt that she gradually became more tranquil. Instead of suffering her misfortune to gain upon her step by step, she calculated its full extent in her imagination. She knew the lapse of a few minutes would decide her fate; for she was thoroughly convinced that her guardian would never be induced to forgive her disobedience: she must give up all hopes of a dowry—and she was prepared for so great a sacrifice.

The entertainment commenced, and the guests arrived in crowds. M. De Leutral—stationed at a little distance from the door—affected to receive them with a degree of politeness which permitted him to count and examine all who passed him.

The hour advanced, and the count did not make his appearance; a few other fashionables of the day were also late.

The festival continued, and some of the expected guests were still wanting, but they were only ladies and old men—not one on whom suspicion could fall, save the Count De St. Clair. Emilie was aware of this, and her uncle whispered in her ear, as she passed by the place where he was posted:

"The circle of my suspicions gradually becomes smaller: it now includes but three names, and already might I select one, and announce myself that the Count —"

At the moment when M. De Leutral was about to pronounce the fatal name, the ball-room door was thrown open, and a lackey announced the Count De St. Clair.

M. De Leutral and his niece were each so anxious to devour him with a look, that neither perceived the disorder which was pictured upon each other's countenance. But the appearance of the count excited far different sentiments in the breast of his entertainer: he came carelessly, with his opera-hat under his arm, playing with his shirt-frill with one hand, and dangling his watch-chain with the other—both being covered with irreproachable white kid gloves.

"Ah! it is not he, then!" thought the uncle and ward at the same moment.

"It is not he, then!" said the uncle to himself.

"It is not he who was wounded," thought Emilie.

Oh! from that moment how everything was changed in her eyes! The magnitude of the danger that menaced her was diminished—her lover was safe—and her agonies of soul were abrogated. These ideas raised her spirits to such a height, that had not her guardian been occupied in waiting for other guests who did not come, he would have read the truth in the joyous glances of his ward.

Several times, when the count passed near her, he spoke with that ease and elegance of which he was the model. The ball progressed, and our heroine was relieved from all her fears.

In the course of the evening, according to the custom of the times, the company proposed to dance a Gavot.

The most distinguished persons in the room were called upon to figure in this dance: so that the Count De St. Clair soon found himself placed as a vis-à-vis of Emilie. She was in ecstasies at the prospect of being enabled to receive and return the courteous smiles of her lover, and to press the hand so freely tendered in the prescribed mazes of the dance. Her heart felt lighter than it ever before had seemed; and even if a remnant of dread had linked in her mind, it would have vanished at the sight of the ease and grace with which the count acquitted himself in the Gavot, and by which he attracted the attention of all the spectators present.

In one of the figures, when the rapidity of the terpsichorean movements concealed every expression of any passion or particular feeling, Emilie suffered herself to squeeze her lover's hand, as if to felicitate him upon a joy which she supposed he could not comprehend. At that moment a dreadful shriek re-echoed through the room.

Reader, it did not emanate from the count—it escaped from the lips of the wretched Emilie; for she had felt, as she pressed her lover's hand, the fingers of cotton, so skillfully prepared, yield to her touch, while he was unaware that she had thus intended to convey a token of her esteem.

From that moment a raging fever took possession of Emilie, and every morning did the count call to inquire after her health—thus evincing his tenderness to the last. At the expiration of a week he departed to join the army, carrying his secret with him. Emilie and her guardian were informed some time after, that, having been wounded in an engagement, where he exposed himself with uncalled-for rashness, he was obliged to undergo a shocking operation. On his return he had lost his sword-arm.

"Gracious heavens!" exclaimed Emilie, as soon as she saw him alone, and for the first time, "what have you done!"

"The most prudent thing I could do," was the calm reply, "in order to overcome the scruples of your uncle respecting military men. I am now incapacitated for, and have retired from, the service, and am once more a civilian—and I trust as such he will waive his objections."

M. De Leutral having learnt the noble devotedness of the count on behalf of his niece, no longer withheld his consent to their union; and, giving Emilie a dowry of one million of francs, he appointed her heiress to the remainder of his immense wealth.

SUCCESS.—If you would be successful, be patient. Remember,

"Waiting won at Waterloo."

Impulsive people make very good soldiers, but bad generals. It is not going ahead, but going ahead properly, that converts the sergeant's shoulder-knots into the major-general's epaulettes. Remember, time converts the mulberry leaf into satin.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

THE metropolis alone consumes 18,000,000 cubic feet of gas daily, which, at 4s. 6d. per 1000 cubic feet—the average price paid by consumers—amounts to £1,473,250 per annum. From this fact, some idea may be formed of the immense amount paid annually for gas throughout the whole kingdom. There are in Great Britain 775 distinct establishments for the manufacture of gas, which represent a capital of £15,000,000 sterling.

A GLASS COLUMN.—The popularity of glass as a building material—arising out of Sir Joseph Paxton's Crystal Palace and conservatories—will cause glass to be employed in a thousand ways, to which no one dreamt it was applicable a few years ago. The Prussians have just resolved to make it serve for public monuments. A column, consisting entirely of glass, placed on a pedestal of Carrara marble, and surmounted by a statue of Peace, six feet high, by the celebrated sculptor, Rauch, is about to be erected in the Garden of the Peace, at Potsdam. The shaft will be ornamented with spiral lines of blue and white.

SINGULAR GEOLOGICAL FACT.—At Modena, in Italy, within a circle of four miles around the city, whenever the earth is dug, and the workmen arrive at the distance of sixty-three feet, they come to a bed of chalk, which they bore with an augur, five feet deep. They then withdraw from the pit before the augur is removed, and upon its refraction the water bursts up with great violence, and quickly fills the well thus made, the supply of water being neither affected by rains nor droughts. At the depth of fourteen feet are found the ruins of an ancient city—houses, paved streets, and masonic work. Below this again is a layer of earth; and at twenty-six feet walnut-trees are found entire, with leaves and walnuts upon them. At twenty-eight feet soft chalk is found, and below this vegetables and trees.

THE UNDULATORY THEORY OF LIGHT.—At the conversazione given by the President of the Institution of Civil Engineers, Professor Wheatstone exhibited a philosophical instrument characterised by the ingenuity, simplicity, and elegance which belongs to everything that emanates from him. The intention was to illustrate the undulatory theory of light, and to show how the apparent progressive motion of a wave might exist, in the absence of any progressive motion whatever. The instrument consisted of an arrangement of white beads carried upon the ends of slender wires, which passed vertically or horizontally through transverse slots in the horizontal or vertical sides of the frame. On drawing backwards or forwards a smooth board with a sinuous slot cut in it, the beads formed themselves into a wave-line, which altered its form with the motion, and gave the appearance of its beads being in progressive motion with the propagation of the wave, though it was evident they had no such motion, as the wires which carried them moved only in the transverse slots. The changes of configuration thus produced, gave rise to a succession of curves of double curvature extremely beautiful to contemplate.

REMEDY FOR THE STING OF BEES.—M. Gumbrecht recommends the expressed juice of the honeysuckle (Lonicera Caprifolium) as a remedy for the sting of bees. The stung place is to be rubbed with the juice, which may be kept in closely-stopped bottles for the purpose.—Chemical Gazette.

A WONDERFUL CINDER.—In the Rotunda, at Woolwich, amongst other curiosities which are there to be seen by the public, is preserved, in a glass case, a cinder, the produce entirely of bank notes, burnt in an oven built for the purpose. The issue of one-pound notes during the war was averaged at a hundred thousand daily. After the calling in of these notes, and the payment of cash, the Bank of England ordered the burning of the notes above a certain date, which process occupied thirteen months, at the average of 144,000 daily. At this rate, the quantity burnt in the whole period, reckoning that they were burnt twenty-seven days in each month, amounted to 50,544,000 notes! The residue of this immense number of notes constitutes the wonderful cinder above referred to, which is not above six cubic inches in height.

THE WEED.—The British nation taxes itself for tea to the extent of £4,485,768, and for tobacco to the extent of £5,902,433. When the British Solomon, James I., produced his famous "Counterblast," the national expenditure on tobacco was between £300 and £400 a year. Were the royal pedant now to look up from his tomb, he would be astonished to find that the annual income from the obnoxious Virginia plant is equal to the whole export and import duties of his entire kingdom for 1614—the amount of the latter being £4,628,586; and very nearly equal to the whole specie coined during his reign, which was not much over five millions. A writer in the "Journal of the Statistical Society" shows that, taking each ten years from 1821 to 1851, the average annual consumption per head for each person in the United Kingdom, amounts respectively to eleven, twelve, thirteen, and sixteen ounces—or, in round numbers, that each man, woman, and child consumes a pound of tobacco in the year; but this estimate, founded upon official documents, falls far short of the truth. The duty is so enormous, ranging from 400 to 1,400 per cent., that only about one half of what is consumed pays duty—the other half is smuggled. This at once raises the consumption to two pounds per head. Then, very few females smoke or chew, and probably no children of either sex below eight use it in any shape: and so, cutting off all females, and males in their minority, the consumption of male adults is raised to eight pounds. If allowance is made for non-smoking, chewing, and snuffing members of the community, it will average sixteen pounds for each consumer. In France, the taxation from this source is nearly five millions. In Denmark, the average in 1848 was upwards of six millions of pounds, which, to a population of about a million and a half, yields the great consumption of nearly seventy ounces. In warm eastern countries, where the plant is freely cultivated, and where it is absolved from impost, the consumption is to an extent that transcends all European experiences. The writer whom we have quoted, and who appears to have formerly been a missionary, mentions that in Siam the use of tobacco is universal. "The natives chew in moderate quantities, but smoke perpetually: the cigar is ever in the mouth, or stuck behind the ear ready for use." Amongst the Burmese it is still more universal—rank, sex and age forming no exception to the custom. "I have seen children," he adds, "scarcely three years old who seemed quite familiar with it." Our statist winds up by an attempt to estimate the consumption of this favourite narcotic agent throughout the world. He reckons the population of the globe to be, in round numbers, a thousand millions, and he sets down seventy ounces (the Denmark average) as the probable cosmopolitan absorption. And holding to this probably correct calculation, the result is close upon two millions of tons. About half of the inward or outward tonnage of British shipping for one year would be necessary for the transportation of this quantity of the plant; and the value, if assumed at the low figure of two-pence a pound, would yield nearly thirty-six millions and a half of sterling money—or about £182,000,000.

MANUFACTURE OF PAPER FROM THE REFUSE OF SUGAR-CANES AND COW-HOUSES.—At a recent meeting of the Society of Arts, specimens of paper made from the refuse of the sugar-cane and cow-house were exhibited, which latter process assumes a high degree of importance at the present time, when the probability of a removal of the paper-duty is becoming every day greater. It appears that the cows are fed with the straw of the flax-plant, after it has been used in manufacture. The cows digest the oil and gummy matter which remain in it, and which are found to be extremely fattening. The flax refuse, so macerated, is collected, and from it the paper is made. This is a new and remarkable instance in which this invaluable animal administers to the wants of man. Her milk has already been used with economy and advantage, as a substitute for olive-oil, in fixing the colours of manufactured articles, and cheese is now employed to produce the brilliant blue colours of baréges, which could not otherwise be fixed.

I SEE THEE STILL.

BY C. SPRAGUE.

I see thee still:

Remembrance, faithful to her trust,
Calls thee in beauty from the dust;
'Thou comest in the morning light,
'Thou'rt with me through the gloomy night;
In dreams I meet thee as of old:
Then thy soft arms my neck infold,
And thy sweet voice is in my ear.
In every scene to memory dear

I see thee still.

I see thee still:

In every hallowed token round:
This little ring thy finger bound;
This lock of hair thy forehead shaded;
This silken chain by thee was braided:
These flowers, all withered now, like thee,
Sweet sister, thou didst call for me;
This book was thine—here didst thou read;
This picture—ah, yes, here, indeed,

I see thee still:

I see thee still:

Here was thy summer noon's retreat;
Here was thy favourite fireside seat;
This was thy chamber—here, each day,
I sat and watched thy sad decay;
Here, on this bed, thou at last didst lie;
Here, on this pillow thou didst die:
Dark hour! once more its woes unfold—
As then I saw thee, pale and cold,

I see thee still.

I see thee still:

'Thou art not in the grave confined—
Death cannot chain the immortal mind;
Let earth close o'er its sacred trust,
But goodness dies not in the dust.
Thee, O my sister! 'tis not thee
Beneath the coffin's lid I see;
'Thou to a fairer land art gone;
There let me hope, my journey done,
To see thee still.

ANECDOTE OF MADAME DE STAEL.—When about the age of seventeen, Madame De Stael was placed at a convent in France. She was in the habit of visiting a friend who lived across the square on which the convent was situated. The brother of her friend always insisted on escorting her home, and led her round the two sides of the square. But as his passion decreased, he gradually shortened the route until he led her home by the nearest way. The witty lady remarked—"By this I learned that his passion diminished in the exact proportion of the diagonal to the two sides of a square." Probably the most accurate calculation of waning affection that maiden ever made.

[GROUP OF GEM VASES.]

SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION IN DUBLIN.

GEM VASES.

This group of vases is from the manufactory of Mr. Copeland, Stoke-upon-Trent. This gentleman has long been celebrated for his works of industrial art, and at the Great Exhibition in 1851 greatly distinguished himself. This group of gem vases will not detract from his well-earned reputation. They are fine examples of the British school of design and decoration. The taste is unexceptionable; and to Mr. Copeland may be assigned the merit of having brought this branch of British art to its present high state of development.

But we must be allowed to remark, that all the vases manufactured throughout Europe are close copies of the old models. Some of them bear a close resemblance to those which were carried in the Roman triumphal processions.

The racing-cup is almost an exact copy of the vessels in which the valuable spoil and money was borne; and the long, narrow necked, double-handled vase is the same now as it was two thousand years ago. It is nothing more than the water-jar carried by the ancient Israelites, the Arabs, the Egyptians, the Hindoos, the Greeks, and the Assyrians. The form is preserved to this day in India, and we have seen it thousands of times in England. It was intended to be carried on the head, and the narrow neck was to prevent the water being spilled. The brown jug—which small-beer poets have so frequently apostrophised—is nothing more than the vase of the Romans—the water-jug of every ancient people. And yet after the lapse of four thousand years it presents no signs of improvement. It is lavishly decorated, and that is all. Now, among a people—especially those in our large towns—who are not obliged, by necessity, to bring their water on their heads from a neighbouring brook or well, it is singular that this should be the only form of vase now cultivated. Is the type universal? Or probably the water-jug has obtained a classic immortality.

But the fault rests with the artist. In educating himself up to the perfection of the ancients, he not only hesitates, but is actually incapacitated from proceeding beyond them. His invention is drowned in a flood of admiration for foreign and exotic ideals. He seems to forget that Britain is the land of the oak and the ash, and that Greece glories in the cypress and myrtle. Forms adapted to marble and unclouded skies are melancholy strangers in a land of granite and a moving canopy of dark-grey clouds. This radical error will never be corrected until British artists become really British artists, and, by creating a school pre-eminently their own, take the sting of that earcastic admonition of Northcote to his pupils on departing for Italy:

"Go, my lads—go; and remember that you cross the Alps to steal!"

CABINET MADE OF YEW-TREE.

This article of furniture has attracted some attention from the originality displayed in its design and the beauty of the workmanship. It was designed by Mr. J. Keer, of Dublin, and is made of yew-tree grown on the estate of J. W. L. Napier, Esq., of Loughrea Old Castle, and registered at one hundred years old.

Now this cabinet is interesting in several points of view. First, it is made of yew-tree:

Cheerless, unsocial plant, that loves to dwell
'Midst skulls and coffins, epitaphs and worms:

a description of timber seldom used for furniture, but which we are assured, as in this instance, may be turned to profitable and ornamental account. Then, as we reflect upon the fact that this was from a tree the growth of a century, and that in the cabinet many antiquities may be deposited, the knowledge-loving mind will immediately refer to the historical circumstance, that the valour of Englishmen has been infinitely indebted to this yew-tree for those marvellously flexible, yet strong bows, which, previous to the introduction of fire-arms, Englishmen used with terrific effect in many a sanguinary field.

And then the custom of planting yew-trees in churchyards. How did that arise? Some have supposed that these trees were placed near the churches for the purpose of affording branches on Palm Sunday; others, that they might be safe from the cattle, on account of their value for making bows; others, that they were emblematical of silence and death; and others that they were useful in affording shade or shelter to those places of worship, when in a more primitive form than they now appear. Other writers have entered more philosophically into this question, and presume that the yew was one of those ever-greens which, from its shade and shelter, was especially cultivated by the Druids in their sacred groves, and around their sacrificial circles; that when Christianity superseded Druidism, the same places were chosen as the sites of the new worship, and that in this manner arose the association of the yew-tree with our churches and churchyards. This surmise we think the most probable; but as in the present day it has been found that the yew-tree may be usefully employed in articles of household furniture, the cabinet-makers will not have much respect for its solemn reminiscences—but use it with the same nonchalance as they would a less dismal-looking tenant of the forest.

Another interesting point in which this cabinet may be viewed is, that it shows an improved taste in the manufacture of furniture. Cabinet-makers in the present day have exhibited a little inventive talent. Although in the trammels of a rooted regard for loo, pembroke, and claw-tables—with some fanciful deviations into the artistic (?) realm of lions, tigers, dragons, and phoenixes—they still show invention. The round table, when tastefully ornamented and supported by a column massive enough to the eye to afford the idea of security, fills up a room, and imparts that feeling of cosiness and equality so essential to the geniality that should pervade the family circle. Then in chairs there has been a vast improvement of late years. The straight, high-backed abominations of our forefathers have been banished to the dreary parlours of old country inns; and the sofas and couches now made do not look like troughs and coffins, as they formerly did. They are lighter and more cheerful in appearance. You can take a nap on them without fancying yourself being half suffocated in a box with one of the sides knocked out.

But the cabinet-maker has had insuperable difficulties to contend with. Every one concerned in the building of our dwellings has been his enemy. They have studiously denied him the proper light in which to display the productions of his taste and handicraft. While he has been endeavouring to apply the principles of art to domestic use, they have been doing just the contrary. They have erected houses just as if they had been dropped from the sky.

Now, to give the cabinet-maker or upholsterer a chance of not only displaying his work to the best advantage, but to encourage and stimulate him to more originality in design and better taste in the selection of colours and the management of shades, the rooms which he has to furnish and decorate should have a good aspect; at all events, they should be coloured so as to suit the aspect. A cold colour, in a room lighted from the north, will make everything in it look chilly. A hot colour in a room lighted from the south, is also in very bad taste.

In furnishing a room, it is of the utmost importance that all these circumstances should be taken into consideration; if they are not, or neglected, or despised, the costliest and most tasteful furniture that can be manufactured will never look well.

These exhibitions of the products of art and industry bring such views as these into prominent notice; and we may venture to observe that, as regards the cabinet-making and upholstery trades, builders and house-painters should rather be their allies than their foes. But that they will never be until the builders work under the instruction of architects blessed with more fertile imaginations, and the house-painters convince us, by grouping changes in their styles, that they are fully aware that the supply of light, the size of the room and its purpose, are the chief circumstances which ought to regulate the strength or depth of the colours to be used. Competent artists know full well that where the light is strong, unobscured, and plentiful, the tone of the colouring may be full; on the other hand, where the supply of light is small, the tone of Full-toned colours lessen the apparent size of the room—light colouring enlarges it. A little attention to the proportion between the space to be coloured and the depth of the colouring, becomes therefore of great importance. If you wish to make your room appear as large as possible, then exclude a dark colouring—not only on the large surfaces, but even in the patterns of the paper-hangings, in the mouldings, and ornamental parts.

The nature of the use to which the room is applied should also influence the decision as to the tone of colouring. If the room is used mostly by artificial light—which, being less pure than daylight, materially modifies the appearance of most colours—then keep the colouring light. If, on the other hand, it is a room for occupation during daylight, then the tone of the colouring must be deep. Red and green with black appear dark and grave; with white, they appear gay.

An observance of these rules is therefore of the utmost importance to the effectual display of the furniture, and also would not only influence but considerably improve the taste employed in its selection and disposition; and until they are observed, we shall despair of seeing a room which we would term appropriately and elegantly furnished.

As we may not have the opportunity of indulging in many further remarks in explanation of the object of this Great Dublin Exhibition of the industry of all nations, we avail ourselves of this occasion to urge upon the promoters of the exhibition, and all other friends of Ireland as one of at least their implied duties, seeing the propriety and appropriateness of protesting against the wholesale emigration which is plundering Ireland of her best and dearest property.

At the present rate of decrease—namely, three per cent. per annum, supposing there will be no emigration—Ireland will be depopulated in half a century. What an awful fact to be placed by the side of the record of her brilliant industrial triumph of 1853! We cannot contemplate it without subscribing to the sentiment, that it looks very like a barbarous perversion of the ordinances of Providence—a sacrilegious abandonment of a territory abounding in everything that constitutes real wealth, and all that might be made to contribute towards the happiness of its people.

The truth is, that the political economist fraternity are leading Ireland to ruin and perdition. They are innoculating her people with the vicious sentiment, that their condition at home is hopeless. This we denounce as a crime—for so long as Ireland could comfortably support seven times the amount of its present population, it is self-evident that the remedies for her distresses, and the compensation for her wrongs, ought to be sought within her own sea-girt boundaries. Expatriation is an abandon-behind: so that in the place of an energetic reliance on self, there is generated a disgust and a morbid longing for a different scene of action, which, while it crams emigrant ships, throws a blight on the prospects of those who either willingly or unwillingly abide by their native soil.

But, in the paroxysm of the mania, the fact is overlooked that emigration is just the thing to perpetuate the abuses which have brought Ireland to her present abject condition; for it must be obvious that it stifles the clamours of the people for redress—coaxes public opinion to divert itself from the channels of politics—and, not halting at that degradation, actually converts an indignant people into the slaves of circumstances which they ought to wrestle with and overcome, like men conscious of the dignity of their divine nature and the responsibility of their earthly mission. The emigration furor actually extinguishes that safeguard of a nation—political agitation; it offers a sop to present exigencies, by crying up present safety and greatness as of more importance than a wise forethought for the future. It ignores nationality, scoffs at love of country, and, perceiving and knowing this pernicious tendency, we do advisedly say, that unless the Dublin Exhibition contributes something to arrest the Irish exodus, it will not have accomplished much beyond having been a brilliant but fleeting show.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Oh, the dark policy and crooked wiles
That fence the uneasy crown.

OLD PLAY.

ALTHOUGH Elizabeth never for an instant seriously entertained the design of parting with her favourite, Lord Robert Dudley, she continued to treat with the ambassador of the Queen of Scots, upon the subject of his marriage with his mistress, with as much apparent earnestness as though it had been her fixed intention. With a woman's tact, she seized the occasion of the alliance being mooted to confer new honours upon his lordship, whom she resolved at once to create Earl of Leicester and Baron Denbigh—which ceremony took place with great splendour at Westminster, in presence of the queen, foreign ministers, and all the court.

For a sovereign who affected great prudery and decorum, Elizabeth was strangely indiscreet—and never more so than on the above occasion. After the patent of creation had been read by the Lord Chancellor, the new-made peer advanced directly opposite the throne, and knelt, to have his robes put on him. The queen not only took them from the officer with her own hands, but invested him with them herself—at the same time she so far forgot her royal dignity as to thrust her hand into his neck, and tickle him: a fact which Sir James Melville, the Scottish ambassador, has recorded in his memoirs.

"Turning to the French ambassador," continues the grave statesman, "she demanded, with a laugh, how he liked him—meaning the earl."

The intention of Elizabeth, at this period of her life, in all probability, was to marry Leicester herself—and the negotiation for the hand of the beautiful Mary merely a pretext to give a colour to her design, by proving to the world that he was worthy of aspiring to the hand of a crowned head. Fortunately it failed. Catherine de Medici, the queen-mother of France, who governed that kingdom in the name of her son, Charles IX.—then about sixteen—proposed, in his name, to unite the long rival crowns by marriage—an offer which flattered the vanity of Elizabeth, without dazzling her understanding.

Her answer to Castelnau, the French ambassador, who had been charged with this delicate negotiation, has been preserved. It was, "That she was greatly obliged by the honour done her by so mighty and powerful a king—to whom, as well as to the queen-mother, she felt infinitely beholden—but that she felt this difficulty: the most Christian king—her good brother—was at once too great and too small. Too great, as the sovereign of such a realm as France, to quit his own dominions, and cross the seas to reside in England, where the people expected their kings and queens to live;" too small, she explained, by observing, "That his majesty was too young: she herself being already thirty—which she considered old for a woman."

A proposal was next made for her marriage with the Duc d'Anjou—the younger brother of Charles IX.—an offer which Elizabeth declined, at the same time remarking, "That she had not refused a king to put up with a subject. That if she felt disposed to bestow her hand upon any one but a crowned head, she had subjects sufficiently noble in her own kingdom, without looking to foreign countries to find them!"

This was a direct allusion to the Earl of Leicester, whom she still evinced a desire to marry.

When Elizabeth found that the widowed Queen of Scotland was serious in her intention of espousing the young Lord Darnley, who had obtained permission to visit Edinburgh, her mortification and anger did not confine themselves to words. She not only imprisoned his mother, the Countess of Lennox, in the Tower, but gave orders to her agents to foment a rebellion in Scotland against the queen. The Earl of Murray and others fell into the snare; but when their treasonable enterprise had failed, and they were compelled by the victorious troops of Mary to seek the colouring should be light. In the houses of the ancients the strongest and darkest colours—even blacks—were used on large surfaces, when the apartment received direct and full light from above. Under a strong and abundant light, full-toned colours preserve their brightness and distinctive character; but when the light is feeble, and the supply of it limited, they become dull and gloomy, ment of all hope—of all spirit to attempt the redress of wrongs, or the cultivation of that wholesome feeling—we might say principle—of self-reliance, which is as essential to the prosperity and well-being of nations as of individuals. Encouraging the people to emigrate, is only telling them that they are unable to do anything for themselves; it also weakens the moral power in those lea-refuge in England, she not only disavowed all participation in their proceedings, but actually had the effrontery to forbid them her presence. Had they proved successful, how differently would she have treated them!

It seems to have been the object of her life to destroy the happiness of her more beautiful but less fortunate rival.

Never was the proverb that prosperity hardens the heart, more strongly exemplified than by her conduct to the venerable Archbishop of York, whose prudent conduct as Chancellor, on the death of her sister, had secured her undisputed succession to the crown. His crime was refusing to acknowledge the supremacy of Elizabeth.

She first sent him to the Tower, and then caused him to be confined as a prisoner in one of the mansions belonging to the archiepiscopal see. A letter is still extant, written by order of the queen in council, addressed to Lord Scrope, in which that nobleman is recommended to proceed sharply in his inquiries, and, if necessary, use some moderate kind of torture, so as not to do him any great bodily hurt.

At the time Elizabeth sanctioned this cruel order, the venerable prisoner was eighty-three years of age!

Things were in this position when the defeated rebels from Scotland arrived in London, to crave an audience of her majesty—who, seeing that the marriage of Mary could not be set aside, and that her attempt to overthrow her authority in her own realm had signally failed, refused them all access to her presence, unless they consented to avow that she had not in any way participated in their proceedings.

"The condition is a hard one!" observed the Earl of Murray, when Cecil made it known to him. "Your mistress has deceived me!"

"Say, rather, outwitted you!" replied the astute politician, with a smile. "You must not judge the actions of crowned heads as you would those of ordinary persons! Reasons of state will frequently not only compel, but justify actions which, as individuals, they would abhor!"

"A convenient doctrine!" observed the exile, with a sneer.

"And not the first time the Earl of Murray has both heard and practised it!" retorted Cecil. "In a word, my lord, if you look for favour and countenance from my sovereign, it can only be on the terms proposed. But you are at liberty to retire to France."

The offer was an insulting mockery: the speaker well knowing that if one of the enemies of Mary Stuart ventured to set foot in that country, her kinsmen of the house of Guise, who were all-powerful there, would take effectual means to prevent their ever returning to disturb her reign in Scotland again.

"You insult me in my misfortune!" exclaimed the noble, bitterly. "You know that I might as well—nay, better—return to Scotland, and stand a trial for treason, than trust to the mercy of the house of Guise!"

"Men of the world, my lord," gravely responded the messenger of Elizabeth, "never wantonly insult even an enemy—much less one who has served their interests, and may do so again! My proposal may be distasteful to you, but it is not insulting!"

Pride and shame, anger and irresolution, by turns predominated in the breast of the exiled noble, whose abilities none can question, however opinion may be divided as to his conduct to the unfortunate Mary—who certainly, on her return to Scotland, after the death of her French husband, treated him with great kindness. Prudence, however, at last prevailed; and he consented to the only terms on which Elizabeth would consent to see or to assist him and his companions.

Cecil heard his decision with secret joy, but was too hackneyed in the subtle politics of the court to permit the least manifestation of his feelings to appear, either by look or word.

"You have decided wisely," he said; "and I think I may venture to promise that her majesty will receive you to-morrow, after the council; but remember, the denial must be unequivocal!"

"Fear not!" answered the exile, bitterly; "I have learnt the lesson of falsehood and humiliation you have taught me, and will not fail to repeat it!"

So saying, the two men who were each destined to act such important parts in the government of their respective countries parted, each secretly hating and despising the other.

On the following morning, Elizabeth, immediately after the council, fulfilled the promise of her messenger, by admitting the Scottish exiles into her presence. She had taken care to have the ambassadors of France and Spain both with her on the occasion, that she might have fitting witnesses of their confession.

No sooner did Murray and his companions enter the presence-chamber, than the queen, who was conversing with Leicester, turned suddenly round, and sharply demanded what sort of reception they could possibly expect at her hands, after having so basely slandered her, by coupling her name with their odious intrigues against her dear sister, their sovereign mistress.

"Alack, madam," exclaimed Murray, falling upon his knees, "we have been deceived!"

"But not by me!"

"Far from our lips," replied the exile, "be such unwarranted slander! No, gracious queen! we take these honourable ambassadors to witness that your majesty is innocent of all knowledge and share in the conspiracy we so foolishly entered into against our sovereign lady and queen."

"God's wot! my lords, you have but declared the truth; though some eager to sow dissensions between the queen our sister and myself, will affect to disbelieve you. You have done me grievous injury in her opinion."

"Please your majesty, we will atone."

"How?" sharply demanded Elizabeth.

"By affirming upon our honours as noblemen and gentlemen," replied Lord Murray, "that your majesty had neither part nor hand in our proceedings."

This was all that the unscrupulous queen required: they had failed, and she no longer had the least inducement to keep faith with them. Assuming a severe look, she commanded them from her presence.

"Get from my sight!" she exclaimed, "false traitors as ye are! who have nearly embroiled two kingdoms by your infamous plottings; and thank our clemency that, instead of sending you prisoners to our sister in Scotland, we permit you to find refuge in our kingdom; but beware," she added, "how you again presume to venture before us! We may not always feel disposed to act thus weakly."

Turning her back upon the astonished and still kneeling exiles, her majesty resumed her conversation with Leicester and the French ambassador, who complimented the royal hypocrite on the complete vindication she had received from the lips of the Scottish traitors: who, abashed and overwhelmed with shame and ridicule, withdrew from the presence-chamber, degraded in their own estimation, and that of all who heard them; for the scene, despite the excellent acting of all concerned in it, deceived none but the ignorant. In justice to the maiden monarch we must add, that she did not carry her injustice so far as to leave her dupes to starve, but secretly allowed Murray a pension—who, in the language of scripture, might be truly said to eat the bread of bitterness.

Elizabeth so far forgot the debt of gratitude she owed to Throgmorton—whose services during the reign of her sister entitled him to more consideration—as to disavow his whole proceedings in Scotland: a treachery which so inflamed that gentleman, that he exposed the secret instructions, under her own hand and seal, upon which he had acted—a retaliation which, however merited, his vindictive mistress never forgave. Forgiveness of injuries and offences was not one of the weak points of Queen Elizabeth.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Strong in hand, but weak in heart,

Each in turn doth act a part.

OLD POEM, ENTITLED "THE VIRGIN QUEEN."

FROM the scene of dissimulation and treachery which we have described in the preceding chapter, it is a relief to turn to the more pleasing side of the character of Elizabeth—namely, her great powers of administration. Had Ireland been administered according to her directions, much of the unhappy dissension which has divided that distracted country might have been avoided. We extract the following letter, written with her own hand to Sir Henry Sidney, from the papers of his family, most of which have been made public:

"HARRY,

"If our partial, slender managing of the contentious quarrel between the two Irish rebels, did not make the way to cause these lines to pass my hand, this gibberish should hardly have cumbered your eyes; but warned by my former fault, and dreading worse hap to come, I rede (advise) you take good heed. * * * * Make some difference between tried, just, and false friends. Let the good service of well-deservers be never rewarded with loss. Let their thanks be such as may encourage more strivers for the like. Suffer not that Desmond's daring deeds, far wide from promised works, make you trust to other pledge than himself, or John, for gage. He hath so well performed his English vows, that I warn you, trust him no farther than you see one of them. Prometheus let me be; and Prometheus hath been mine too long. I pray God your old straying sheep, late as you say, returned into fold, wore not her woolly garment upon her wolffy back. You know a kingdom knows no kindred. Si violandum jus regnan di causa. A strength to harm is perilous in the hand of an ambitious head. Where might is mixed with wit there is too good an accord in a government. Essays be oft dangerous, specially where the cup-bearer hath received such a preservative as, whatsoever betide the drinker's draught, the carrier takes no pain thereby. Believe not, though they swear that they can be full sound, whose parents sought the rule that they full fain would have. I warrant you they will never be accused of bastardy; they will trace the steps that others have trod before. If I had not espied, though very late, legerdemain used in these cases, I had never played my part. No, if I did not see the balances held awry, I had never myself come into the weigh-house. I hope I shall have so good customer of you, that all under officers shall do their duty among you. If aught have been amiss at home, I will patch, though I cannot whole it. Let us not, nor do you consult so long, that advice come too late. Where, then, shall we wish the deeds, while all was spent in words. A fool too late bewares when all the peril is past. If we still advise, we shall never do, yea, and if our web be framed with rotten handles, when our loom is well nigh done, our work is new to begin. God send the weaver true prentices again, and let them be denizens. I pray you, if they be not citizens, and such too as your ancestors, aldermen, that have, or now dwell in your official place, have had best cause to commend their good behaviour. Let this memorial be only committed to Vulcan's base keeping, without any longer abode than the leisure of the reading thereof; yea, and no mention made thereof to any other wight I charge you, as I may command you, seem not to have had but secretaries' letters from me.

"Your loving maistres.

"ELIZABETH R."

Shortly after the affair with the Scottish exiles, an ambassador extraordinary arrived from the court of France, bearing the ensigns of the noble order of St. Michael, together with a letter written by Charles IX. himself, in which that monarch requested her majesty to bestow them upon any two of her subjects, whom she might deem worthy so great an honour.

Elizabeth selected her kinsman, the noble-minded Duke of Norfolk, and her favourite, the ignoble Leicester, whose favour at this period of his life was at its height.

Cecil and his colleagues trembled lest she should marry him. With all his astuteness, the great statesman little knew the heart of the royal coquette, who sported with the passion of her favourite, without ever becoming herself the slave of its weakness, although there is little doubt that she shared it.

The alarm of the minister must have been great, when he took upon himself to submit the following six objections to her marriage to his royal mistress.

First: That Leicester could bring neither riches, power, nor estimation.

Secondly: That he was deeply involved in debt, notwithstanding all that the bounty of her majesty had lavished upon him.

Thirdly: He was surrounded by needy and rapacious dependents, who would engross all the favour and patronage of the crown.

Fourthly: That he was so violent and mutable in his passions—one day so jealous, another day so indifferent—that the queen could not expect to live happily with him.

Fifthly: He was infamous from the death of his wife.

Sixthly: That his marriage with Elizabeth would confirm the slanderous reports propagated to the disadvantage of her majesty.

These considerations, firmly if not disinterestedly presented, had great weight with the queen, who evidently from that time resigned all thoughts of marriage with her favourite; although she still continued to mark her undiminished affection for him by lavishing places and honours—fortunately they were honours merely. With all his influence, the Earl of Leicester never could obtain the direction of her government, which he so much coveted and intrigued for. It was a point with Elizabeth in which the inclination and weakness of the woman were vanquished by her prudence as a queen.

Leicester never forgave Cecil the evil turn he had played him.

Whilst the court of England was one continued scene of contention, rivalry, and intrigue, Mary Stuart, on the 19th of June, gave birth to her despicable and unworthy son—who, whilst yet an infant, was placed upon the throne. It would be unjust to blame him for an act in which he was, from his tender years, merely a passive instrument; but his cowardly abandonment of his mother to the cruel vengeance of Elizabeth—his infamous murder of the gallant Sir Walter Raleigh, to propitiate the court of Spain—the share which it is suspected he had in the poisoning of his own son, whose virtues and character rendered his own vices the more glaring—have stamped him as one of the most contemptible kings who ever sat upon either the English or the Scottish throne.

Immediately on the birth of her infant, the Queen of Scots dispatched an ambassador, in the person of Sir James Melville, to announce the joyful intelligence to Elizabeth.

The moment he reached London, Cecil, who knew, probably, how unwelcome the news would be to his jealous sovereign, departed at once for the palace at Greenwich, where the court was then residing, leaving the envoy to follow him at his leisure.

"Where is her majesty?" he demanded of one of the gentlemen ushers, who hastened to receive the secretary upon his landing.

"Dancing," replied the officer, "in the great hall, with Sir Thomas Smith, her ambassador at the court of France. The queen, to show her contentment at the spirited manner in which he resented the light way in which his sovereign was spoken of in the presence of Catharine de Medicis, has treated him with unusual honour. Never have I seen her grace in more contentment."

Cecil shrugged his shoulders: he knew that the envoy whose presence he came to announce, would quickly drive the smile from her cheek and the contentment from her heart. He would willingly have chosen another messenger—for Elizabeth, like most women, seldom regarded with a favourable eye the bearer of ill news.

"It must be done," he thought; "and the sooner the storm breaks the better—sunshine must follow it!"

Without waiting to change his costume for one more suited to the festive scene, he at once entered the great hall of the palace—where, as the usher had described, he found her majesty dancing, in great apparent glee, with her favoured partner. Perhaps her majesty felt pleased with his handsome person and elegant manner, or wished to mortify the Earl of Leicester, who, pale with jealousy and anger, stood watching them at a distance.

No sooner did Elizabeth catch the eye of her minister, than she beckoned him to approach:—he knew that something important must have occurred to justify his appearing in such a costume in her presence—for Cecil was equally great both as a courtier and a statesman.

Every eye was fixed upon the sovereign and her secretary, as they retired into one of the deep recesses formed by the bay-windows of the hall.

"What can have occurred?" whispered one.

"A rupture with France?"

"A war with Spain?"

Such, and yet more various were the conjectures bandied in the hall, whilst Cecil was whispering his communication into the ear of Elizabeth.

Suddenly there was a cry that her majesty was taken ill. The principal ladies of the court crowded round her, and some ventured to inquire the cause of her grief; for tears of mortification, which she vainly strove to hide, streamed down the painted cheeks of the Lion Queen of England.

"Matter enough!" exclaimed her grace. "The Queen of Scots is lighter of a fair son, whilst I am but a barren stock!"

Rather an extraordinary declaration for the maiden majesty of England, who instantly left the hall, unable to bear up against the chagrin which the news of her rival's happiness had caused her.

On the following morning, when Melville presented his credentials, Elizabeth received him with a countenance radiant with smiles. In his memoirs the ambassador distinctly states, that she welcomed him with a volt—a sort of light, skipping step then in vogue, but very undignified for a queen; thanked him for the dispatch he had used, and had the bare-faced hypocrisy to add, that the intelligence had recovered her from a severe sickness which she had endured for upwards of fifteen days.

At the christening of the infant who was destined to succeed her, and unite the British islands under one sceptre, Elizabeth stood godmother, and bestowed upon the child a font of pure gold, worth a thousand pounds. At the same time she acted thus munificently by her godson, she mortified its parents by directing her ambassador to refuse to its father the title of King of Scotland—in consequence of which he absented himself from the ceremony.

To dissipate her discontent, Elizabeth made a progress to Oxford, attended by the great nobility of the kingdom, and her seven beautiful maids of honour, whose charms were thus celebrated by the poet, Edwards, the author of a tragedy much esteemed in its time, named Damon and Pythias:

Howard is not haughty,
But of such smiling cheer,
That would allure each gentle heart
Her love to hold full dear.

Dacres is not dangerous,
Her talk is nothing coy;
Her noble stature may compare
With Hector's wife of Troy.

Baynam is as beautiful
As nature can devise;
Steadfastness possess her heart,
And chastity her eyes.

Arundel is ancient,
In these her tender years,
In heart, in voice, in talk, in deeds—
A matron wise appears.

Dormer is a darling,
Of such a lively hue,
That whoso feeds his eyes on her,
May soon her beauty rue.

Coke is comely, and thereto
In books sets all her care,
In learning, with the Roman dames
Of right she may compare.

Bridges is a blessed wight,
And prayeth with heart and voice,
Which from her cradle hath been taught,
In virtue to rejoice.

These seven now serve one noble queen;
But if power were in me,
For beauty's praise, and virtue's sake,
Each one a queen should be.

HARRINGTON'S NUGLE ANTIQUE.

SEPARATION.

EMMA WILMOT, a girl of eighteen, was reading the newspaper to her mother and uncle, in the boudoir of the former, and had just finished the account of an alarming fire in London.

"Uncle," she said, "I think there are very few sights that you have not seen: pray were you ever present at a fire?"

"Yes, Emma," replied Major Hervey; "I was once at a fire: it was the most awful description of fire, because it was the work of an incendiary, and combustibles had been laid to give its progress artificial rapidity; it was not a London fire either, where the spring of a rattle acts as the wave of an enchanter's wand in procuring engines and assistance from every quarter. It took place in a retired country situation, ten miles from any town, and, to sum up the horrors, it was at the house of my most dear and valued friends."

"Will you tell me the particulars, uncle?" said Emma; "that is, if it will not make you sad to do so."

"It will not make me sad, Emma—for that fire is connected with the most pleasurable event in my life, and most happy am I, for the sake of my friends, that it took place."

"Perhaps your friends were poor," said Emma; "had insured their house much beyond its value, and were glad of the additional money?"

"No, Emma—you are wrong; the house of my friends was certainly insured—but the insurance was beneath its value; and they lost many little articles of use and ornament endeared to them by circumstances, and which no money could replace; however, they found an article more precious than any they had lost."

"Oh! now I guess the mystery—they discovered a concealed treasure in the ruins."

"You are at once right and wrong: they certainly gained a treasure—or rather they regained it; for they had possessed it once, and wantonly cast it away."

"Now, uncle, you speak in riddles; do pray tell me the story!"

Major Hervey looked at Lady Wilmot, who gave a nod and smile of assent—and he began his narrative.

"About twenty years ago, Emma, I went to pay a visit to a young married couple, for whom I had a sincere regard: they lived in a beautiful country-house, surrounded by spacious grounds. It was spring; the whole neighbourhood seemed one sheet of blossoms, and the clustering branches of the lilac and laburnum gave beauty and fragrance to my walk through the avenue leading to the residence of Sir Edgar and Lady Falkland. They were young, handsome, wealthy, intellectual—and yet my visit to them was of a melancholy nature. They did not live happily together. They had decided on a separation, and the purpose of my journey was to inspect and witness a deed of separate maintenance."

"How very shocking!" said Emma; "nothing can justify the separation of a married couple."

"I do not quite agree with you there, my dear," answered her uncle; "there may be circumstances which justify this painful measure; such, however, were not the circumstances of my friends: the moral conduct of each was unimpeachable, and they were free from extravagance and love of dissipation; but they were unfortunately too much alike in respects where it would have been most desirable that they should have differed: they were both haughty, exacting, irritable, impatient of slights, and nervously perceptible of slights where no one else would have described them. I think the faults were as nearly as possible equal on each side. The lady complained of the want of the attentions of a lover in her husband; and the gentleman complained that his wife would not condescend to dress, sing, or smile for his gratification alone, as she was wont to do in the days of courtship. They became contradictory, peevish, and sullen, and a fatal want of confidence ensued on every affair of life, whether trifling or important."

"How different from my dear father and mother!" said Emma; "who can never keep anything a moment from each other!"

"The confidence which they withheld from each other," pursued Major Hervey, "they reposed in various quarters: and several of the friends thus judiciously distinguished made use of the idle and common-place phrase: 'When married people cannot live happily together, it is best for them to separate.' This advice had an effect which sounder advice often fails in having. It was accepted by each of the parties, and carried into execution. An eminent lawyer was directed to prepare a deed of separation, and, when once signed and witnessed, Lady Falkland was to quit the residence of her husband, and to return to her parents. My friends, as you may imagine, were not sitting together. I was shown into the study of Sir Edgar, and I spared no pains or arguments to prevail on him to re-consider his determination, to endeavour to bear with the little imperfections of his wife, and to persuade her to bear with his own. He would not, however, admit that he had given her any provocation; he seemed thoroughly convinced of her coldness and want of attachment to him. After some cross-questioning, I succeeded in getting him to allow that he was occasionally a little irritable; but such irritability, he said, would soon disappear, were it not kept alive by the provoking and taunting remarks of his wife."

"He should have been married to such a woman as my dear mamma," said Emma; "she is so mild and patient, that she would soften the most irritable temper in the world."

"Do not praise your mother quite so enthusiastically, my love!" said Lady Wilmot, smiling; "it is almost as bad as praising yourself."

"When I found," continued Major Hervey, "that all my persuasions were in vain, I was obliged tacitly to consent to the introduction of Mr. Chambers, the lawyer, with the deed of separation: he produced this document out of a tin box, which appeared to me more fatal than the box of Pandora—since Hope could not be supposed to repose at the bottom of it. When the deed, however, was read to me, I could not but do justice to the liberality of Sir Edgar: the fortune brought to him by his wife was small, and had been settled on herself for pin-money; but the allowance he proposed making to her was large, even in proportion to his extensive income. He expressed every wish for her comfort and happiness. Her father and mother were to come to the hall on the ensuing day to witness the deed of separation, and to take their daughter to their home. He asked me whether I thought they would be satisfied with the liberality of his provision for her, and I unhesitatingly answered in the affirmative; although, knowing their kind, tender, and feeling natures, my very heart was wrung at the anticipation of their visit. I proceeded from Sir Edgar's apartment to that of Lady Falkland, and vainly hoped that I might be more successful with her than I had been with her husband. I had known and loved her from her earliest youth—I had stood by the altar when her hand was joined with that of Sir Edgar—and deep was my sorrow to think that aught but death should dissolve that holy union. I could not, however, bend or soften her haughty spirit. 'She was undervalued,' she said; 'she was despised by her husband; she had always met with fondness and affection under the roof of her parents—and thither she should return.' I wished her to request a private interview with Sir Edgar: this she declined. She had not, she said, for many weeks seen him, except in the presence of a third person; but she promised me that, in honour of my arrival, she would dine at the table that day. It was a formal and melancholy dinner, and Mr. Chambers, who made the fourth of our little party, was the only unembarrassed person among us."

"Oh that terrible lawyer!" said Emma; "how I should have detested the sight of him!"

"Then you would have felt very unjustly, my dear girl," said Major Hervey; "he was a worthy and upright man; he could not refuse to draw up the deed in question when required to do so; and as he was only professionally acquainted with Sir Edgar and Lady Falkland, and not a private friend of either party, it would have been unreasonable to expect that he should look very unhappy about the matter. We are apt to exact too much from lawyers and medical men: we should reflect that long familiarity with scenes of distress, if it fail to harden the feelings, will at all events subdue the outward expression of them. They grieve like others for the misfortunes of their friends and relatives; but if they gave a tribute of ardent sympathy to the sufferings of every client and patient, they would be living in a state of perpetual excitement, highly unfavourable to the cool, deliberate self-possession so requisite in each of their professions. Lady Falkland quitted us soon after dinner. Mr. Chambers and I joined her in the drawing-room, but Sir Edgar had retired to his study. Lady Falkland was sad and silent; in fact, the whole room presented a dreary appearance: her harp and pianoforte were in packing-cases ready for removal; a table near the window, which used to be covered with engravings, books in gay bindings, and a splendid album, was now despoiled of all its ornaments; her writing-desk and work-box were not in their accustomed places, and a beautiful portrait of herself, taken before her marriage, was removed.

Mr. Chambers retired early. I made one more attempt to work on the feelings of Lady Falkland. I even appealed to the weakness of her character, by endeavouring to represent to her the consequence and responsibility of the situation she was deserting, and the insignificant station in society held by a separated wife. But Lady Falkland was not worldly or ambitious—she was only vain and exacting: she persevered in her resolution, and I sorrowfully bade her "Good night!"

All that now remained in my power was fervently to entreat the heavenly Disposer of events, in my prayers, to have pity on these poor deluded young people—to change their proud hearts, to bow their headstrong spirits, and to lead them, at some future time, again to find comfort and happiness in each other. I remained wrapt in thought for about an hour, looking with dread to the events of the morrow, and at length fell asleep.

I awoke again. It was still dark, and I was immediately sensible of a decided smell of fire. I was thoroughly alarmed. Several fires had lately taken place in that neighbourhood, which were supposed to be the work of a man of low character and habits, who had rendered himself offensive to many of the surrounding families. And this man, the garrulous old steward had informed me on the preceding day, had been threatened by Sir Edgar with a prosecution for poaching, and had been heard to avow that he would be revenged on him. I instantly aroused Sir Edgar. We gave the alarm to the servants; and, finding that the fire had only reached a part of the building, and that we had plenty of time for our operations, I dismissed some of them to the neighbouring farm-houses for assistance, and employed others to rescue whatever was most valuable and important from the flames.

First of all, however, I spoke to Lady Falkland's own maid, telling her to awaken her lady gently and quietly, to explain to her that the flames were yet far from the part of the house where she slept; and, having assisted her to dress, to conduct her to a large covered summer-house at the bottom of the garden, where I desired all the females of the family to assemble for the present. Sir Edgar and I were actively employed for some time in directing the labours of the servants, who removed many articles from the house; at length the flames spread with such rapidity, that we were compelled to desist, and I walked down to the summer-house to console and reassure Lady Falkland. Imagine my surprise at discovering that she was not there. Her maid informed me that on entering her room she found it vacant, her bed had not been slept on, nor were any of her clothes to be discovered: it was evident that she had been awake and sitting up at the time of the alarm, and had provided for her own safety by flight.

I must say that I felt more angry with Lady Falkland than terrified about her—for I supposed that, unwilling to identify herself with the interests of her household, or to run the risk of any communication with the husband she was about to leave, she had sought a refuge in one of the farm-houses in the vicinity. I thought it right, however, to inform Sir Edgar of her absence, and was returning to the front of the house for that purpose, when I was startled by a piercing shriek from Lady Falkland's maid, who followed me. I looked up in the direction to which she pointed, and at the window of a little apartment above the drawing-room, what was my horror to behold Lady Falkland making despairing signs for assistance! This little room had been a great favourite with Sir Edgar and herself during the early months of their marriage, on account of the extensive prospect it commanded: she had fitted it up with book-shelves, a guitar, and painting materials, and they passed much of their time there. It afterwards appeared that, unable to sleep, the idea had struck Lady Falkland that she would take a last farewell of this room, endeared by so many early and tender remembrances; she sat down on a low ottoman there—her own peculiar seat—rested her head on the chair usually occupied by Sir Edgar, and gave vent to her grief in repeated and passionate sobs, till at length she fell into that dull and heavy sleep so often the result of continued weeping.

She awoke to a scene of awful danger. She attempted to open the door; but the flames and smoke that assailed her immediately drove her to the window. It was two storeys from the ground: death would be the result! leaping from it. One of the servants immediately ran to a neighbouring farm, where, he said, was a ladder of sufficient length to reach the window; but how poor appeared this prospect of relief, when the danger was so immediate and imminent! The staircase was in flames! Who could venture to ascend it?

I offered large pecuniary rewards to the person who should save her life. One of the under-gardeners, tempted by my munificence, advanced a few steps into the house, and then returned.

"I shall be suffocated in the attempt!" he said. "And what will become of my widow and fatherless children?"

At that moment Sir Edgar, who had been giving directions in a different part of the premises, made his appearance; and, more by gestures than by words, we pointed out to him the situation of his wife. I shall never forget his agonised cry of distress; but he did not waste a moment in deliberation. He snatched from me my military cloak, and rushed into the house. The old steward, who had been in the family at the time of his birth, endeavoured to hold him back.

"You are rushing to certain death, Sir Edgar!" he cried. "Pray return!"

But Sir Edgar shook him off.

"I will save her life!" he exclaimed; "or lose my own in the attempt!" and in another moment he disappeared up the blazing staircase.

I had scarcely time to hope, before Lady Falkland gave me fresh cause for alarm. The flames were approaching rapidly to the place where she stood. She evidently contemplated the desperate measure of a leap from the window; and I was shuddering at the idea of speedily beholding her mangled form, when I saw her drawn back by a strong hand. Sir Edgar wrapped the cloak round her, and carried her from the window. Once more I ventured to breathe. As Sir Edgar had ascended the staircase without material injury, I trusted that he might descend it in the same manner; but at that moment the event so long anticipated took place—the staircase fell in with a tremendous crash, and all hopes of retreat were cut off. A dreadful and inevitable death seemed now the portion of these young people; but there was a melancholy consolation in the idea that they would die clasped in each other's arms, and exchanging mutual assurances of forgiveness. My head began to swim, and my eyes to feel dim, and I was on the point of sinking to the ground, when loud shouting voices near me aroused me to perception: a party of men were approaching, bearing the expected ladder, and headed by Dennis O'Flaherty, an Irish labourer at the farm. Even at this moment the thought passed through my mind of the strange manner in which we estimate the value of a person according to the existence of local circumstances. I had frequently during my visits at the hall conversed with Dennis O'Flaherty, and amused myself much with his brogue, his blunders, and his uncouth manners. I knew him to be an honest and good-natured fellow—but it had never entered into my head that he could possibly be of use to me in any other point of view than as a person to be laughed at; but now, when I contemplated his athletic frame, his muscular limbs, and his bold bearing, I felt that the most gifted genius or the most polished courtier of the age would be an object of inferior consequence in my eyes to Dennis O'Flaherty; and the sweetest music would have been less delightful to my ears than the powerful brogue which made itself heard above all the uproar, in vehement commands to his companions to "waste no time, but set up the ladder quick and steady." It was speedily set up, under Dennis's direction: he was at the top in a moment. Sir Edgar deposited the fainting Lady Falkland in his arms: he speedily bore her down, and Sir Edgar followed in safety. Three loud cheers broke from the assembled spectators as he reached the ground. I could not join in their acclamations, but I silently and fervently offered up a thanksgiving to heaven for the preservation of my dear young friends, and a prayer that the circumstances attending it might have a beneficial effect on their future lives. Lady Falkland was not hurt by the flames, although weeping and hysterical through alarm; she was immediately borne to the farm, and medical assistance was procured for her. Sir Edgar had not escaped so well—he was severely scorched, and in great pain; but in the midst of his sufferings, he could not refrain from telling me of his happiness. The few minutes that elapsed between his entrance into Lady Falkland's room and the arrival of the ladder, had passed in mutual entreaties for pardon, in the most tender interchange of protestations of affection, and in lamentations over their too probable separation from each other by death—although they had both so recently desired to effect a separation in life. At length the medical man, having left Lady Falkland, took Sir Edgar under his care, and immediately silenced his transports by a composing draught; fire-engines arrived from the county-town, and in a few hours the house had ceased to blaze; presenting, however, a lamentable spectacle of blackened and smoking ruins.

Morning came; the father and mother of Lady Falkland were expected, and I rode to meet them—anxious to acquaint them with the happy change in the prospects of their daughter: they were astonished that I should greet them with a smile; still more so when I described the tremendous scene of the preceding night, which seemed little calculated to excite such a token of pleasure. But most grateful were they when I had finished my story, and fervently did they return thanks to the gracious Lord, who had thus wonderfully and mysteriously wrought good out of evil.

I led them to the farm, where they fondly embraced their beloved daughter: she was sitting by the bed-side of her husband, who, when no longer supported by temporary excitement, was suffering severely from the effects of hurts—and a tender and affecting scene ensued. When I left the room, I encountered Mr. Chambers, the lawyer.

"I am exceedingly sorry," he said to me, with a look of doleful apology; "but I have reason to fear that the deed of separation has been destroyed in the flames."

"So much the better," I replied, cheerfully; "Sir Edgar and Lady Falkland are now happily reconciled, and the deed of separation, even if recovered, would be no better than waste paper."

"Pardon me, major!" said he with a provoking curve of his lip; "you can only conjecture that point. We lawyers are not to be satisfied except with proofs—and time alone can prove that the deed will not again be required."

I was glad to escape from this doubting gentleman to the clamorous rejoicings and congratulations of Dennis O'Flaherty. I gave him a sum of money, which Sir Edgar afterwards trebled, and I resolved in my own mind never to laugh at his blunders again, since he had so happily refrained from blundering in a case of life and death. Lady Falkland attended her husband with the most unremitting tenderness and assiduity, during an illness of several weeks. On his recovery they passed some months in travelling, and neither of them made any complaints of want of attention on the part of the other. The house was rebuilt exactly in the same form, but it was more attractive to my eyes than it had ever been—for it had now become a "Mansion of Peace."

"And do you really think it possible, uncle," said Emma, "that a couple who were once on the verge of separation, could be thoroughly happy afterwards?"

"It is not only possible, but it is true," said Major Hervey; "they are as happy, Emma, as your own dear father and mother."

"Now, uncle, I cannot believe you; I shall be like your sceptical friend, Mr. Chambers—only satisfied with proofs!"

"Then I will give you a proof, Emma, which will be quite satisfactory even to the sceptical Mr. Chambers: it is of your own dear father and mother I have been speaking."

Emma cast a wondering, incredulous glance towards her mother.

"Surely my uncle is jesting?" said she.

"No, my love," answered Lady Wilmot; "he has given you, under imaginary names, a narrative of facts. The awful scene took place twenty years ago, on this very site; and the room where we are now sitting answers to the one in which I stood, momentarily expecting a painful and violent death, and shrinking from the idea of appearing before my Creator with a spirit irritated by angry pride, and a conscience burthened with the neglect and defiance of my duties as a wife and as a Christian. I trust that, by the assistance of Providence, I have been enabled to correct the faults of my temper; and most happy, my dear Emma, am I to say, that I have never observed any indications of the same imperious and exacting disposition in you; but in case any future alteration in your situation should bring to light defects in your temper hitherto unknown, I am glad that your uncle has told you these particulars of the early wedded life of myself and your dear father. Your choice, I trust, will be cautious and prudent; but that choice once made, consider that it is equally your duty and interest to bear patiently with the foibles of the object of it; and ever remember that the bonds you assume are not merely light and temporary ties, but are to be worn by yourself, and by the husband of your selection, in fidelity and constancy, 'so long as ye both shall live.'"

CLOUDS AND SUNBEAMS.

BY MRS. M. W. CURTIS.

WE should not prize the sunbeams
Were it not for the clouds,
To enhance their value,
While the mist enshrouds;
After storms are over,
Gladly hail we then,
Sunbeams gaily dancing
Through the leafy glen.

WE should not prize the sunbeams
That deck the paths of life,
Were it not that changes
With our days are rife.
Thus we learn the value
Of a better home,
Far above the cloudlets,
Where no shadows come.

COURAGE OF THE FELLAHS.

It cannot be said that the fellahs are a particularly courageous people, although good soldiers have been made out of them. As a rule, indeed, they are timid; and, like all nations south of England and Germany, are valiant in gusts, and more from fear or self-love than virtue. It is amusing to see two gigantic men engaged in a quarrel that would at once be decided by fisticuffs in our pugilistic latitude. The party aggrieved, or considering himself so, holds on by the garments of the other, uttering unintelligible cries and threats, and the following dialogue generally takes place:

"Will you let me go?"

"No, I will not, Wallah!"

"If you do not let me go, I will break your teeth, Wallah!"

"I will not let go, Wallah!"

After about half an hour, the person held—probably feeling that he ought to go to work—makes a show of hitting the other, who only hangs on the tighter, and yells louder. Then the bystanders interfere, saying, "Maellesh! Maellesh!"—"It is no matter!"—words that seem to have a magical power, and are also used as synonyms to "I beg pardon!" if you tread on a stranger's corn. A reconciliation is effected easily enough, if the disputants be of about equal weight; but I have seen a big man beat a youth very savagely for persisting in holding on his own gown. It is to be observed, however, that this is considered a very disgraceful act; for as long as the hand remains clasped, the victim is supposed to be under the protection of his enemy. This, perhaps, accounts satisfactorily for the immense number of threats that are expended in vain in these quarrels. According to rule, you must free your coat-tail by artifice, or gentle violence, before you hit.

WOOING A WIDOW.

"SAMUEL, my son, beware of the vidders." The old knight of the whip, we will admit, had reason to complain; but no man who has an unmortgaged heart can associate with an interesting "relict," without falling head over heels in love with her. To resist is as impossible as it would be for the lilacs not to feel the influence of the spring sun, or the cherries to remain pale under the ripening heats of July. Men, when bereaved, can absorb their minds with money-getting, politics, authorship, or glory. But if a widow's affection wanders about, like Noah's dove, without a resting-place, she is wretched—the past is all gone, and the future presents nothing but cheerless desolation, if her love, pent up, is to corrode the heart. Blistered be the tongue that can ridicule, and paralysed the hand that can libel the widows, who are as far before the tribe of girlhood, as bright summer, rich with fruition, is before fickle and inconstant spring, resplendent with blossoms, fair, yet tasteless. Performances are better than promises; perfect six-and-twenty is far preferable to giggling "sweet sixteen."

Who to choose can hesitate—
Mature love, or fickle beauty?
Need we then our choice relate?
We turn from each verdant face
That no sweet emotions grace—
And to widows pay our duty.

But how woo them? How persuade them to approach the hymeneal altar a second time, as a white-robed victim offered up to some human "lord of creation?" How ensnare them again, when, perhaps, their first husbands—as some men do—set them up in their houses, as the ancients did their Lares and their Lemures, for playthings and ornaments—not household gods, to be deified only when their owners were in good humour, and trodden under foot in every excess of passion? We will not advise you, friend suitor, for we despise advice; but we will offer you translations of four letters, given to us as autographs, which embody a complete romance.

The writer of these letters is a notable diplomatist, and one of the most distinguished representatives of the French imperial court. He is rich, he is powerful, he is envied; in a word, he has a position—which means, a right to look down upon all poor fellows, who have nothing but their intellect. But when he penned these letters, his only opulence was riches of the heart, treasures of the mind, and other gems of youth which are so recklessly squandered away in early life. He was then but twenty years of age; and if he ever sees these early waifs in print, he will find a wide difference between their style and that of the voluminous "state papers," for which he is now so celebrated.

Angoulême, August 6, 1820.

MY DEAR LOUIS.—It is now a week, old class-mate, since I arrived at my home, bringing with me nothing but regrets, unpaid bills, and a diploma. This old city, calm and silent, saddened me as I entered its streets in the Paris coach; and when I reached the door of my paternal mansion, I was ready to weep. Alas! my dear friend, death had passed across that threshold since I left, and I was not welcomed by the fond mother who had so affectionately bid me farewell. Alone at the deserted fire-side, the city seemed like an immense necropolis—for the much-loved dead obscured my view of the living. Three long days were passed in silence—in solitude—in meditation.

But on the fourth day, the sun shone again into my heart. Again I saw crowds in the streets; and on going forth was greeted by old friends, who cheered my sadness by many a kind word of consolation. The source of this change, dear Louis, was a charming woman, who had attended my mother during her last illness—my cousin Sylvia. From the time she called, accompanied by the physician, to give me in person my mother's parting words, I have ceased to live entombed, and everything has worn a brighter aspect. Could you see her who has thus thawed the ice-bound tide of my existence, I am sure, dear Louis, you would admire her—nay, love her, as I do. Perhaps, then, it is well that you cannot see her—for it would be sad for such old friends, playmates, schoolmates, class-mates, as we have been, to be rivals.

My cousin is twenty-five years of age; she has been a widow three years. Except in the romances of Rousseau, which we so often read together while in the freshman's class, there exists no woman to whom I can compare her; and in her are united all the charms, the accomplishments, and the graces of those heroines—each one of whom we used to consider a model of perfection.

Alas! that I think so—that I love her so madly—that her image reigns in my thoughts, and that my heart is like a deep well in which is mirrored nought save the brilliant star directly over head. You, dear Louis, may blame me, but you must not denounce me; you may laugh at me, but you must pity me; for I love Sylvia, and I feel assured that she never will love me. Adieu.

Angoulême, August 10, 1820.

Thanks, dear Louis, for your friendly letter, and I will again inflict upon you my love-chronicle. Last evening, Sylvia's father gave a large ball, and I accepted an invitation with joy. My cousin was resplendent with youth, with vivacity, and with beauty; Oh that you could have seen her! She wore a rich black silk, cut in the Spanish style, and the tiny Andalusian mantle was balanced, as if by attraction, upon a bust which exceeded in beauty that of the famed Venus of Milo. Need I say that Sylvia, thus radiant and enchanting, was the belle of the evening? And while she smiled graciously upon troops of would-be friends, false flatterers, hollow-hearted suitors, must I tell you that she was cruel to me alone—to me, the timid lover, who would risk all to serve her, and pour out my blood like water to execute her bidding?

Calling me into the conservatory, where no one saw us, Sylvia returned to me a note, which I had sent her in the afternoon, concealed in a bouquet—a note which had cost me many sighs, and in which I had told my love. "Cousin Lucien," said she, in a voice slightly tinged with indignation, "you are crazy." I answered, hanging my head, "I fear I am." No more was said; but oh! if I am thus a prey to hope, and fear, and disappointment, of what use will be reason? Pity me, my dear friend—pity me. I have need of pity, of friendship—for I can scarcely stand the shock.

Uncsciously, however, my cousin gave me, during the evening, souvenirs enough to last my life-time. First, I danced with her, and necessarily her beautiful hand reposed in mine. Then came the waltz, that dancing reverie of Germany, in which I had the precious right to encircle her with my arm, and to gaze at her with adoration, at kissing distance. It seemed, as we circled around, that I was dreaming, to the sound of celestial harmony. Generally, my dear Louis, noise awakens us, and chases away happy dreams; but last evening, my friend, when the music ceased, silence awoke me!

That is not all. I picked up my cousin Sylvia's embroidered handkerchief, and it seems that the perfume yet steals across my senses; I kissed her fan; I stole a flower that dropped from the bouquet on her waist. That flower, withered and faded as it is, I cherish under a glass globe, with more pride than I should the largest diamond in a sovereign's diadem.

You say that you shall endeavour to visit Angoulême this autumn. When you come, I will take you into my chamber, and open the doors of a wardrobe in which my treasures are enshrined. I will show you this precious flower, a glove which she touched, a glass from which she drank, the perfume she uses—and I will say, with a sigh, here are my riches, my treasures, my comforts!

I now comprehend a phrase which I once saw (in some book, the title of which I have forgotten), and which I could not comprehend until I began to adore my cousin:

"Unhappy love has its charms!"

Happy lovers need extraordinary emotions, grand dramas, and all the joyous pomp of outward show; but we who are disdained ask but silence, calm, clouds and dreams. Successful suitors enjoy, after all, nothing but terrestrial joys; but we, who inhabit dream-land, enjoy aerial pleasures from imaginary sources. They love in prose, and we love in verse. Happy love, my dear Louis, is but a prosy history; but unhappy love is a thrilling poem. Yet, after all, one would not read poetry always. Adieu! Come and see Sylvia; comfort me.

Angoulême, August 20, 1820.

For a week past, my friend, there has been a comedy represented at my uncle's, in which I have played the part of "the dupe," and which, when it ceases, will seal my happiness for life, while it will make a certain Captain Lamberty rejoice. This captain is a stalwart militia officer, six feet high, whose only merit lies in his voice, which resounds over the parade-ground, or through the church, where he sings the bass parts. He has but a moderate fortune, a moderate intellect, and a moderate reputation. But he dresses in the latest fashion, talks about horses, and sings romantic ballads. Such, dear Louis, is the fortunate lover of my bewitching cousin—she whose first husband was a sensible, hard-working lawyer. Oh, woman—woman! and especially a widow!

The captain has one merit in the eyes of a coquette. He can enter a drawing-room with ease, and has an abundance of gossiping small-talk. He knows all the latest Paris fashions; all the court scandal about jewellery, and what bonnets are to be worn next year. This is milk and honey for the ladies of our interior city, and they in general, with cousin Sylvia in particular, listen with delight to this elegant fop, who converses like a milliner's apprentice, or a barber's boy.

The captain excels in describing, with all the eloquence of an ignorant Don Juan, the fascinating pleasures of the metropolis, and narrates, with many a personal adventure, the balls, the masquerades, the festivals, and the intrigues which he has participated in while at Paris.

Such, dear Louis, is the lover of my cousin Sylvia.

She loves him—she is betrothed to him. Yes, she has avowed it—and why? My uncle does not fancy the captain, and my cousin has requested me to act as "a screen" to shield their love! Yes; she uses me as a screen, while he enjoys, behind my protecting shade, that love which I so covet. Young, innocent, and enthusiastic, I consent blindly to this disguise. Above all, I can now see my cousin. What more can I ask?

I go there every morning; I remain there all day. I blush when I speak to her, and turn pale when she replies. Every one says I love her—and, for once, every one tells the truth. My uncle laughs, and says that widows are dangerous! I believe him, and yet, like the moth glittering around the candle-light, I am happy. Will the flame consume?

Every fair afternoon we walk out, my cousin taking my arm. The captain, who meets us as if by accident, walks on the other side of her, as if he should accompany us but a few steps, and his apparent inferiority makes me happy.

When she goes a-shopping I accompany her, and discuss learnedly upon the colour of a silk, the form of a bonnet, the beauty of a jewel, or the richness of embroidery. My counsel is taken as law, and need I say how much joy it gives me to be thus associated with Sylvia, even on so trifling matters. Of course, all think I have captivated her. Nay, my friends congratulate me.

I wait upon her to the theatre, where I take a prominent box, and sit proudly by her side throughout the performance, whilst the poor captain only comes in for a few moments; he remains in the background. Meanwhile, I whisper in her ear, toy with her fan, and play the part of an accepted lover more naturally, if possible, than any actor performs upon the stage. Alas! like them, I only play a part.

New I am happy, but how long will it last? Can I always be a screen? And how can I support the shock, when my services will be no longer required, and Captain Lamberty weds my cousin Sylvia? hateful thought! but I will not bore you with my woes, present or prospective. Adieu.

Angoulême, September 25, 1820.

It is a long time since I wrote you, my dear Louis, and two letters from you lie upon my table unanswered. Let me render an account of my silence.

Two days after I last wrote you, I became so worked up that I determined to release myself—not from my love, but from my blindness, and the culpable weakness of my conduct.

The next morning—it was a month ago or more—I called on my cousin, and found that she had gone to see a relative who was indisposed. As I was leaving the house, who should I meet but Captain Lamberty, dressed finely, and twirling a little cane.

"Good morning, Lucien!" said he.

"Good morning, captain!" I replied, not liking his familiar address. I had made my mind up how to act, and now only waited an opportunity.

"Lucien," said he, with a malicious and triumphant smile, "I am glad to see you, and to thank you!"

"Thank me for what, captain?"

"For my happiness, which I owe to your adroitness, or to your innocence."

"What is this happiness, captain, and what is this innocence?"

"Thanks to you, Lucien, I have wooed and won your cousin Sylvia without any impertinent gossip or scandal; for no one suspected what I was about, so occupied were they with you. The comedy has been well played, but to-day the first act ends, and we change places. You fall back, and I, coming forward as the accepted lover, invite you to the wedding."

"When, captain?"

"Next Monday. And now, Lucien, if you have not been innocent, let me congratulate you on the admirable manner in which you have acted your part."

"The part of a screen, captain, is it not?"

"Precisely."

"Captain Lamberty, you are a coward!"

"Sir!"

"You are a coward, sir!" and as I spoke I felt my cheeks glow with anger. "I have long suspected your meanness, innocent as you thought me; and last night I determined to call you out, for your dishonourable conduct towards my uncle." Just then a friend approached us, and I raised my voice. "I repeat it—you are a coward, and I defy you to resent the appellation."

"Boy!" he exclaimed, contemptuously.

"Boy!" I rejoined. "I am old enough to fire a pistol, and before yonder sun sets, I must die, or I will have killed you." Then, addressing my friend: "François, you witness this challenge; I shall need your services."

"Must I kill you to-day?" said the captain.

"I thirst for your blood," was my reply.

"Your own be upon your rash head. Send your friend to my lodgings, and I will soon let out some of your warm blood! Good-day, and a speedy meeting!"

So we separated.

Long before sunset, we met on a secluded plain, near the river bank. The fifteen paces agreed upon were counted, the signal was given, the balls whistled through the air, and I fell face downwards, murmuring the name of my cousin Sylvia.

Oh, my friend, what unhappiness I experienced that night, as I lay at the house of my uncle, whither I had been carried! It was but a flesh-wound, the doctors said, and I could not die for her I loved!

But revenge came the next morning. I had shot the captain in the back—for as he fired, he had turned round and run—so said the doctor. And soon in came Sylvia, looking more beautiful than ever, to nurse her "foolish cousin." That day, as she sat by my bed-side, I told her, in a low voice, of my love, my hopes, my devotion, my sufferings—and I had the delight to draw, first a regret, then a sigh, then a tear. I was safe. As for the captain, he has left the city, to escape the jeers with which he was greeted.

I have not yet recovered, but am happy. The joys of an unsuccessful lover are over, and the sorrows of a successful suitor are about to commence. Come and let us discuss the difference.

Paris, January 4, 1821.

DEAR LOUIS,—I am at the Hotel des Princes, with my bride, and am the happiest of men. Come and dine with us at five. Sylvia sends her love.

And so, friend reader, was the widow wooed and won. She could appreciate devotion, and we have never heard that she was suspected of having seen more summers than her husband. A cheerful heart and a good mantuamaker cover a multitude of years.

A CANNIBAL BANQUET IN THE FEEJEE ISLANDS.

A LARGE house, called the "Ulu ni Puaka," or "pig's head," was prepared for the accommodation of themselves and their families, and food collected from all directions for their entertainment. According to custom, a family called the Vusarandabe was called upon to furnish meat for the first breakfast, and, as it concerned their pride that this should be of the best, steps were taken to provide one or two human bodies. As Bau was not actually at war with any of the neighbouring tribes, and no enemies were to be had, some little management was necessary to secure this supply; but at last, through the co-operation of a tributary town on Viti Levu, called Nandavio, and, it was said, by the assistance of two Tahitians, or Malayo-Polynesians, residing at Bau, two poor wretches were entrapped on a small island, called Anutha, or Yanutha, and brought to the capital, where they were slaughtered and eaten.

The missionaries, who are disposed to think well of Thakombau's intentions, suppose that, had the example not been set by the Vusarandabe, he would have been satisfied with supplying his guests with pigs.

It now, however, became a point of honour with him, his turn for supplying the breakfast having arrived, not to be excelled in munificence by his inferiors; and the chiefs of Nasiali, a city of Rewa, which had been lately subjugated, were ordered to forward the required provision to Bau. One man only was obtained from this source, when Navindi, the "Turanga ni Lasakau," or chief of the fishermen, whose duty it is more particularly to procure human flesh, and who might have taken offence at the presumption of the Vusarandabe in preceding him, was ordered to perform his horrible office.

Taking with him, accordingly, the "nambete," or priest, he started with several canoes for Nakelo,* a town situated on a river or branch of the sea connecting Rewa with the coast of the main land opposite to Bau. An ambush laid here having failed, it became doubtful whether it would not be necessary to have recourse to their own resources: that is, to slaughter some of their own slaves to furnish the Butoni banquet—a sacrifice of course to be avoided if possible. The priest's aid was accordingly invoked, Navindi hinting at the same time that, should they continue unsuccessful, he (the priest) would probably be one of the victims himself. The oracle having been consulted, a hundred bodies are promised by the gods, and the party continued their course, skirting along under the overhanging mangroves, to the village of Notho. Here they lay concealed till low water, when the women are accustomed to come to the coast to pick shell-fish for food, and, sallying out at the proper time, secured fourteen of these defenceless and unsuspecting beings, one or two being clubbed to death, as a rush was made to escape. One man, attempting to save either his wife or daughter, shared her fate, but, with this exception, all were of the softer sex, and they were immediately conducted in triumph to Bau.

On Sunday, the 29th of July, the hollow sound of the awful "lali," or sacred drum, bore across the water to Viwa the intelligence that a cargo of human victims had arrived in Bau, and a native Christian chief (I believe Namosemala), who had quitted the capital to bring the information to the mission, related to the shuddering ladies, whose husbands were absent at Bau, or Sandalwood Bay, in Vanua Levu, on their usual annual meeting, the whole of the circumstances of the capture. In the course of the day different reports as to the intentions of the authorities were brought over, but in the evening came a definitive one, that all were to be slaughtered on the morrow. And then was enacted a scene which ought to be ever memorable in the history of this mission.

On the Monday morning, Mrs. Lyth and Mrs. Calvert, accompanied only by the Christian chief above-mentioned, embarked in a canoe for Bau, to make an effort to save the lives of the doomed victims. Each carried a whale's tooth decorated with ribbons—a necessary offering on preferring a petition to a chief; for even in this exciting moment these admirable women did not neglect the ordinary means of succeeding in their benevolent object. As they landed at the wharf, not far from the house of old Tanoa, the father of Thakombau, and in this instance the person to whom they were to address themselves, the shrieks of two women then being slaughtered for the day's entertainment chilled their blood, but did not daunt their resolution. They were yet in time to save a remnant of the sacrifice. Ten had been killed and eaten, one had died of her wounds, the life of one girl had been begged by Thakombau's principal wife, to whom she was delivered as a slave, and three only remained. Regardless of the sanctity of the place, it being "tabu" to women, they forced themselves into old Tanoa's chamber, who demanded, with astonishment at their temerity, what these women did there? The Christian chief, who well maintained his lately adopted character, answered for them, that they came to solicit the lives of the surviving prisoners, presenting at the same time the two whale's teeth. Tanoa, apparently still full of wonder, took up one of these, and, turning to a messenger, desired him to carry it immediately to Navindi, and ask "If it were good?" A few minutes were passed in anxious suspense. The messenger returned, and "It is good," was Navindi's answer. The women's cause was gained, and old Tanoa thus pronounced his judgment: "Those who are dead, are dead; those who are alive shall live." With their three rescued fellow-creatures these heroic women retired, and already had the satisfaction of experiencing that their daring efforts had produced a more than hoped-for effect.

—Cruise of the Havannah.

* Nakelo has in Feejee the extraordinary distinction of eating no human flesh, abstinence from which is its peculiar "tabu."

FACETIÆ.

Flour is an article well enough in its sphere, but we deprecate the rubbing of it on ladies' faces.

Why is a cannon-ball on a level plain like a lump of baker's dough? Because when fired it generally ends in a roll.

It is said of the French ladies, that their fondness for effect runs to such excess, that widows, who have lost their husbands, practise attitudes of despair before a looking-glass.

By no means bad.—A "Knight of the Whip" makes the following inquiry of us: "I wonder if an editor's leaders ever get over the traces?"

Not amiss.—A humourist, the other day, remarking upon the dispute pending between the teetotallers and the "jolly full" bottlers of this borough, termed it the "War of the Red and White Noses."

What is "CANYASSING"?—A witness (Irish, of course, before the Clare Election Committee) having said he had been "all day canvassing," was directed to "define" canvassing, which he did thus: "To try to induce and force the voters to vote for Corny O'Brien, and if they would not, to give them drink till they could not vote at all."

As proof of the fact that girls are useful articles, and that the world could not very well get along without them, a late writer states it as a fact, that if all the girls were driven out of the world, in one generation, the boys would all go out after them.

Ethical.—Betting is immoral; but how can the man who bets be worse than one who is no better?

An old maid in Connecticut, being at a loss for a pin-cushion, made use of an onion. On the following morning she found that all the needles had tears in their eyes.

"Dick! I say, why don't you turn that buffalo robe to the other side out? Hair side in is the warmest." "Bah! Tom! you get out! Do you suppose the animal himself didn't know how to wear his hide?"

An Epitaph.—There is an Italian epitaph which reads thus: "I was well—wanted to be better—and here I am."

Mrs. Harris says her "darter" Jane was only married a little over a year when she had "two boys, both sons." Smart gal, that.

One of the latest fashions for gentlemen, is the "barber pole" pattern for pantaloons; the stripes ascend spirally round the leg, giving the wearer the appearance of a double-barrelled cork-screw.

Fond of Company.—People who buy second-hand bedsteads.

We overheard a poor weather-bound individual, the other day, who was caught in the rain, humming to himself in a doorway:

'Twas ever thus from childhood's hour,
That chilling fate has on me fell,
There always comes a soaking shower,
When I hain't got no umberell!

The following receipt for "light refreshments" we find in the Detroit Free Press, and recommend to the railroad restaurants: "California Sandwiches—A slice of leather placed between two white pine chips. Price, One Shilling. Mustard gratis!"

Precocious.—"Mother, you musn't hurt me for running away from school any more!" "Why?" "Because my school-book says that ants are the most industrious beings in the world; and ain't I a true ant?"

Girls, Beware!—Jean Paul thus cautions young girls: The young men fall on their knees before you; but remember, it is but as the infantry before the cavalry, that they may conquer and kill; or as the hunter, who only on bended knees takes aim at his victim.

The first law of nature is marriage, and yet man is the only creature that resists it. Who ever saw an old bachelor robin, or a female blue bird with strong thoughts of dying an old maid? No one. Every created thing becomes a parent, and this is just what it was intended they should become.

Silence.—One might have heard a pin fall, is a proverbial expression of silence; but it has been eclipsed by the French phrase—you might have heard the unfolding of a lady's cambric pocket-handkerchief.

Pleasant.—To make money ourselves, or to see our neighbours lose it. By the way, the quantity of bad luck that a man can endure in a friend is really astonishing.

A late visitor to Cuba divides the inhabitants into classes—one of which makes a living by manufacturing cigars, and the other by smoking them.

Sickness has a wonderful influence on the heart. If we ever feel like doing a generous action, it is while recovering from a long course of fever and confinement. Health has its uses, but improving our virtue and goodness is not one of them. All our crimes are committed by men overflowing with blood and robustness.

A Dutchman related a misfortune which befel his son, in the following manner: "Poor Hans! he bit himself mit a rattlesnake, and vash sick into his ped speechless for six weeks in te munt of August—and all his cry vas, 'Vater! vater!' and he couldn't eat noting except a leetle tea."

Precaution.—Somebody says of Madame de Genlis, that she reproved her librarian for placing works written by male and female authors upon the same shelf. "Never do it," she said, "without putting a prayer-book between them."

BRYANT writes home that the Turks are rapidly advancing in civilisation and refinement. In proof of this, he mentions that they get drunk, play at billiards, and take advantage of the money market.

Things are pretty evenly divided, after all. The poor man has no money, while the rich man has no appetite. The former lives in dread of the alms-house, and the latter of dyspepsia.

That Man is not totally depraved, is shown by the fact, that whenever we see two dogs fighting, we always sympathise with the smaller one.

A doctor and a poet quarrelled: an indifferent person was applied to, to settle the dispute: when the latter made the following reply: "You are faulty, both; do penance for your crimes: bard, take his physic—doctor, read his rhymes!"

Fearful Waste.—The only notion that a woman has of time, is shown by her constantly endeavouring to imitate in her person, as near as she can, the shape of the hour-glass.

Politicians are like lions in a menagerie, constantly stirred up, that the crowd may see their size and hear their roar.

Table Moving is attracting great attention, and how to perform the feat is considered an accomplishment. It is pretty evident to us, that if the delusion extends much further, the sheriff will show them how the whole furniture can be moved.

An honest Norfolk grazier, who had seen Richard the Third performed one night, waited upon the manager next morning to say, that if the gentleman who wanted a horse on the previous evening held his mind, he had an abundance of cattle in his meadows, and should be happy to deal with him.

A waggoner passing a store, was asked what he had in his waggon. He replied

Three-fourths of a cross, and a circle complete,
An upright where two semi-circles do meet
A rectangle triangle standing on feet;
Two semi-circles, and a circle complete.

Three-fourths of a cross is a T. A circle complete is an O. An upright where two semi-circles meet is a B. A triangle standing on feet is an A. Two semi-circles are CO, and a circle is O. TOBACCO is what was in the waggon.

When Coleridge was in love, he was compelled to leave his inamorata, and was consequently wretched. As he left the scene of his amour, however, he by degrees got reconciled, and philosophically came to this conclusion: "Love is a local anguish. I am fifty miles distant, and am not half so miserable."

A person having asked how many dog days there were in a year, received for an answer, that it was impossible to number them, "as every dog had his day."

The Russian women think their husbands are becoming cold and indifferent if they do not flog them once a week. Mirabeau's valet, Teutch, regarded it as a great favour and compliment to be kicked by his master; and it is said that, however low-spirited he was before, this always set him in an excellent humour.

A lady, who is now in Italy, on asking a poor woman who had placed one candle at the image of a saint, and another at the image of the devil, why she placed one at each, was told by the poor devotee, that "she knew not into whose hands she might fall, so she thought she had better be civil to both." What a politician in petticoats!

A clergyman happening to pass a boy weeping bitterly, he halted, and asked: "What is the matter, my little fellow?" The boy replied: "We could hardly get enough to eat before, and now there's another one come!" "Hush thy mourning, and wipe off those tears," said the clergyman; "and remember that He never sends mouths without He sends victuals to put into them." "I know that," said the boy; "but then all the mouths comes to our house and the victuals to your house."

A Fond Housekeeper.—A toy-seller who had recently taken to himself a wife, was exceedingly tender to her in epithet; his frequent address was: "My lamb!" One day a little dirty-faced boy asked for a toy, and the busy toy-seller said, "My lamb, serve that boy, please." The boy was served, and went away, but soon returned to have his toy changed. The toy-seller doubted whether it was bought at his shop, and said: "Who served thee?" The lad replied: "It wor t' lamb, sir." The toy-seller blushed, exchanged the toy, and for the future addressed his wife as if she were a rational creature.

An advertisement appeared the other day, announcing for sale the "mask of Cromwell, taken from the face of Oliver immediately after death; it was in the family possession of Dr. Miller for the last sixty years, and an authentic pedigree can be given as to how they became possessed of it." Another advertisement offered to the consideration of all whom it may concern: "part of the hair and whiskers of Edward IV. (undoubted), having been in the possession of the advertiser thirty years. Any description of property taken in exchange."

Babies.—Baby-carts on narrow side-walks are awful bores, especially to a hurried business man. Are they? Suppose you, and a certain pair of blue eyes, that you would give half your patrimony to win, were joint proprietors of that baby, I shouldn't dare to stand very near you and call it "a nuisance." It's all very well for bachelors to turn up their single blessed noses at these little dimpled Cupids; but just wait till their time comes! See 'em, the minute their name is written "papa," pull up their dickies and strut down the street as if the state owed them a pension. When they enter the office, see their old partner (to whom babies have long since ceased to be a novelty) laugh in his sleeve at the new-fledged dignity with which that baby advent is announced. How perfectly astonished they feel that they should have been so infatuated as not to perceive that a man is a perfect cypher till he is at the head of a family! How frequently one may see them now looking in at the shop-windows with intense interest, at little hats, coral and bells, and baby-jumpers. How they love to go home to dinner, and press the little velvet cheek to their business faces! Was there ever any music half so sweet to the ear as it first lisped "papa?" Oh, how closely and imperceptibly, one by one, that little plant winds its tendrils round the parent stem! How anxiously they hang over its cradle when the cheek flushes and the lip is fever-parched; and how wide, and deep, and how long a shadow in their happy homes its little grave would cast! My dear sir—depend upon it, one's own baby is never a nuisance! Love heralds its birth.

A French Joke.—Passing one evening along the Rue de Seine, at the corner of the Rue de Bussy, about half-past twelve, just as they were closing the emporium of The Two Baboons, which was commonly done at half-past eleven, Romieu dashed head-foremost into the shop. "Where is the proprietor of the establishment?" "He is in bed, long since." "But he sleeps in the house, I hope?" "Certainly." "Conduct me to him at once—I must see him this instant." "Your business must be very urgent, then." "I tremble with anxiety for fear of being too late." "Well, sir, as you assure me—" "Oh, go on—go on!" The shopman did not take time even to close the street-door, but ushered Romieu to the chamber where Mr. P. was snoring like a bass viol. "Mr. P.—Mr. P!" cried out the man. "Eh, eh! what's that? Go to Halifax! (Halifax was not precisely the place indicated, but I respect my readers' nerves). What do you want?" "Sir, it isn't me!" "Eh! who then?" "A gentleman who wishes to say two words to you." "And at this hour!" "Sir, he says he can't help it." "And where is this gentleman?" "He is at the door. Come in, sir—come in!" Romieu entered on tiptoe, his hat in hand, and his face one smile. "I beg a thousand pardons, sir, for the trouble I am giving." "Don't mention it, I beg. What can I do to oblige you?" "Sir, I wish to speak to your partner?" "To my partner! I have no partner." "No partner?" "None!" "And pray, sir, why have you put on your sign-board 'The Two Baboons'? It is a shameless imposition on the public!"

How to Coin a Joke.—It is singular that so much astonishment has been created by a man walking with his feet on the ceiling, when no less a person than her Majesty may be daily seen with her head on the floor.—Punch.

Mulish Obstinacy in Dress.—Our young men of the present day run about with black stripes down their legs—not unlike the legs of mules. Why not carry the likeness further, and allow the stripes, as in the case of mules, to run all over their coats? Surely he who dresses himself like a mule must be "next to a donkey," and, accordingly, cannot make himself too ridiculous. A sharp young friend of ours, who has studied heraldry, merely to joke upon it, calls these thick, heavy stripes, "The bars-sinister of taste."—Ibid.

A Case of Russian Leather.—We trust there will be no war between England and Russia, because it would involve an interruption of our commerce with that empire: whilst, nevertheless, we should be compelled to send out tanners to the Russians to tan their hides for them.—Ibid.

A LITTLE POLITICAL GAME OF SPELLING.

England: I say, Russia, I'll bet you anything you can't spell Constantinople?

Russia: Can't I, just? Why, it's easy enough!

England: It's not so easy to get through Constantinople, my boy, as you may imagine! Come, just you try.

Russia: Here goes at it, then! C-o-n—Con; s-t-a-n—stan, Constan; t-i—ti, Constanti; n-o—no—

England (stopping him): No!

Russia (extremely puzzled): No?

England (positively): No, no!

France (ditto): No, no, no!

Turkey (in consequence of the firmness of the other two, plucks up courage, and also says positively): No, no, no, no!

All together (most positively): No! no! no! no!

[Russia tries back, and tries very hard several times, but each time he tries it on, he is pulled up suddenly by the Noes. He gets very angry, and at last, not seeing his way at all clearly through Constantinople, he retires in the greatest rage and disgust; England, France, and Turkey still calling out after him, "No! no! no! no!"—Ibid.]

An American lady, on handsome men, thus replied to an individual who said somebody was not calculated to win a lady's heart, because he was not handsome: Begging your pardon, Solomon, that's a great mistake! It is quite unessential that a man should be "handsome." Let him pray the gods, in the first place, to make him a gentleman—a gentleman at home as well as abroad. Let him stipulate for a fine figure and courtly manner, and leave it to their discretion after that to shape his eyes, nose, and mouth, provided they don't make them hideous. Save us from your plaid-painted, border-vested, big-eaved, moustached, cologne-sprinkled, bejewelled, brainless exquisite. Give us a well-informed, plainly-dressed, self-possessed, intelligent masculine, perfectly at home upon all subjects, foreign and domestic; neither cringing to the great, nor opposing the little; who puts one hand on his sword, and the other on his heart, when a woman's name is mentioned; who raises no blush on the cheek of humble innocence; who holds in contempt no living thing that God has made; who can pity the weak and erring without a pharisaical reviling; who can argue without loss of temper and dignity; who scorns a bribe or an oath; who has an arm for trembling age, a smile for prattling infancy, and a strong, brave heart for the oppressed and defenceless. But a "pretty man, a pink and white Sir Brainless!" the united work of a tailor, hatter, shoemaker, and perfumer! Heaven save the mark! Women know better."

PATTERN WIVES.

MRS. VIOLET was one of your pattern wives; never laced her boots without consulting her husband. Her dressmaker always stood, scissors in hand, till he had turned over in his mind the relative advantages of flounces and tucks, boddices and basket waists. Mrs. Violet was merely an echo of Mr. Violet; her voice was soft and low; her motions slow and proper; and she hung on his arm and cuddled up to his side, in a manner convincing to the most sceptical that she was "the weaker vessel."

Now, I suppose you think Mr. Violet was master of his own house. St. Peter! no more than you are! There was a look in the corner of that meek creature's eye that was as good as a loaded musket; and Mr. Violet fetched and carried accordingly. Not that she ever raised that musical voice above a sighing whisper; no, indeed! she left that for the strong-minded monster woman, who never read this passage in John Milton—"He for God only, she for God in him." Nevertheless, Mrs. Violet's knowledge of the world was confined entirely to the length of her apron-string; still it was always "husband," and "dear Violet;" even when the poor wretch knew that his life wasn't worth twopenny, did he abate "one jot or tittle" of his matrimonial loyalty.

What gave me convulsions was to hear her defer to his opinion in company, and then to see him fetch up in the middle of a sentence, at a gentle reminder from the toe of her slipper under the table!

Every night Violet stepped into the confession box, never daring to swerve a particle from the truth: so fully was he impressed with the idea of Mrs. Violet's clairvoyance. How he tended the baby, and tied the children's pinafores! How he sewed on missing buttons, when the blinds were closed! How lovingly Mrs. Violet looked over his hymn-book in meeting! How sweetly she smiled when she offered him the hassock! How touchingly she turned to her husband to reply for her, when a neighbour asked her a question! How he didn't know any more than you do the contents of his letters till she had inspected the same. How his best coat and vest were locked up on Sunday night at sunset, lest he should be tempted to make himself beautiful for some other Violet—how he had to eat "picked up dinners," on the full conviction that the roast turkey allowance had gone to her milliner's. How Tommy had a "soldier cap," made of the newspaper, before his paternal could get a bird's-eye view of it. How Mrs. Violet gave him private tuition in putting on her shawl affectionately, which exhibition was to come off in public the first favourable opportunity. How all the humbugged, keen-sighted (?) public remarked, "what an uncommonly affectionate couple were Mr. and Mrs. Violet!"

How Mrs. Violet died one day, and how her husband drew a long breath, and took a vow to find her antipodes, if she existed on terra firma—and how he married a saucy little beauty, who cuffs his ears in public, and loves him like ten thousand in private; who mends her baby and darns needle, and leaves him in undisturbed possession of his liberty and his ledger. Happy Violet! he believes with me, now, in blue eyes and Paradise.—Fanny Fern.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

If spring puts forth no blossoms, in summer there will be no beauty, and in autumn no fruit. So, if youth be trifled away without improvement, riper years will be contemptible, and old age miserable.

Do the frowns of fate startle you? Fear her smiles still more.

REPUTATION is like polished steel—it may be tarnished by a breath.

WHEN an extravagant friend wishes to borrow your money, consider which of the two you had rather lose.

PRUDENT and active men, who know their strength, and use it with limit and circumspection, alone go far in the affairs of the world.

If thou hast fear of those who command thee, spare those who obey thee.

VANITY is the great commanding passion. It is this that produces the most grand and heroic deeds, or impels to the most dreadful crimes. Save me but from this passion, and I can defy the others. They are mere urchins, but this is a giant.

A SMILE.—Day begins in darkness, grows bright, strong, and glorious, and in darkness closes; and so man commences life in weak childhood, attains to the meridian of manhood, and second childhood ends his day career.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FLUENCY.—The common fluency of speech in many men, and most women, is owing to a scarcity of matter and a scarcity of words; for whoever is master of a language, and has a mind full of ideas, will be apt, in speaking, to hesitate upon the choice of both; whereas, common speakers have only one set of ideas, and one set of words to clothe them in; and these are always ready at the mouth: so people can come quicker out of church when it is almost empty than when a crowd is at the door.

LOGIC AMONG FRIENDS.—If people wish to live well together, they must not hold too much logic, and suppose that everything is to be settled by sufficient reason. Dr. Johnson saw this clearly with regard to married people, when he said, "Wretched would be the pair above all names of wretchedness, who should be doomed to adjust by reason, every morning, all the details of a domestic day." But the application should be much more general than he made it. There is no time for such reasonings, and nothing that is worth them. And when we recollect how two lawyers, or two politicians, can go on contending, and that there is no end of one-sided reasoning on any subject, we shall not be sure that such contention is the best mode for arriving at truth. But certainly it is not the way to arrive at good temper.

MILITARY POWER OF TURKEY.—The Impartial, of Smyrna, gives the following sketch of the military power of Turkey. The army consists of the active force and the reserve. The first is composed of six corps d'armée, each having 6 infantry, 4 cavalry, and 1 artillery regiments. A Turkish infantry regiment numbers 3263, a cavalry regiment 934, and an artillery regiment 1300 men. The 6 corps thus make up 147,684 men, or, including the engineer-corps, 160,000 men. The artillery includes more than 2000 field-pieces, besides single guns. The reserve consists of 4 corps, with a total of about 150,000 men. In addition, Serbia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Upper Albania, Egypt, Tripoli, and Tunis are bound to supply a contingent of not less than 110,000 men: so that the Turkish army, including 60,000 irregulars, would consist of 480,000 men. The navy includes 16 ships of the line, of which 3 are three-deckers of 120 guns, and 13 ships with from 74 to 90 guns, 14 frigates of from 52 to 64 guns, 12 corvettes, and 20 brigs and smaller vessels. The steam navy, which makes great progress, consists of 18 boats, of 3700 horse power.

INGENUITY.—The following ingenious mode of crossing a river was once displayed by a Kaffir, who had for some time stood watching the vain attempts of a party of soldiers to struggle across the stream at a time when, to ford it, was attended by considerable danger. After smiling at their efforts with that sardonic expression remarkable among these savages, he quietly raised a heavy stone, placed it on his head, and then walked, with perfect ease, through the torrent to the opposite side.

PLAIN PEOPLE.—Plain men—nay, even ugly little fellows—have met with tolerable success among the fair. Wilkes's challenge to Lord Townshend is well known: "Your lordship is one of the handsomest men in the kingdom, and I am one of the ugliest! yet, give me but half an hour's start, and I will enter the lists against you with any woman you choose to name; because you will omit attentions, on account of your fine exterior, which I shall double, on account of my plain one!" He used to say that it took him half an hour just to talk away his face. He was so exceedingly ugly, that a lottery office-keeper once offered him ten guineas not to pass his window whilst the tickets were drawing, for fear of his bringing ill-luck upon the house.

CURIOUS DISCOVERY OF A MURDER.—About two years ago a vessel left Archangel on an excursion to Greenland, to collect walrus tusks, seal oil, skins, &c. On the voyage the crew, or a part rather, mutinied, murdered the captain, and ended the tragedy by leaving two of the crew to perish on the inhospitable shores of Greenland, giving them little or no food whereby to prolong their existence. One of the men, however, took on shore a gun, and that eventually led to the discovery of the mutiny and the murder. Many of the Russian peasantry are very ingenious and expert in the use of the hatchet and knife, and one of the poor fellows so cruelly deserted by the unfeeling crew, before he died, had succeeded in carving on the stock of the gun a history of the voyage, the mutiny, the murder, and the desertion, so clearly, that the whole story was deciphered without much difficulty. It happened that another vessel, which had been sent to the same coast, and for a similar purpose, touched in the spring of the year at the very place where the remains of the two poor fellows were lying, and by the side of one of them was the gun which told the whole tale. This the discoverers brought away with them, and on their return to Archangel it was placed before the authorities. The guilty parties were traced, but were at sea. On their return, however, they were apprehended on landing, tried and convicted.

THE HUMAN HAIR.—Forty years ago, according to one of the first in the trade, the light German hair alone was called for, and he almost raved about a peculiar golden tint which was supremely prized, and which his father used to keep very close, only producing it to favourite customers, in the same manner that our august sherry-lord, or hock-berr, spares to particular friends—or now and then, it is said, to influential literary characters—a few magnanimous of some rare and renowned vintage. This treasured article he sold at 8s. an ounce—nearly double the price of silver. Now all this has passed away—and the dark shades of brown from France are chiefly called for. Our informant, venturing boldly into a subject wherewith ethnologists fear to tackle, delivers it as his opinion that the colour of the hair of English people has changed within the last half-century, and that the great intercourse since the war with southern nations has deepened by many tints the predominating Saxon blood of our forefathers. The same intelligent prompter assured us that any one accustomed to deal in hair could tell by smell alone the difference between German and French hair—nay, that he himself, "when his nose was in," could discriminate between Irish, Scotch, Welsh, and English hair! The destination of our imported article is of course principally the boudoirs of our fashionable world, and the glossy ringlets which the poor peasant girl of Tours parted with for a few sous, as a nest-egg towards her dowry, have doubtless aided in procuring "a suitable helpmate" for some blue spinster or fast dowager of Mayfair.—Quarterly Review.

STATISTICS OF RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—In the six months ending last December, 133 persons were killed and 387 hurt on the railways of the United Kingdom. Of these, 9 passengers were killed and 316 hurt from causes beyond their own control; 12 killed and 3 hurt from their own misconduct or want of caution; 31 persons employed on the railway were killed and 42 hurt from causes beyond their own control; 40 were killed and 17 hurt from their own misconduct or want of caution. 41 trespassers were killed and 9 hurt by crossing or walking on the railway. Length of railway open, 7336 miles; passengers conveyed, 49,886,124. A good many railways contribute no case to the list of dead or wounded: most of these are small lines with little traffic, but some convey many passengers—as the Dublin and Kingstown, East and West India Docks and Birmingham Junction, Blackwall, and South Wales; some lines of large extent, while persons have suffered on them from their own incautiousness, have not produced any "accidents" ending in wounds or death from "causes beyond the control" of the victims—as the Chester and Holyhead, Edinburgh and Glasgow, Irish Midland, Great Western, South Devon, South Wales, York, Newcastle, and Berwick. The last conveyed more than two million passengers, and one trespasser perished. The Irish lines are singularly free from "accidents."

A SKATING SCENE IN GERMANY.—The ice or a mile beyond is covered with a labyrinth of whirling, gaily-dressed groups: there a man cutting the most artistic and mysterious figures of the science; there two ladies skating off gracefully together; here a lady and gentleman hand-in-hand, or a whole line together, moving across, and again through them all, rushing on at a most alarming speed, the sled-chairs with ladies, pushed on by servants or friends—all moving, and whirling, and dashing around, among one another, and yet no one injured, or getting a fall. Then, on the bank, other groups again—men renting skates, women with coffee-tables and cakes, boys with fresh flowers from the conservatories, and crowds of hacks and private carriages waiting to take the skaters; and scattered about through them all, that omnipresent and most inquisitive individual—the Berlin policeman—grand in helmet, blue coat, and sword. Add to all this, to complete the scene, a clear winter's air; the rich light of the sun, far sunk in the south, falling over the groups, and just tinging with rose-colour the white columns of smoke; and for a background, the delicate tracery and dark masses of the old trees against the cold, grey eastern sky. There must be nearly a thousand people out, some days, from all classes, young and old, ladies and gentlemen, and the ladies in their prettiest dresses, much as if for a fashionable promenade. I have never seen a more graceful exercise for women, and the most here were well accomplished in the science. It has only been tried among the ladies of Berlin for a few years, since one of the princesses set the fashion, though now it is quite the mode. The most surprising thing to an American was the number of elderly men joining in the sport—men of station—the professor and students together, or the worn-out business man coming out to have one of the free sports of his youth over again. I know of nothing, in the habits of foreign nations, which struck me, at first, as so entirely new as this love for out-door sports. In England, I did not pass through a village without finding the green cricket-ground; and, be it remembered, not with boys at play on it, but men—men often of rank and character. Later in the season, were the boat-races, where the whole population gathered; gentlemen of the highest rank presiding, and the nobleman and student tugging at the oar, as eagerly as the mechanic or waterman.—Brace's Home Life in Germany.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

"Tis woman's right to take the field in virtue's holy cause, Her right to claim on such a ground society's applause; Her right to love her native land, and for its safety pray But not her right to mingle in the battle's deadly fray.

She has the will, and power to fill
Man's heart with pure delight;
She rules his soul with sweet control,
And this is woman's right.

"Tis woman's right to counsel man in sorrow's crushing hour,
Her right to raise his sinking heart by love's transcendent power;
Her right upon life's troubled sea the darkest storm to brave,
But not her right to guide our ships upon the ocean wave.

She has the will, &c.

"Tis woman's right to call on man to cherish and protect,
Her right to claim at every time his homage and respect,
Her right to lecture and be heard within domestic walls,
But not her right to speak aloud in legislative halls.

She has the will, &c.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NORAH KILDARE.—A work intended for the press requires very careful preparation. Your friend must commit herself to the friendly guidance of some experienced literary gentleman.

J. H. B.—It is one of the duties of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to prepare the budget, and submit it to the House of Commons; but the measure has previously been approved of by the cabinet—and therefore must be accepted as the policy of the ministry on fiscal matters.

EOO AMO.—Another case of church courtship. We are tired of them. Speak, write, or pray—but don't tease us. Why, are you not aware that a lover may act strangely, and yet not be thought an idiot or a ruffian? Where there is a will there is a way.

JOE BEANS.—You took your sweetheart to some public gardens, and she accepted the invitation of a soldier to join in a dance. What harm was there in that. If you had thought it wrong, you should not have exposed her to the familiarities of a dancing place. You have only yourself to blame. You were awkward and boyish, and she yielded to a natural inclination to take advantage of the soul-inspiring music.

A LADY informs us that she has been confined to her room, by her husband's orders, since the 10th of January last, owing to the machinations and misrepresentations of a young female relative. These domestic tyrannies are very dreadful, but the lady must do nothing rashly. Her best and only safe course, is to communicate at once with her nearest relatives.

OLIVER TWIST.—You wish to be married, do you—and as cheaply as possible? And have the impudence to ask us to assist you! What do you think your future wife will think of your proceedings? That is our answer.

L. B.—The etiquette is to send wedding-cards to the heads of the family and to the grown-up daughters.

CAPTAIN A.—Lord Hardinge is Commander-in-Chief of the British army, and of course has the supreme command of the troops encamped on Chobham Common.

JAMES READ inquires whether the medals for the actions in Goojerat, &c., 1849, have been issued? and if the men who belonged to the reserve division, which lay in Lahors at the time, were entitled to such medals, if issued. Probably some of our East India friends will be able to supply him with the information.

B. M.—Can a man be a democrat and an aristocrat at the same time? Unquestionably he can—that is, in the same day or the same hour. Democracy is something liberal—aristocracy is something proud and patronising; now, as every man is both liberal, and proud, and patronising, he is at heart both a democrat and an aristocrat. And we must say he would be scarcely anything worth noticing, without this duality of being. His head constitutes his aristocratic patrimony—his heart his democratic. How cold and proud he can be sometimes—how affable and sociable at others. When the qualities of head and heart are in unison, how noble and gracious he becomes. We never meddle with the politics of the so-called politicians—but in that respect every man preserves his double character. When in a state of grumbling dissatisfaction he is horribly proud—he can discern no merit save in himself; in the evening, under more genial influences, he relaxes, and thinks society may hold together a little longer.

BRUCE wrote to the mother of a lady, requesting permission to pay his addresses to her daughter—which was complied with immediately. The correspondence has been carried on for six months, and now he wishes to break it off. He may do so, but must be prepared to meet the consequences—and those are horse-whips and lawyers. We think he is one of that class of young men who rush headlong into engagements only for the sake of sneaking away from them. Probably neither the lady nor her parents will be sorry. But he must expect some punishment; and when Dan Cupid flies into a passion, he seldom spares the rod.

JOHN LAWS asks whether there is an Act of Parliament or any kind of law to prevent a person from receiving more than twenty shillings per week, in case of sickness, from any one or more benefit societies. If entitled, he may receive allowances from a hundred societies.

AN OLD SOLDIER.—Owing to the stoppage of the Isle of Wight Savings Bank, out of your deposits of £145, you are informed that you will lose three shillings in the pound. Will her Majesty's government make good to you the deficiency? No. The case would not be considered flagrant enough. And it cannot be too widely known, that the only real guarantee for the safety of a savings bank is in the honesty of the manager. The law on the point is disgraceful.

RED RALPH.—A married woman cannot dispose of property by will, except under special circumstances—such as the consent of her husband, the intervention of a court of equity, or under a power of appointment given to her by deed or will. All her personal property belongs to her husband, and it would be inconsistent to give her the power to defeat that provision.

AARON GILEAD.—It is a son's solemn duty to protect and cherish his widowed mother; but why should that interfere with his marrying. If all sons avoided marriage, where would all the mothers have been? Marry, but let it be a girl who will recognise in your widowed mother another parent. When you have married, make a will—your own breast will tell you what kind of will it should be—and then make money as fast as you can.

JOHN SHARP.—Under the will, the property descended absolutely to F. C., subject to the annuity to G. H. and wife, and the survivor of them.

M. B. H.—An indenture was the name of the legal instrument in use for transactions in property and bargains, previous to the passing of the act for simplifying legal forms. It was called indenture, from being cut or nicked at the top, and no deed was legal without being so indented. The absurdity is now happily abolished.

E. M. would be glad to know if we could inform her from her handwriting whether she will be an old maid or not? We cannot play the "Sir Oracle," to please even a lady. And in this instance, were we to answer in the affirmative—which we very well could, for the graphology is coldly angular—our correspondent, out of spite towards us, might get married in a week. No; as we neither advocate old maidism nor old bachelorism, so do we set our faces against quackery and deception in every form. What is termed the science of graphology is food for young and old ravens of the Pistol fraternity. Its professors are very clever, no doubt; but their bakers and butchers have another opinion of their talents.

A WIDOW.—Presentations to Christ's Hospital are made by the governors. The price of a governorship is £500, which gives the power of presenting a boy once in three years, for life. A list of all the governors who have presentations for the current year is published every Easter, at the hospital. Besides this, the Lord Mayor has two presentations, and each alderman one presentation annually, and also the power of nominating one governor at half price. From this you will perceive that when, some years ago, an inscription on the building, which said, "This is Christ's Hospital, where poor Blue Coat boys are kept and educated," was erased, the governors have consistently converted it into a monopoly, for the benefit of the children of those who can afford £500 for a governor's share. Next to St. Cross Hospital, at Winchester, this is the most scandalously perverted charitable institution in the realm.

E. R.—Should your father die intestate, you, as his only child, would take two-thirds of the personal property, and the whole of the real property. Your stepmother would only take one-third of the personal property.

H.—The only innocent preparation for removing freckles that we know of, is rectified acid of pitch and distilled water, in the proportion of one ounce of the former to one pint of the latter.

D. C.—"Some writers," says Malte Brun, "estimate the population of European Turkey at 22,000,000, while others have reduced it to 8,000,000; and both assign equally plausible grounds for their opinions." Eton seems disposed to estimate the population of the continental provinces at little more than 10,000,000, founding his calculation upon the assumed fact, that they contained 50,000,000 two centuries ago. Thornton contents himself with asserting that the progress of depopulation in these provinces is "infinitely overrated in this calculation," but he offers no corrected estimate. In "Rees's Cyclopædia," the number of inhabitants in Turkey in Europe is stated to have been estimated at 8,000,000—or about forty-three to each square mile; but this estimate, it is added, is supposed to exceed the truth. In the "Encyclopædia Britannica," it is estimated as low as 7,000,000; but in the supplement it is carried to nearly 9,000,000—viz., Roumelia, 6,000,000; Bosnia, 850,000; Islands, 525,000; Wallachia and Moldavia, 1,500,000; total, 8,875,000. But nothing can be more uncertain than the basis of this calculation. The population of Constantinople has been estimated at from 300,000 to 500,000. The former is probably nearer the truth.

MR. JAMES BRUTON, one of the most eminent lyrists of the day, has forwarded us a very pretty love-song, for which we willingly find a corner. It cannot fail to add to his already well-deserved reputation as a song writer and composer. But why does he sacrifice truth for the sake of a false metaphor? The "Moon in golden splendour" won't do—for when the moon looks yellow and sickly, there is no "flood of blue light" in the sky, and the stars are extinguished; they won't even shine for a Molly Bawn. On such nights the moon's beams struggle faintly through fog and mists. "Silver splendour" would be correct, and we have taken the liberty to make this trifling emendation.

WHEN THE MOON IN SILVER SPLENDOUR.

When the moon in silver splendour,
Upon her throne is seen;
And the stars come forth to render
Meet homage to their queen:
When a flood of blue light covers
All nature—land and sea;
Then, then is the time for lovers,
So sweet one, come to me!

When the tears of pale night glisten
Upon the lily's cheek;
When the roses love to listen
To words the bulbs speak;
When the searching eye discovers
The fairies on the lea;
Then, then is the time for lovers,
So, sweet one, come to me.

A C. R.—In the time of Caractacus, the term Wales had not been invented. He commanded the Silures. All the speeches attributed to him by Tacitus must be received with caution. Neither reporters nor newspapers existed in those days.

A YOUNG BEGINNER asks if it is right and proper to kiss the young lady you love when you first meet her, as well as when you leave her? Truly a Cupidian problem; but we should say yes, provided the lady was agreeable, and the young gentleman was not addicted to smoking British-grown cigars. But too many kisses during courtship are inadvisable. They spoil the flavour of the married kiss. However, as a rule, we should say a kiss at meeting and a kiss at parting would not be breaking any of the canons of love. The innocent impulses in young hearts cannot be measured by time and rule. Like hazy poetry, they defy interpretation.

E. G. is another victim of slander. The poisonous breath of the demon seems to be everywhere. Our correspondent must hope for a brighter day. The man who listens to tale-bearers and malicious chit-chat, and believes everything told him, never loved a woman as she ought to have been loved. E. G. must fall back on her womanly dignity. Time will defeat her enemies; as for her paltry lover, he is the last person she ought to care about.

W. T. W.—After a courtship in Scotland, you separate under a promise to exchange portraits and correspond. The former has been effected, but the lady has not yet replied to your letters. Probably they have been intercepted. But some young ladies are not partial to letter-writing. Their diffidence suggests some impropriety in corresponding with a gentleman, although an accepted lover. Had you not better go down to Scotland? One interview is worth a thousand letters.

H. HALL.—Slander can only blight and put a slime on a fair reputation, in the presence of false friends. Take no heed of the scoundrel's misrepresentations, and discard his acquaintance.

JANE M. wants to know how she is to treat a young "gent" who is always looking up at her chamber window? The police have instructions to deal summarily with such characters; but as Jane does not wish to be known in such a matter, we advise her to keep away from the window, and the "gent" will soon be tired of straining his goggle eyes in the street. If young ladies will exhibit themselves at windows, young men will be rude and audacious.

GOODFELLOW has been about a year in silent love with a pretty girl, but she is of inferior birth to him. That is the reason he never breathed his love to her. An ignoble, paltry reason. Goodfellow no more loves her than we do the pestiferous churchyards in the Strand. We are afraid he is anything but a "goodfellow." Should the "pretty girl" see this notice, as no doubt she will, we advise her to have nothing to do with this "goodfellow," or any one like him. Her happiness would be safer in the keeping of the young man who recognises in her an equal.

J. F.—The Isis and the Thames are distinct rivulets. The Isis rises about two miles south-east of Cirencester, in Gloucestershire; the Thames in Oxfordshire. The junction is formed near Dorchester, where, strictly speaking, the river Thames commences. 2. There is a tradition afloat, that George III., when a young man, was privately married to a pretty Quakeress; but as it is not supported by any reliable evidence, it ought to be suffered to die away.

J. L. P.—When an intestate dies, leaving a wife, but no child, or children, one half of his personal estate will descend to his wife, and the other half will be divisible among his nearest kindred. We should mention, that under no circumstances whatever is the wife entitled to more than half of her husband's estate, if he die intestate. It is a popular error to suppose that, where there are no children living, and no brothers or sisters, or nephews or nieces of the deceased, the wife is entitled to the whole. Such is not the case: the nearest kindred are entitled to a moiety.

W. H.—You cannot compel the lady to return you your letters. Why ask for them a second time? What are they worth? Your earnest desire to have them, shows fear on your part. That, and that alone, defeats your object. Women like to have some hold, even on a discarded lover. They are avaricious of authority.

ELLEN.—The first castle at Windsor was built by the Saxons, but the Conqueror was the first sovereign who erected a fortress of any magnitude there. Nearly the whole of the edifice as constructed by William I., was re-built by Edward III., under the direction of the celebrated William of Wykeham.

M. H.—You have mistaken friendship for love—a common error with young people. When the imagination is excited by passion, the mental eye does not see very clearly. The mist before it is either rosy or black. You must exercise some control over yourself, and regard the young lady as a stranger. Avoid her.

MIRZA TROLL.—From the style of your letter, we should say you were a clear-headed, shrewd young person. We do not believe in graphology, and you afford us a proof of its nonsensical character. The warm weather and the house-work makes your hand tremble and your writing irregular. Of course they do, but a graphologist seeing such a letter, would doubtless have pronounced you a brilliant genius.

HAWTHORNE.—The etymology of "Amphibious," as given by Entick and Johnson, is correct. It means living in two elements—that is, air and water; but the word is logically wrong. There is no animal that can live in either element at pleasure: Those animals termed amphibious, take to the water more in quest of prey, than out of any love for that element.

CHAPTER CXXIV.

Home, whispered in some foreign scene,
Sweetly it falls upon the ear,
Like fairy visions that have been,
Or mournful music floating near.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

THE morning after the interview between the dowager Lady Mowbray, and Queen Charlotte, the following announcement appeared in the Gazette:

"Her Majesty was graciously pleased to receive in private audience, at Buckingham House, Lady Mowbray, the widow of the late baronet, on her return to England, after an absence of many years upon the continent."

Unimportant as these few words may appear to most of our readers, to the slandered, outraged wife they were everything. They removed the blush from her matron brow—the stain from her fair fame—they were the highest acknowledgments that could be made of her being worthy to hold a place amongst the matronage of England; for the Queen of George III., with all her eccentricities and faults, admitted no one to her court who had once forgotten the laws of chastity and virtue. So strict was she in this one particular, that she even declined to receive the wife of her own son, the late King of Hanover, at the drawing-room she held soon after her marriage, till the suspicion of her having once formed a liaison with the handsome Murat, the brother-in-law of Napoleon, was explained or removed.

As all fear of further interference from Colonel Mowbray in the guardianship of Ellen was for the present removed by the decision of the Chancellor, Dr. Orme and the Duchess of Devonshire both earnestly advised the long-exiled widow to take up her abode at Carrow till the trial should come on which was to decide the validity of the will of her husband—it was due, they said, to his memory and the vindication of her fame; still it was not without a severe struggle that the recluse consented to return to the scene of her early wedded happiness and maternal bliss.

It is hard to revisit in age and disappointment the home where the sun of life once shone brightest—to listen in vain or the well-remembered step—to miss the voice whose tones made music to the heart—the tender look—the smile of sweet affection. The world! what was it to Lady Mowbray?—ashes!—its joys a memory o'ershadowed by a tomb!

"You have obtained a strong influence over me," she observed, in reply to the solicitations of our hero and Ellen. "I could almost imagine, as I hear you, that I listen to voices whose eloquence has long been mute. Your mother," she added, addressing her niece, "was my earliest, dearest friend: how must her heart have been pained by the supposition of my degradation!"

The orphan threw her arms around her, and gently kissed away the tears which dimmed the eyes of the mourner.

It was less 'easy to account for the influence which Henry Ashton exercised over her: she would frequently start and turn deadly pale at some peculiar tone of his voice or mode of expression which reminded her of Sir William: perhaps the long hours he had passed with his benefactor in the mutual interchange of thought and feeling, had insensibly formed his youthful mind upon the model of his instructor's.

It was finally arranged that Henry should precede the party to Carrow, in order to prepare for their reception, and arrange at the different stages for post-horses and sleeping-rooms; for Lady Mowbray was still too much an invalid to support the journey, even had it been practicable, in one day. Joe Beans accompanied him.

We will pass over the adieux of the lovers, which were marked by tenderness rather than sadness—for they parted with the certainty of meeting again in a few days. Their separation was like one of those clouds which obscure the heavens for awhile in the sweet budding time of spring—a shadow with the bright sun of hope peeping through.

The same day on which the above conversation took place, Colonel Mowbray and his wife—the latter her heart overflowing with malignity at the escape of Ellen—were discussing their plans for the future. Gradually the artful woman had obtained, from her bold and resolute character, complete influence over the mind of her husband. If, previous to his forced marriage, the gentleman had few scruples of conscience, he at least possessed some prudence; but both prudence and scruples her ladyship had either sneered or reasoned away: the colonel was now a mere tool in her hands—hers was the directing spirit which decided on every movement.

"I regret," said the colonel, with a sigh, "that I ever yielded to the promptings of avarice and ambition: my heart was much lighter ere I listened to them."

"But, having listened to them," observed the lady, "and acted on them, none but an idiot would close his ears to their suggestions. There are positions in which it is far more dangerous to recede than to advance—we are in one of them."

"We?" repeated her husband.

"Is not your interest mine?"

"True—true!" sighed the guilty but not repentant man; "our interests are one. Would they were the only bonds between us!" he mentally added—for the yoke already began to gall him.

"Oh, men—men!" exclaimed the emale Machiavel, "nature has endowed you with the strength—but woman alone possesses the unchangeable and persevering will. Had my spirit been as supine as yours, we should have indeed had no other resource than to abandon the fortune for which you have so long intrigued. But whilst you were dreaming of the past, I thought and acted for the future."

"Acted?" repeated the colonel.

"Yes!" resumed his wife; "the means are ready to your hand, if you have the courage to use them."

"The means—explain yourself?"

"What is it you most dread?" she demanded; "is it not the production of that unfortunate letter to the Abbaté Lucas, in which you not only admitted receiving your nephew from the hands of his agent, but foolishly, because unnecessarily added, had restored him to his father?"

"You know it is, madam. Why torment me with questions like these?"

"Why does the surgeon probe the wound," answered her ladyship, "unless to cure it? I have ascertained where the letter is."

"In the hands of his lawyer, doubtless?"

"No."

"The Chancellor's, or Dr. Orme's, then?"

"Neither," continued Lady Mowbray; "it is contained in a small ebony box, which every night is the companion of the widow's pillow. She scarcely ever permits it from her sight; but, with the tenacity of a woman's will and a mother's love, guards it with jealous vigilance. Could art, bribery, or anything short of violence have obtained it, long since it would have been mine. As it is, the task remains for you."

"For me How? you dream! My brother's widow is the guest of the Duke of Devonshire, a man who shuns my acquaintance! I could not find even a pretext to visit him."

"Nor is it necessary that you should!" rejoined his adviser; "since in three days your sister-in-law, together with Ellen and that meddling priest, depart for Carrow. She will doubtless take the papers with her. Once there, you, who know every secret entrance to the house, may easily obtain them."

"Not every entrance!" observed her husband, who, since the late event in the library, felt a superstitious dread of returning to the home of his murdered brother.

"Sufficient at least for our purpose. The letter must be obtained at any sacrifice."

"It shall be obtained!" said Colonel Mowbray, firmly.

"That once in your possession, have you aught else to fear?" inquired his wife, fixing a searching glance upon him—for she felt assured that the confidence she obtained was extorted from him by the critical position in which his past duplicity and crimes had placed him.

"Nothing!" he replied; "absolutely nothing!"

Still the lady did not appear convinced.

"No accomplice?" she added; "no confederate?"

"None! The only person who could betray me, is bound by an oath so terrible," said the guilty man, "he would not dare to break it: it was taken years since. I know that he has been strongly tempted, but still my secret will be kept—at least," he added, "whilst I live."

"And in the event of your death?" eagerly demanded Lady Mowbray.

"He would be free to disclose it—provided no son of mine lived to suffer by his indiscretion. Besides, I saved the fellow's life!"

The lady tried to look satisfied, but the effort was a failure. She had as little confidence in human gratitude, as in virtue—both to her were but idle names.

The colonel shortly afterwards left the house, to consult with his legal advisers. His first idea had been to avail himself of the error of Henry Ashton, and declare Walter to have been his nephew—not his son; and had procured the certificate of the death of his second child, who died at Nice, to corroborate his statement; but, unfortunately for his scheme, the nurse was still living who had attended his wife in both her confinements, and had fallen into the hands of Lawyer Elworthy. That line of defence, therefore, had been abandoned. The consideration now was to hit upon another.

He had not long left the house before a chaise and four drove up to the door. No sooner was it opened, than the unhappy wife of Captain Herbert, springing past the astonished servants, ran up the stairs like a mad woman. No sooner did she perceive her mother, than she threw her arms round her, and clung to her like a terrified child, beseeching her to save her from George, who was following to murder her.

"Heavens, Isabel!" exclaimed her astonished parent; "what has happened?"

It was long—very long—before she could draw from her wretched child anything like a connected account of what had transpired: the pretended elopement, in order to excite the fast declining passion of her selfish husband—the duel, and the death of Major Mottram.

"Isabel," said her ladyship, with desperate calmness, "in the eyes of the world you are lost—dishonoured!"

"But not in yours!" interrupted the heart-broken girl; "you will believe me! You know how devotedly, madly I loved my husband; how truly, despite his coldness and indifference, I love him still!"

"What matters what I may believe or disbelieve?" snappishly answered the heartless woman of the world. "I have troubles enough of my own upon my hands, without the addition of yours! That Mottram should have been such a fool!"

The more the speaker reflected, the more she was intrigued. The major had long been known to her by reputation as a man of doubtful character—and, but for the fatal termination of the duel, she would at once have suspected a collusion between her son-in-law and his friend; but even her knowledge of mankind did not lead her to suppose the dead man complaisant enough to submit to being shot, merely to enable Captain Herbert to get rid of his wife: for once she was baffled in her calculation.

"You will be divorced!" she said, bitterly, after a pause.

At the word "divorce," the despair and distress of Isabel increased: neither the neglect nor fatuity of her husband as yet had shaken her affection for him. She implored her mother to write to him—to entreat him to see her—to listen to her vindication—assuring her that she could explain everything.

"He will listen to no explanation," answered her ladyship, decidedly; "he will only feel too happy at the occasion your imprudence has given him of breaking a tie which your ridiculous love and his vanity knit—when I had such a brilliant match for you, too, on the tapis!" she added, with an air of vexation.

Overcome with excitement and the terrible reality of her position thus unfeeling forced upon her, the wretched girl fainted. Bad as she was, the wife of Colonel Mowbray was a mother, and the erring Isabel her only child. She would not have been human had not her heart relented at the sight of her sufferings; perhaps, too, conscience whispered in her ear that her daughter's errors were those of the false education she had given her.

"Isabel, my child!" she exclaimed, as she bent over her; "look up—forgive my harshness! Whatever may befall, you have still a mother!"

Although General Bouchier, in the first burst of indignation on the imprudent marriage of his nephew, had resolved to discard him, and, in order to carry out the long-cherished object of uniting his already colossal fortune with the equally splendid one of Sir Jasper Pepper, had offered his own hand as a substitute for the captain's, as the time drew near for the fulfilment of his engagement, he felt much more reluctant to complete it. Marriage would interfere with his ideas of comfort—his cherished bachelor independence. In short, it was an inconvenience—and, like most selfish men, General Bouchier hated to be inconvenienced; neither was the heiress of the wealthy little East India director exactly the kind of person—even had he felt inclined to become a Benedict—on whom he would have bestowed his hand and name. She was silly, vain, and undistinguished by those charms, either of person or mind, which render woman the light of our existence.

So far from this distaste moderating his resentment towards his nephew, it only served to augment it. The bitterness of the draught added to his indignation against the man who had refused to take it for him; and he experienced a savage kind of satisfaction in the idea of leaving his long-supposed heir a beggar.

"Curse him!" he muttered, as he sat sipping his first glass of claret after a solitary dinner, in the magnificent mansion which he had just taken in contemplation of his approaching union. "He deserves it for his folly!"

His valet, Lebel, entered the room with the evening papers. It was the fellow's duty to peruse them carefully, and mark any scandalous paragraph or on dit which he thought would interest his master.

General Bouchier saw in an instant, from the marked manner in which the servant placed the "Globe," doubled at a particular column, before him, that he had seen something more than usually piquant or amusing.

"What is this?" he demanded, listlessly.

"A duel and elopement in high life, general!" replied the valet, respectfully.

"Do I know the parties?"

The man could scarcely repress a smile as he answered, that, although the initials of the names only were given, he thought his master might possibly recognise them.

"Read it for me!" said the general, in a listless tone. The fact was, he was thinking, with anything but a lover's rapture, of the daughter of Sir Jasper Pepper.

Lebel, with a countenance unmoved, read as follows:

"ELOPEMENT AND DUEL IN HIGH LIFE.—The wife of Capt. G—e H—t, lately of the Guards, whose recent marriage excited such a sensation in the fashionable world, eloped yesterday, with Major M—m, of sporting celebrity. The injured husband, accompanied by two friends, Lord H—d and Cornet G—m, overtook the guilty pair on the first stage to Dover. A duel was the consequence, in which the seducer fell, mortally wounded."

It has been frequently said, that no man is a hero to his valet de chambre; but General Bouchier was always a gentleman to Lebel. Without moving a muscle of his face, he desired him to leave the paper; saying that when he required him he would ring. "Stay!" he added, as the servant was about to quit the room; "if my nephew should call, tell the porter I am at home."

Lebel bowed, and withdrew. Since his marriage, the general had not only refused to see his nephew, but even suffered his letters to remain unanswered.

Long and varied were the cogitations of the old bachelor when left to himself. He saw at once the chance of escaping from the noose he had been so anxious to impose upon his nephew. With cold-blooded precision he calculated the consequences of the elopement and duel, and fancied them satisfactory. Strange to say, he relished his second glass of claret far better than the first. Occasionally a quiet smile broke over his still handsome features. It was evident something had amused him.

His reveries were disturbed by a servant announcing Captain Herbert.

The ex-guardsmen entered the room with an air too theatrical to be real. He had even ruffled his cherished curls till they were in a most melo-dramatic state of disorder. He threw himself into a chair in a reckless manner, intending to convey the idea of his being truly wretched.

His uncle contemplated him for a few moments in silence.

"Calm yourself, George!" he said. "You know I dislike anything approaching to a sensation: it is decidedly vulgar!"

"You have heard it all, I suppose?" replied the young man, with a tolerable imitation of a groan.

"I have. Take some wine."

The captain assisted himself to a tumbler of claret, and drank it off with considerable gusto for a betrayed and injured husband. It was genuine Lafitte, premier cru.

"And so you have shot Mottram?" observed the general, after a second pause.

"I have—through the brain! The wretched man never spoke after receiving my shot!"

"Humph!" ejaculated his uncle. "Perhaps it was as well he did not! I always thought the major stronger in the head than the heart! And pray, George, what do you propose to do—fly to the continent?"

"No!"

"Explain yourself!" said the old gentleman, testily. "You know I detest the trouble of asking questions! And be a little more natural, George! These heroics may do all very well for the world; but they are thrown away upon me!"

"I shall remain, and stand my trial!" continued the captain. "I have nothing to fear. I have a confession of his guilt in a letter which he wrote to me previous to his elopement with the unhappy woman whom I must still call my wife!"

"For the present, certainly!" observed the general. "Of course you will sue for a divorce?"

"Instantly!"

"You now perceive the folly you have been guilty of," observed his relative, "in sacrificing yourself to an ungrateful woman!"

The captain said nothing, but he looked as if he felt convinced that he had made an awful sacrifice.

"You had better see my lawyer, and consult with him what is to be done. By-the-bye, who was your second?"

"Lord Ilford!"

"Good! And Mottram's?"

"Cornet Graham."

"Very correct and proper!" muttered the general, with an air of satisfaction; "nothing to be said on that score. Everything en règle. Commence proceedings instantly for the divorce, and spare no expense. I feel, for the honour of our family, that the guilty woman must no longer bear your name."

"Decidedly not!"

"You will find two thousand to your credit at Contts's to-morrow," added his uncle; "perhaps you had better leave Mottram's letter with me."

Despite his heartlessness, the ex-guardsmen's hand trembled as he took the paper from his pocket—look and presented it to the speaker—who, after carefully perusing it, placed it in a secretary near the window. During the entire interview there was a quiet air of satisfaction in his manner, which convinced Captain Herbert how completely his wealthy relative was reconciled to him. He felt morally assured that he had not sinned in vain.

"Leave me now, George," said General Bouchier, "and let me hear how your affair progresses. If the magistrates require bail, or anything of that kind, send for me and Sir Jasper Pepper. It was my intention to quit town to-morrow—but, under present circumstances, I shall postpone my visit."

"You are very kind, and were I only assured that you had forgiven me my foolish marriage—"

"We will speak of that another time," interrupted his uncle. "It was a foolish marriage, but you have done all in your power to atone!"

Captain Herbert regarded him fixedly, and read in his glance that the clever ruse he had played was more than suspected by the speaker.

As he was leaving the house, a servant in the livery of Colonel Mowbray placed a letter in his hand. It contained a few hastily written lines, blotted and half illegible from tears, written by Isabel, in which the unhappy girl entreated him to see her only for a few moments, assuring him that she would explain all—the very thing her husband was determined to avoid.

"Any answer, sir?" anxiously demanded the messenger.

"None!" replied the captain, crushing the letter in his hands; "it is useless for her to write to me any more!"

And it was useless—for the heart of the speaker was as cold and selfish a thing as ever beat within the breast of man—incapable alike of generous impulse or constant affection. The nearest approach he had ever experienced towards the tender passion had been a momentary caprice—and that had withered like a sickly flower at the first chill of poverty.

Unhappily for women, there are too many Captain Herberts in the world.

The inquest which was duly held upon the body of the murdered dupe, Major Mottram, returned the verdict usual in such cases. His assassin and the two seconds were held to bail, assured beforehand that the punishment which awaited them would be one of those mockeries which too often disgrace the name of justice.

It was arranged between General Bouchier and Sir Jasper Pepper, that the marriage between the former and the widow of Captain Elton should for the present be postponed. Shortly after, a series of paragraphs appeared in the papers, denying that an alliance had ever been in contemplation. So society is gulled.

CHAPTER CXXV.

Truth needs no disguise; its noblest garb
Is its own nakedness. OLD PLAT.

SOON after the arrival of Henry Ashton and Joe Beans at Carrow, it became generally known, from the orders given, that the widowed Lady Mowbray was about to take up her abode once more at the abbey—where Mrs. Jarmy, Nicholls, the butler, and such of the old servants as could be collected, removed, to make the necessary preparations for her reception. Previous to the departure of our hero for London, both himself and the worthy rector had taken care to make the story of the cruel deceit which Captain Lucas had practised upon her generally known: so that an unusual degree of sympathy was excited in her favour.

When Martin heard of it, the old man nodded and smiled.

"I saw it all in my dreams!" he muttered; "and it has come true! The rest will follow!"

When asked what he meant by "the rest," he shook his head, and relapsed into silence. Leaning on the arm of Joe, he found his way to his favourite place in the stables, to meditate upon the past, and speculate, perhaps, upon the future—for he was much given to speculation in his way. Most of the servants considered his words as the outbreak of the childish state into which they imagined, from his general taciturnity, he had fallen; but they were deceived. The old man's memory was fresh as ever—a fact of which he gradually convinced them, by reminding Mrs. Jarmy, who superintended the arranging of Lady Mowbray's chamber and dressing-room herself, where certain articles of furniture had formerly stood, and what flowers her unhappy mistress had loved the best.

Farmer Ashton was not the first husband who had experienced the impossibility of keeping a secret from his wife. If the good dame was not as clever, she was quite as curious as the youngest and prettiest of her sex. It was not long, therefore, before—partly by wandering, partly by sulking, putting this and that together, and practising those allowable arts which it is the peculiar privilege of wives to exercise—she extracted from her husband the avowal that the Khan was no other than his long-absent brother.

"Then he be Harry's father?" she observed, as her mind grasped the full importance of the admission.

"Of course he is, wife!" was the rejoinder.

Here her affection took the alarm, and she eagerly demanded if he wanted to seduce her boy—for so she invariably called our hero—into "furrin' parts; adding, with a sigh, that she had trusted he had seen enough of them.

"I should think not!" replied the farmer, after some deliberation; "especially as all be straight forrards now between him and Miss Ellen. Besides, Harry doesn't know it yet!"

"Not know that the Khan, as you call him, is his father?" repeated the astonished dame.

"N—!"

"Well—well!"

These words with the farmer's wife expressed the ne plus ultra of astonishment, when language—a gift she was by no means deficient in—fell short of the vastness of her impressions.

"But these intends to tell him?" she gasped at last.

The farmer shook his head, and muttered something about having promised his brother to conceal the tie between him and our hero for the present.

"But I have not promised!" exclaimed the dame, with honest indignation—for her woman's heart, true to the natural instinct of her sex, revolted at such unnatural conduct. "Is he ashamed of the boy?" she demanded, with increased vehemence. "Oh, Matthew—Matthew! would that he were ours!"

"Would he were!" ejaculated the farmer. "Not that we could love him better!"

It was not without considerable wheedling and tact that the worthy man succeeded in persuading his better half to promise to conceal from his brother that he had betrayed his secret. Even then she gave but a half consent.

"And poor Harry, too!" added her husband.

"Heaven knows when we shall see Harry again!" answered his wife, warmly.

The affectionate woman knew her own heart too well to promise that. With this implied understanding, her husband was forced to appear content.

Some persons affect to despise tact. Is it not frequently because they lack the perception to use it? Tact is but the art of making the best possible use of circumstances. It is a sort of moral palliative for the disagreements of life, which, like the wheels of a machine, move all the easier for being greased.

With the exception of a few very slight hints, glances, and now and then a muttered word or two, and a knowing toss of the head—which, had not the mind of the Khan been pre-occupied, he must have noticed—the good dame kept her word, till an event occurred which upset all her resolution and promises. This was nothing less than the return of Henry from London. He had left the companion of his journey, Joe Beans, at the rectory, to impart the news to the housekeeper and servants.

The two brothers and Mrs. Ashton were seated at supper when our hero unexpectedly entered the room. At the sound of his well-known footstep in the passage, his aunt bounded from her chair. The next instant her arms were round the neck of her favourite.

"Welcome home, my dear boy!" she cried; "welcome home! Somehow it don't seem home without thee! Here be farmer, and —"

"Dame—dame!" interrupted her husband, in an imploring tone.

"And thee father, too, to welcome thee!" she continued, pointing at the same time to the Khan. "And now the murder's out! It be no use, Matthew!" she added, in answer to the reproachful look of the old man, and the mortified surprise of the Khan; "I can't help it; it wor in my heart, and found the way to my tongue despite of me!"

Scarcely had she uttered the words, than the painful emotion upon the countenance of her nephew made her bitterly regret her precipitancy.

"That man my father?" he said.

"Yes, Philip Ashton, from Ingia—farmer's brother!"

"And he denied me!" exclaimed the young man, bitterly; "denied me, when my heart sprang with confidence and affection towards him! God!" he added, "what have I done? What is the stain upon my heart and name, that my own father should refuse to acknowledge me?"

Without one word of greeting, or extending of the hand, the young man sank upon a seat. His pride, self-respect, and feelings were too deeply wounded.

"Harry—Harry!" exclaimed the dame, "he will own thee now—be proud of thee—love thee as farmer and I do!"

This last assertion she conscientiously believed to be impossible. Yet she made it in the hope of soothing the agitation of her favourite.

For a few moments the Khan appeared equally surprised and embarrassed. Gradually, however, he recovered his self-possession. He was one of those calm, reflective beings, with whom to will was to perform. He saw that the difficulty he had foreseen, and sought to avoid, had arrived: it found him prepared to meet it.

"Matthew," he said, turning to his brother, "you had better leave me alone with your nephew."

"Nephew!" exclaimed the good dame, indignantly; "why not say your son? It is a much kinder word."

"And take your wife with you."

"I shan't go!" continued his sister-in-law, firmly.

Henry rose from his seat, his countenance still pale, but resolute. "Leave us, dear aunt!" he said; "it is better, perhaps, for both our sakes, that my father and I should converse without witnesses."

Had he asked her for her heart's pulse, she could not have refused it. Taking the arm of her husband, she slowly and reluctantly left the room.

For some moments the Khan and Henry Ashton remained gazing on each other in silence. The former was the first to break it.

"How often," he observed, "are the best-considered resolutions broken in an instant, and how unjust is man in estimating the actions of his fellow-creatures! I would have spared you much pain and annoyance. To do this, I have repressed the strong impulse of my heart—its natural desires and affections—till the moment had arrived in which I could explain everything. The imprudent confidence of my brother, and the loquacity of his wife, have forestalled both time and the event."

"I do not understand you, sir!" said Henry Ashton, proudly; "when first we met—after I had been fortunate enough to save you from the murderous attack of that wretched ruffian, the warrener—you distinctly told me that you were not my father?"

"I did!"

"And now —"

He could not proceed. He could not tell the author of his being how indignant he felt that the first meeting between them should have been branded by a lie—a heartless, unnecessary lie! In his reveries he had fondly imagined his father as a man whom he could both love and honour—a hardy soldier, who had fought his way to fortune, courted death at the cannon's mouth—frank, open-hearted, and sincere.

"Spare me!" he said. "I would not insult you!"

"Or doubt me?"

The youth remained silent.

"Is it for you," said the speaker, drawing his tall form to its full height, "to reverse the order of nature—for the child to question and judge the parent? Whatever the motive for the concealment—the deceit, falsehood, if you will—that I have practised, you at least are bound to respect it!"

"To respect falsehood! Never, sir!"

"Not falsehood—but your father!" replied the Khan; "do you know all that word implies—the claim it gives to your obedience—the anxious thoughts—the struggle with the world—the desire to enhance a name, that a son may bear it—the yearning of the heart for the future which must dawn at last? Look upon me!" he added, in a tone of still deeper feeling; "toil and suffering have traced many a furrow upon my brow, but you will not find dishonour there! The hour will come—and I speak it fearlessly—when, had you the choice of the noblest in England for a father, you would select the one, ungrateful boy, which nature has given you!"

Henry Ashton was astonished. Instead of seeing his parent humbled and abashed at having been detected in a falsehood, as he imagined he would be, he suddenly assumed the character of an accuser. For the first time in his life he was subdued.

"You judge me harshly, sir!" he said; "place yourself in my position. It had been the hope—the dream of my life, one day of embracing my father, the only parent left me!"

"Well, sir?"

"To find myself denied—disowned!"

"There were reasons, Henry!"

"To the world, but not to me—not to your own heart!" exclaimed the young man, deeply moved, "if it had ever loved! The cold, heartless letter—the only one I ever received from you—commanding my departure for India, at the very moment, too, you had returned to England!"

"It was necessary for your safety," replied the Khan, slightly moved; "had I known the temper of your mind, its qualities, and strength, I should have written differently."

"And whose was the fault you did not?"

"Mine!" answered the renegade, frankly; "and yet you have been the object of many a painful thought—of many a prayer! Often on the battle-field, or in the wild jungle, when death and pestilence have scattered their victims round me, I have wished my life preserved for no other motive than for you! But enough of this!" he added; "it is time to end an interview painful to us both. I must reflect how best to explain that which at present appears inexplicable. Good night! In the morning we shall be more composed. One sting, at least, I can remove from your heart, in the assurance that, even to himself, Henry Ashton will never have cause to blush at the motives and conduct of his father!"

Convinced even against his reason, that the promise thus solemnly made would one day be fulfilled, our hero would have embraced him, but the Khan gently repelled his advance; and contented himself by shaking him warmly by the hand.

"Not yet!" he said, with a smile; "wait till all is clear!"

With these words he quitted the room, leaving the young man a prey to emotions too complicated to be analysed—to thoughts too evanescent to be retained.

When the inmates of the Home Farm assembled at breakfast on the following morning, the Khan had disappeared. Henry sought him everywhere in the neighbourhood—but in vain. It was long ere he returned to Carrow.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

Sing not of home—the words recall
Hopes buried in a lonely grave;
Bring back to wounded memory all
Time hath bereft, or love ere gave.

ITALY, BY THE AUTHOR.

THE day fixed for the return of the long-exiled wife of Sir William Mowbray to the home of her short-lived wedded happiness at last arrived. The setting sun was shining brightly upon the ivy-mantled walls of the old abbey, as the carriages rolled along the newly-gravelled road in the park, through crowds of respectful tenantry and villagers. There were neither shouts nor waving of handkerchiefs. The long-slandered lady was welcomed to the halls of her murdered husband with a silent sympathy which expressed more than words—which are too frequently lip-homage—not the language of the heart.

When the carriage drew up to the porch, where Mrs. Jarmy, old Martin, and the rest of the servants were waiting to receive her, the emotion which Lady Mowbray had hitherto successfully repressed, burst forth when she recognised the well-remembered features of Jarmy and old Martin, scarcely changed since the day she first arrived at Carrow, a happy, blooming bride; the memories of the past crowded upon her brain, resolution gave way, nature asserted its supremacy, and she wept bitterly.

Henry Ashton received her half fainting in his arms, and supported rather than led her to the drawing-room, where he resigned her to the care of Ellen and the Duchess of Devonshire, who, throughout her recent sufferings and trials, had proved herself a sympathising friend.

"Thank heaven," said Dr. Orme, as he shook our hero warmly by the hand, "she has arrived, and borne the shock of revisiting the home of her early love and sorrow better than I expected!"

"Did you observe," asked Henry, "how she shuddered as I bore her past the library door?"

"I did," said the rector, with a sigh at the recollection of the sad fate of his murdered friend. "Her grace has imparted everything to her!"

"Everything?"

"Yes; we judged it best. An incautious word—the imprudence of servants—their involuntary terror on passing the fatal apartment—might suddenly have revealed it to her! In my observations of life, Harry," he continued, "I have observed that great shocks seldom kill—it is the petty, repeated ones which wear out the heart and mind!"

His former pupil turned aside to hide the emotion he felt at his observation.

"What is the matter with you?" continued the old man, kindly; "at your age—the world opening brightly before you—your heart should be all sunshine, cheerful as your fortunes!"

Taking the arm of the speaker, our hero led him towards the lawn, and related the discovery of his long-absent father, in the person of the Khan—the conversation between them—the tone he had assumed, and his sudden disappearance from the farm; adding how deeply his singular conduct had pained him.

Respect, if not affection, kept him silent on the subject of the solemn denial he had previously made of any such tie existing between them: even to the rector he could not reconcile his mind to utter a word dishonouring to his parent.

"Strange!" said Doctor Orme, musingly; "there can be no reason for such concealment, unless —"

He paused, fearful of unnecessarily wounding his feelings.

"Unless," repeated Henry, finishing the sentence for him, "he had acted like a worthless seducer to my mother: that is the fear which haunts me—sits like a nightmare on my soul—broods over my sleepless pillow! As for the adventitious advantage of birth, I value it as little as any man; but can I—ought I to ask Ellen to share the fate of one, who perhaps has not even a name to give her?"

Seldom had his friend seen our hero yield so completely to vague forebodings. It was evident that his imagination had dwelt so long and intently on the supposition of his illegitimacy, that he considered it a reality.

"But you have a heart, my dear boy!" replied Dr. Orme, soothingly; "and that is all Ellen cares for!"

"If I have a heart," exclaimed the young man, sorrowfully, "what must it endure to see the generous, high-born girl who has blessed me with her love, humbled in the world—degraded, perhaps, in the eyes of society, on my account? It would break—break!"

"You consider this matter too seriously," said the rector, uneasily. "From the little I have seen, and your description of your father, he does not appear to have been the heartless being you suppose. Have you never questioned the farmer and his wife upon the subject?"

"Frequently."

"What say they?"

"They know as little of the name and station of my mother as myself!" answered the youth, with bitterness; "my life," he added, "is a mysterious problem—its solution, degradation and misery!"

"Nothing of the kind!" exclaimed the rector, more and more alarmed at the distress of the speaker; "your father may have married above his rank—far more likely than below it. Rely upon it, Harry, had you been merely the child of chance, he never would have consigned you to the care of his brother—insulted his honest roof by introducing such an inmate as his nephew. I am disposed to think that he has other and better reasons for his apparently unnatural conduct. Leave it to time," he continued, "which has solved more mysteries than yours; in the meanwhile hope!"

Without permitting him to resume the subject, the speaker led his adopted son towards the house, where he passed one of those sunny hours which, like the oasis, mark life's desert, in the society of Ellen.

There is a magic in the eyes of woman, especially when they beam upon us with affection. As the warm rays of the sun exhale the noxious vapours from the earth, so will the smile of woman disperse the mist of care, cleansing the oppressed heart of that perilous stuff thereof

Cares and unquiet dreams, which haunt
The restless pillow and the waking hour,

In youth and age are alike composed.

From that hour Henry Ashton forgot his sorrow, and was happy. Those who, like the hero of our tale, have loved, alone can tell how happy.

The return of Lady Mowbray to Carrow Abbey was followed by the silent dispersion of the tenantry; there were no bonfires, no rejoicings: all felt that such demonstrations would afford pain rather than gratification to the unhappy widow, whose wounded heart shrank even at the approach of pity.

Amongst the rest, Joe Beans, after taking a farewell of Susan, who remained to attend upon her young mistress, was making his way through the park, meditating most probably on matrimony, and the farm which the rector and Henry had both promised him, when the skirts of his best coat, which he had donned for the occasion, were pulled with a violent jerk: the young man turned somewhat sharply, and recognised his little protégé, Red Ralph, who, since the execution of the warrener, had fallen somewhat into disfavour—Joe not approving of the unseemly joy he had displayed on the occasion.

"Well, Ralph," he said, "what brings thee here?" "Partly to see thee, Mister Beans," replied the lad, "and partly to see the fun—Master Harry, parson, and ladies. There be no harm in that, I s'pose—there wor no hanging; but thee beest angry wi' I; but I knowed no better."

"No better, Ralph?" said Joe, seriously. "No; I wor never taught better! How should I a' knowed it wor wrong to see old man hanged? Arter all, it wor'n so pleasant!"

There was a truth in the poor lad's defence which his patron felt; although, to make an impression on the mind of the speaker, he did not for the moment choose to acknowledge it. He had never been taught better. How many an unfortunate, arraigned at the bar of justice for some outrage to the laws of honesty, might retort the same words upon that society which accused and punished him.

Why spend so much upon prisons, when school-houses are not only cheaper, but far more effectual for the prevention of crime? The schoolmaster is a better instructor than the gaoler.

"You must go to school, Ralph!" said the young man, in a kinder tone.

"Ees! I should like that!"

"I'll get Master Harry to speak to the farmer, to spare you of an evening. I am no great scholar myself; but thank God I can both read and write!"

"Can 'ee, though?" exclaimed the boy, with a stare of admiration.

"Ay, and cipher, too!" added Joe. "And you, if you choose to be industrious, may soon do the same!"

Ralph cut one of those extraordinary capers—something between the pirouette of a French dancer and the gyration of a dervise—his usual mode of expressing satisfaction.

"Thee beest mortal kind to I!" he said. "And if there be anything I can do, only tell I! Hang it, I'd shoot any one that did thee harm, Mister Beans, and think nought on it!"

"Be attentive and honest," replied Joe, with a smile at the exuberant gratitude of the lad; "and any little good I can do for you, Ralph, will be repaid! You must leave me now," he added, "for I have a great deal upon my mind, and —"

"I know—I know!" interrupted the boy, with a grin. "You know?"

"Ees! Thee beest thinking o' Susan! I heard farmer tell dame thee wor to marry her, and Master Harry gi' thee a farm! I wish somebody would gi' I a farm," he added; "wor'n no bigger than Remnan's field at Mortlake!"

"All in good time, Ralph!" said Joe, laughingly. "Stranger things than that may happen! Good night!"

And so they separated: Joe Beans towards the rectory, and the red-haired urchin through the wood, a short cut to the farm, where he had been employed, ever since his arrival at Carrow, by Farmer Ashton.

Red Ralph continued his route, whistling and occasionally muttering to himself, more like some elf-begotten sprite than a Christian lad, till he approached the deep, secluded dell in which the hut or cottage formerly inhabited by his old enemy, Will Sidelar, was situated. Ever since the execution of the murderer, it had been regarded with a superstitious terror by the country-people and farm-labourers; the old women of the village even went so far as to say that it was haunted.

Now, though Ralph, as we have seen, during his residence at Mortlake, was anything but superstitious, still, somehow or other, since the death of the warrener, he did not feel quite so courageous as formerly. As he approached the spot, his whistle gradually subsided into a sort of humming sound, produced by impelling the breath between the teeth; and more than once he started at the rustling of the fox or wild cat stealing like a thief through the furze and brushwood.

"Dang it!" he said, pausing and looking round him; "it be almost dark! I have a good mind to go back!"

He advanced slowly for a few paces.

"They'd laugh at I at farm! No, I mun go on!"

The boy, who had spent much of his time in the woods and fields, and had been concerned, on more than one occasion, in poaching excursions in the hallowed precincts of Richmond Park, possessed an eye and ear almost as acute as a young Indian's. Under the influence if not of positive terror, at least of alarm, he began to exercise them, avoiding, involuntarily as it were, each clump of trees or brushwood in his path, behind which any evil-disposed marauder might conceal himself: by this time his whistling had entirely ceased.

In this frame of mind he reached, at last, the little open sward in front of the hut. To his astonishment, he noticed a stream of red light passing through the windows. At first he thought it was the reflection of the sunset in the glass; but the window was due east, and Ralph was sufficiently an observer of nature to know that the sun never set in that direction—"at least," as he afterwards used to say, when relating his adventure, "I know'd that it never did at Mortlake!"

All the strange reports which he had previously heard and laughed at, touching the hut being haunted by the spirit of Will Sidelar, came crowding on his mind. After the stare of astonishment which the conviction that the light came from the inside of the cottage, instead of being refracted from the casement, had subsided, his first impulse was to fall flat on his face, and creep, like a wild animal, under the brushwood. He did not feel himself in security till safely sheltered there.

What the stable was to old Martin, a hole in the hedge, or a nook in some furze-bush, appeared to Red Ralph—the best place in the world for counsel or meditation. Even when a boy, he could always collect his thoughts, or devour the fruit he had pilfered, with greater satisfaction there. On such occasions, he did not like to be intruded upon.

"What can it be?" he mentally asked himself. "I heard steward tell farmer, only this mornin', that hut wor a comin' down! Nobody would live in it. Somebody, though," he added, "does live in it! Mayhap, only poachers; mayhap, summut worse!"

Ralph had great faith in a stick. His first care, therefore, was to choose a stout young sapling, which he cut and trimmed till he had obtained an excellent cudgel—which, there is little doubt, he would have the firmness to use, if assaulted—for there was an instinctive combativeness in his nature, very like that which is observed in young terriers in their stage of puppyhood. Most puppies merely bark—they do not bite!

"If it bea'n't a ghost," muttered the boy, passing the stick critically between his finger and thumb, "I don't so much care! I bea'n't afeard of real flesh and blood like myself; but I shouldn't wish to see t' old man wi' a cotton nightcap over his face, his legs a skriggling and a skriggling—ugh!"

A shudder and an involuntary expression of disgust at the recollection of the scene he had witnessed, came over him.

Armed with his cudgel and resolution, Ralph ventured to creep from his hiding-place to an oak-tree, whose gnarled branches overshadowed the road, and nearly reached the roof of the warrener's hut. Cautiously climbing the trunk, he placed himself astride one of the branches, and gradually advanced till he found himself in a position to perceive whatever was taking place in the interior of the cottage, from whose window the light continued to stream with a still redder glare.

A cheerful fire was burning upon the hearth, and an iron kettle or pot swinging over it. Upon the table in the centre of the room was a plate, together with a loaf of bread and a bottle. But what most excited the boy's attention was a small black box, with bright silver clasps to it. He felt assured that he had seen it before, although he could not remember where.

"They bea'n't no ghosts," thought Ralph; "but poachers! What a fool I wor!"

Satisfied that the conclusion he had come to was the correct one, he would have descended from the tree and pursued his way towards the farm, had not a vague curiosity restrained him. He fancied that he should like to see the person for whom such preparation was being made.

"Some brave chap, no doubt," he muttered; "and fond o' a bit o' sport! So be I: mayhap we shall agree together."

Still the black box with the silver clasps excited his attention: he could not remove his eyes from it. It appeared to possess a species of fascination for him. He felt both curious and provoked: curious as to its contents, and annoyed at himself for not recollecting where he had seen it before.

To all appearance the hut was tenantless, and the occasion was very tempting. Ralph gradually went backwards along the arm of the oak, till he reached the trunk, down which he carefully slid, carrying his stick between his teeth during the operation.

"I will see, I be determined!" he said; "if they catch, they can't hang I! I am't a thief!"

The curious urchin approached the door with the firm resolution of entering the cottage by the window, in the event of finding it locked. With a caution which the most experienced housebreaker might have envied, he placed his hand upon the latch, and pushed once or twice gently; finding that it resisted his efforts, at last firmly.

He was puzzled—there was no lock, that he could see, to the door, and yet he could not open it: the natural inference was, that it was barred on the inside: if so, some one must be there. The discovery made him cautious.

"It be a rum go!" he mentally observed. "I can't see any one, and there be only one room in t' place!"

His next attempt was at the window, where a terrible surprise awaited him—a surprise which, from being a half-septic in ghost stories, transformed him at once into a true believer. Standing with his back to the fire was the warrener; he could not be deceived—it was his dress, his tall, gaunt figure, hat, and gibbern.

The red haub of the urchin began to rise and fall as if life were in it; fortunately his terror was too great for words or exclamation. He dropped from the window-sill, and fell senseless upon the sward.

THE POETICAL AND THE PRACTICAL.

SPIRIT VERSUS MATTER.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

MELTED amethysts and rubies richer tints may ne'er effuse

Than the Light which paints the rainbow, lends the West its brilliant hues;
Yet that light which meets the Morning, scattering Jewels on her way,

Bounteous as an Eastern Princess, is the light of common day!

So with Poetry, though gleaming with Imagination's fire 'Mid the heaven of Invention seeking ever to aspire!
Yet accordant to all natures, poetry her gifts can breathe,

Lending sweetness, grace, and feeling, like the common air we breathe.

As Eternity's before us, and within us, and behind,
So is Poetry pervading the eternal sphere of Mind,
So is Poetry refining earthly love by heavenly laws,
Foremost in the cause of Freedom, foremost in the People's cause!

And the people were ungrateful could they now forget the good

Which the Poets sought and won them, when more feared than understood.

Wise to calculation only is the Age in which we live,
Ever honouring the most highly those who have the most to give!

Feelings which have ne'er extended from the narrow space of self,

Merging holier, loftier objects in an atmosphere of self! Shame upon this Mammon-worship! Shame upon this lucre-love!

Life adorners of mere matter, sceptics to the life above!
Come, I'm counsel for the Poets; enter ye the Court of Fame:

Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden; answer each one to your name;

Ye, that with unfailing genius bade humanity advance,
With dominion in your voices, and with empire in your glance;

Ye, that with heroic daring sought the people in distress,
Seeking to o'erbridge the chasm 'tween their hope and their success.

Humanism more expansive, 'twas for this your genius strove,

Equal justice for the lowest, equal laws, and federal love!
Shout we for the sensual only? still the practical applaud?

There is something more than matter which the mind of man should laud,

Something more than sordid fortune, something more for souls to crave,

Than a gaudy pageant passing from a banquet to a grave.
As the Sun, so Education yields the globe its partial light;

Half the world exults in brightness, whilst the rest is plunged in night.

Talk of Stephenson and Railways? of the miracles of Steam?

Lauding high those vapour-pinions, swifter than the solar beam?

Lauding high and vaunting loudly Powers connecting clime with clime,

Narrowing space, and far extending the capacities of Time?

Prate of Stephenson and Shakspeare—grant the first the loftier dower?

For his wonder-working carriage speeds to Leeds within the hour!

Shame upon this Mammon-worship! Shame upon this lucre-love!

Life adorners of mere matter, sceptics to the life above.
Open ye the play of Hamlet—and a breath of Shakspeare's power

Speeds ye to the gates of Denmark in the fraction of an hour!

Steam 'gainst Soul? What, match a vapour 'gainst a meteor of the night?

Stephenson's a mole, a tortoise, to the old Shakspearian flight.

Meteor-rushing would ye travel? travel then on Shakspeare's page,

On the Lyric or Heroic—on the Broad or Narrow gauge

Prate of Lines from York to London, or from London 'cross the Tweed?

Shakspeare's lines are universal: judge ye for yourselves, and read.

Not its length but its duration is the glory of a line;
Shakspeare's will endure for ever—lines eternal, lines divine.

Oh, you do not know the Poet—cannot comprehend his skill—

Cannot span the soul which travels all Creation at its will.

Oh, you do not know the Poet, or you never would compare

Any genius in creation with a genius so rare!
Shame upon this Mammon-worship! Shame upon this lucre-love!

Life adorners of mere matter, sceptics to the life above.
If our birth were first in Heaven, for our three score years and ten,

Afterwards, to earth translated, find eternal life with men,

I might marvel less at wisdom which prefers this soul-less lust,

I might sorrow less at worship signalising worldly dust

But for beings born to wither in some few brief years from earth,
Clinging with a childish passion unto toys of little worth;
Three score years for Pomp to glitter—three score years for Wealth to glare;
Then—Eternity in heaven: what can Wealth avail ye there?
Then Eternity in heaven, like a whisper is it heard;
Oh, that language thrills—appals me—as were thunder in each word.
Out upon this rage for riches, striving up and strutting
bold,
Out upon the craft which teaches scorn of every thing
but gold:
Out upon the slavish minions, vain disciples of a creed
Which believes in God, yet never acts as if it thus believed:
'Tis the vassalage of Reason to an artificial sway, Govern'd by a false convention—modes and fashions of a day:
'Tis the vassalage of spirit to an arbitrary tone,
Granting to a mean usurper its hereditary throne.
Gold is God—the very letters, Mammon, aid thee, as thou bidd'st:
GOLD is GOD!—thou say'st truly—GOD, with I seen in the midst.
If still worshippers of Matter, Watt your deity may be;
True believers in the Spirit find still mightier gods than he.
If still worshippers of Matter, Stephenson your vows may claim;
Spirit bends to other altars, bright with spiritual fame.
Spirit from the mystic future lifts the veil with radiant hand,
Still "Excelsior!" exclaiming, seeking still the Better
Land.
If this Life, this World were final, and no other Life beyond,
I could clasp the Poet's fictions with a reverence as fond!
What is life without Affection? 'tis existence without light,—
'Tis a quarantine eternal, with the wished-for land in sight!
Long as infancy is blissful to the mother's flowing breast,
Long as Love creates a heaven Poets only have exprest,
Long as in the kindred circle friendship and devotion reign,
Will the Poet be remembered—will be loved the Min-
strel's strain:
Thought and feeling still enlarging, still revealing higher powers,
Wreathing with immortal beauty life's most spiritual hours,
High revelations and attainments—which, whatever path we've trod,
Are the angels that from darkness call us to the light of God!

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XL.

I can call spirits from the vasty deep.
Why so can I, and so can any man;
But will they come when you do call for them?
SHAKESPEARE.

THE birth of a son to the young Queen of Scotland was a source of great political as well as personal annoyance to Elizabeth: there was a strong party in the country who supported the claim of Mary to the succession—which party was still further strengthened by the fears of those who looked forward to a civil war, in the event of the death of the reigning sovereign. Leicester, urged by the ambitious hope of a crown, was foremost amongst the malcontents: his aim was, by stirring up the two Houses of Parliament, to force Elizabeth to one of two alternatives—marriage, or the choice of a successor: not doubting that it would be the former, and the bridegroom himself.

Almost immediately after the progress to Oxford, the maiden monarch returned to London to prepare for the opening of Parliament, which she was compelled to summon in order to obtain the subsidies necessary for the carrying on of her government. Dreading their importunity upon the subject of her marriage or the succession, she had delayed their meeting as long as possible. Many and various were the consultations with Cecil and her council.

At that period, the belief in alchemy, astrology, and other exploded superstitions, was general throughout the realm; all classes were more or less addicted to them; and even the masculine mind of Elizabeth was not exempt from the weakness, which was equally shared by her favourite, Leicester.

The most successful of the impostors, as well, perhaps, as the most learned, who flourished on the credulity of the age, was the celebrated Dr. Dee, who resided at a convenient house at Mortlake. We have seen that the queen would not fix the day for her coronation till she had first consulted him. The quaint old charlatan exercised a greater influence in state affairs than the world has given him credit for.

The house which he inhabited stood almost in a direct line with the church—it has only lately been pulled down. Many are still living who have wandered through its chambers and garden.

On the evening preceding the opening of Parliament, Dr. Dee was seated in his study, peering with curious eyes into the celebrated mirror in which he pretended to read future events, see spirits, and converse with them: perhaps the old man was as much the dupe of his own excited imagination as those who consulted him.

He was a tall, thin, venerable-looking personage, dressed in a long, dark gown, girded round his waist with a silken cord; his white hair and beard were long—the former fell from under the high black cap he wore on their waving locks, and added to his picturesque appearance.

A paper lay upon the table beside him, covered all over with geometrical figures and abstruse calculations. A smaller one which he held in his hand, and to which he occasionally referred, was the horoscope of Elizabeth. He had calculated it on her accession to the crown, at her express command.

"The spirits are vexed!" muttered the aged dreamer, still looking steadfastly in the glass; "they will not answer me! Perhaps the earthly toils and cares which oppress me have dimmed my intellectual vision. Patience—patience! I must commence again!"

The doctor, after performing sundry genuflexions before the mirror, which was set in an ebony frame, and stood upon the table before him, began to chant a species of invocation in the Latin tongue. He had not got beyond the second, or at most the third line, when he was interrupted by a gentle knocking at the door—on hearing which he suddenly broke off; and, after veiling his mirror, as the Catholics sometimes veil their shrines, he called to the intruder to come in.

A lean and withered old woman, whom poverty had induced to accept the office of domestic with the much dreaded conjuror, entered the room.

"Well, Maude!" said her master, "is he come?"

"Not the one you expect," replied the servant; "but there is another at the gate, demanding to see you."

"Not to-night!" interrupted Dr. Dee, hastily; "not to-night!"

"I told him so, but he would not be persuaded. 'Tell your master,' he said, 'that were the spirits of evil in council with him, he must see me! I am not one of those who descend to visit twice!'"

The astrologer paused and reflected for a few moments, then asked, "what sort of person the stranger was?"

"Tall," was the reply.

"Would you judge him noble?"

"Doubtless!" replied the woman, bitterly; "for he is proud and scornful! He called me beldame—hag—and spoke of you as little better than the fiend himself! Be careful, master," added the speaker, in a kinder tone, "how you admit that man! He has armed jackeys in waiting—I saw them, with their horses drawn in a line, under the church wall!"

"What should I fear?" demanded the doctor, calmly.

The woman made no reply: probably she did not like to hint at the possibility of the visitor being no other than the arch-fiend himself.

"Admit him!" said her master. "I will see this man."

In a few minutes, a tall and rather robust personage, enveloped in a riding-cloak, which completely covered his dress, made his appearance. His hat was drawn closely over his brow, and, still further to conceal himself, he wore a mask of black velvet.

"Be seated, my Lord of Leicester!" said Dr. Dee, without raising his eyes from the glass, the contemplation of which he had recommenced; "you visit me at an untimely hour, but come not unexpected!"

"How may that be?" demanded the earl, at once laying aside his incognito; "since three hours ago I myself dreamed not of such a step?"

The astrologer smiled, and pointed to his glass.

"Perhaps," said the favourite, "you can tell the object of my visit?"

"I could guess it," was the reply, "without the aid of science. Deal plainly with me, my lord," he added, "and briefly; for the hour I have long and anxiously waited is fleeting fast! The conjunction of the planets will soon be favourable!"

"I would have an answer to three questions, for which I am ready to pay your price," observed the earl; "though it should exceed the ransom of a knight."

"Propose your questions, my lord."

"Will the queen ever marry? That is the first."

"Good!" said the astrologer, writing it down.

"And if she does, who will be her husband?"

The second question was written, like the first.

"My last question is," continued Leicester, "perhaps the most important of the three; for it touches a forbidden question."

"The succession?" whispered Dr. Dee.

His visitor nodded in the affirmative.

"Speak boldly, my lord, and clearly," said the aged charlatan; "there are no eavesdroppers in my house; neither, if my answers are to be explicit, must there be any ambiguity between us."

"Well, then," exclaimed the earl, "I will deal plainly. I wish to know the sex and birth of her majesty's successor. To your craft, Dr. Dee; and here is your recompense."

With these words he cast a heavily-filled purse upon the table. The eyes of the astrologer sparkled at the chink of the yellow metal, although he did not otherwise appear to notice the action of his visitor.

"Will you regard the mirror yourself?" he demanded.

"The question, if favourable, will be answered by the spirit of one once dearest to you."

"No!" hastily interrupted the earl, with a shudder.

Perhaps his thoughts were of his murdered wife. "I can trust to you."

Dr. Dee seated himself, and began to consult his mirror.

"Speak not!" he said, addressing Leicester in a warning tone; "for those are gathering near who must hear no voice save mine! Be silent as your hopes—as the grave!"

The charm which the arrival of his visitor had interrupted was resumed. After its termination, the old man remained for at least ten minutes with his eyes intently fixed upon the magic glass. Gradually his features became convulsed, and drops of perspiration trickled down his wrinkled forehead. Leicester began to feel alarmed—still the injunction of the magician was too powerfully impressed upon him to permit him to speak.

With a deep sigh Dr. Dee at last fell back in his chair, as if exhausted with the efforts he had made.

The earl, unable any longer to conceal his anxiety, rose from his seat and would have approached the mirror, when the voice of the astrologer restrained him.

"Beware, my lord!" he faltered; "the sight will kill you!"

"Was it so terrible?"

Dee shuddered, as with horror, at the recollection of it.

"Speak, man!" exclaimed the favourite, violently excited; "I am no girl to start at shadows, or shrink from evil fortune! What say the spirits?"

"Propose your questions, my lord," said the old man, "and I will answer them, even as the spirits answered me."

"'Tis well," replied the ambitious seeker of futurity. "Will her Majesty Queen Elizabeth ever become a wife?"

"Within three months—or never," said the old man. "During that time Venus will shine propitious in the house of Life—but Virgo is coy."

"Should she marry, who will be her husband?"

"A subject!" answered the astrologer, boldly. "For it is revealed to me that the daughter of the Tudors shall never mix her lineage with one of royal birth. Hence her struggles and vacillations between pride and love!"

"But love will prevail—will it not?" demanded the favourite, his features flushed with triumph.

"The spirit said not that," observed the old astrologer. "I dare not force a wrong construction of its words!"

The answer, like most answers given under similar circumstances, left a loop-hole for the prophet to save his reputation, should the result not correspond with his prediction. But Leicester was too much excited to observe it: already in imagination he felt himself a king. He was no less credulous than ambitious.

"To my last, and not least important question," resumed the earl. "Will the successor of Elizabeth be a male or female sovereign?"

"A male one, my lord!"

"So much for the fortunes of Mary Stuart!" thought the peer.

"More," continued Dr. Dee; "he will be the son of a queen and a subject, born in wedlock. But great difficulties will attend the union of his parents."

Leicester was more than satisfied. Although the prediction applied exactly to the infant just born to the Queen of Scots, in his vanity he chose to interpret it his own way. His would be the son, and its mother Elizabeth. How frequently do mankind deceive themselves into the belief of what they wish.

The Earl of Leicester drew from his finger a rich jewel, and, throwing it upon the table near to the bag of gold, thanked the learned doctor for the service he had rendered him. The astrologer bowed humbly, and himself conducted his visitor to the gate of his little garden, where a page was holding his horse. The high-spirited animal was pawing the ground, impatient for the arrival of his master. As the servant had described, half a dozen varlets, well armed, were drawn up under the wall of the old church.

"Go to, for an ambitious knave!" muttered the old man, as the party rode off. "Ill befell the day, should the crown of England dishonour itself by an alliance with the blood of Dudley, the extortioner! They say Henry hanged his grandfather unjustly; but that is no reason," he added, "why Elizabeth should bestow her hand and sceptre upon his descendant!"

"None in the least!" whispered a deep voice near him.

The astrologer started, and partially drew from his girdle a weapon which he invariably carried.

"Tush, man! Be not so ready with your dagger!" said the speaker, carelessly. "It is only an old acquaintance!"

Dr. Dee raised the torch he carried in his hand, and recognised the calm, austere countenance of Cecil.

CHAPTER XLI.

Vex not my soul with unquiet words, my lords!
My mind's resolved—fixed as the word of fate!
No eloquence can shake it.

ISLAND QUEEN.

As may be supposed, the subtle Cecil was not long before he obtained from Dr. Dee the full particulars of his interview with the Earl of Leicester.

"You have acted wisely!" he said. "The hope where-with you have filled the coxcomb's brain will urge him to join the Opposition in the House of Peers, who press for the queen's marriage. Her majesty will scarce forgive him for it!"

"Truly," observed the astrologer, "she is as tenacious of her royal prerogative as ever her royal father was!"

"True, doctor!" said the statesman. "Woe to him that wakes her wrath by touching it!"

"My lord," said the old man, after a pause, "you are one of those round whom the policy of kingdoms turn; and yet you have not, with all your cunning, considered one little obstacle to the downfall of the Earl of Leicester—that he alone, of all who brave her anger, in urging Elizabeth to declare her successor, or marry, has a fair claim for her indulgence! He can plead love as his excuse; others, ambition only, or the interests of their party!"

"You do not know her!" observed Cecil. "She will never give her hand to Leicester! The death of his wife has rendered him infamous!"

"Then," answered Dr. Dee, with conviction, "her majesty will never marry!"

On the following day, when Parliament assembled, both Houses addressed her majesty, and solicited her to appoint a successor to her crown, or yield to the wishes of her nation, and marry.

Elizabeth received the joint deputation seated on her throne in the Palace of St. James. Never before had those around her seen her so determined in manner—so thoroughly roused—so like her despotic father.

"Attend to your own duties, my lords and citizens!" she exclaimed; "and I will look to mine! A successor! Am I so old or so unwise, that I should dig my own grave, and give treason a rallying point? Never! you have treated me," she added, "as you durst not have treated my father!"

Deputation upon deputation succeeded, but still the answer was the same. The Protestant party, stirred up by Leicester, who vainly hoped to force the queen into a marriage, were resolute. The Commons, with an unusual spirit of independence, passed a vote that the subsidies should be incorporated with a bill naming the successor to the crown, in the event of Elizabeth dying without children. The measure did not shake her. She wrote the following memorandum at the foot of the bill, when presented to her:

"I know no reason why any of my private answers to the realm should serve for prologue to a subsidy vote; neither yet do I understand why such audacity should be used to make without my licence an act of my words. Are my words like lawyers' books, which nowadays go to the wire-drawers, to make subtle doings more plain? Is there no hold of my speech without an act to compel me to confirm? Shall my princely consent be turned to strengthen my words, that be not of themselves substantives? Say no more at this time; but if these fellows—we fear she meant the members of the House of Commons by this irreverent word fellows—were well answered, and paid with lawful coin, there would be no fewer counterfeits among them!"

But Elizabeth was too wise to remain at variance with the representation of the nation: she sent for a considerable number of the members of either House, and remonstrated privately with them.

Her argument was, that it was not for her own honour, or the dignity of her crown, that she should be forced into a measure which she disliked, or a hasty, ill-considered marriage. That she had made no vow of celibacy; and, doubtless, in due time, would satisfy the prayer of her people.

"Parliament, my lords and gentlemen," she said, "have declared their willingness to grant me an extra subsidy, provided I name a successor to my throne; now half the sum they propose will content me. The money is as well in the pockets of my subjects as in my Exchequer; as for the rest, leave me to my own time. Doubtless I shall content ye speedily one way or the other."

This condescension of the sovereign, who was so popular, was not without its effect; for the Houses immediately granted her majesty the unusual grant of one-fifteenth and one-tenth from the people, and four shillings in the pound from the clergy, without any condition being annexed to it.

When informed by Cecil of the result of her diplomacy, Elizabeth smiled. She had outwitted both Houses; the subsidy was all she required.

When the deputations waited upon her, the royal virgin received them somewhat disgraciously.

"We thank you for the supplies," she said, "and shall be careful of their use; and now, my lords and gentlemen, return to your several counties—we have no further occasion for such faithful services; we do prorogue you! You may have," she added, "a wiser or better sovereign to reign over you, but one more careful of the general weal you cannot have; but whether I ever live to meet you again, or you are summoned by my successor, beware how you try the patience of your sovereign as you have tried mine!"

With these words she separated from her Parliament.

None were more mortified or surprised at the result of the attempt to coerce Elizabeth than her favourite, the Earl of Leicester: his dream of ambition was dissipated, or, if not dissipated, he regarded the aim for which he had intrigued as more remote than ever. For several days the royal virago forbid him her presence.

Cecil triumphed in the disgrace of the haughty, scheming favourite, whose influence frequently counteracted his at the council-board and in the cabinet of their sovereign. At first he deemed his downfall assured; but in one respect, at least, Dr. Dee proved that he knew the character of Elizabeth better than her minister. Her fit of anger did not last long. After a few weeks' anger and humiliation, the earl was restored to favour—nay, more, the rumour again became general, that the queen intended to marry him: they were deceived—she was merely coquetting with his vanity and passion. By this time she had outlived the ardent feelings which, as in the case of the Lord Admiral, led her to risk a crown to gratify her

ove. What a strange mixture of vanity, prudence, weakness, and strength, does the character of Elizabeth present! About this time a proclamation was issued, forbidding any one, without the royal licence of her majesty, to paint her portrait, which she insisted should be done without the employment of shade: hence her extraordinary likeness at Hampton Court.

As for the costume of the greatest of England's queens, it was an affair of state. The following extract is from the Royal Wardrobe Book:

"Lost from her majesty's back the 17th of January, anno 10 R. Eliz. at Westminster, one aglet of gold enamelled blue, set upon a gown of purple velvet, the ground satin; the gown set all over with aglets of two sorts, the aglet which is lost being of the bigger sort. Mem., That the 18th of April anno 8 R. Eliz. her majesty wore a hat having a band of gold enamelled with knots, and set with twelve small rubies or garnets, at which time one of the said rubies was lost. Item, Lost from her majesty's back at Willington, the 16th of July, one aglet of gold enamelled white. Item, One pearl and a tassel of gold being lost from her majesty's back, off the French gown of black satin, the 15th day of July, at Greenwich."

The same book is filled with similar memoranda: in fact, the losses in jewellery from the person of her majesty were so frequent, that one is almost inclined to suspect the honesty of the courtiers—more especially as not a single entry occurs of one of the pieces of jewel-work ever being found.

ESSAYS.

No. CXCVIII.—MESMERISM.

WE live in an age of revelations. Every day produces a wonder, to startle and amaze even the most gifted children of the earth. It was only yesterday, as it were, that the marvellous properties of steam were discovered; and, through the application of the prodigious powers it has called into play, changed the aspect of the whole world—not merely in the habits and discipline of the human material, but in the very appearance of the soil, the rock, the forest, and the ocean. Man has taken unto himself wings. He bounds over seas and continents at will, and makes new empires and new conditions of society with such a magnificent celerity, that were mental darkness all of a sudden to fall on the human mind, leaving only a twilight, his performances would, when the sun had risen again in partial splendour, be remembered and treasured only as traditions of a period in which giants lived, who converted the sea and the land into a huge laboratory of industry and genius.

Then, as if the application of steam-power was not sufficient for one age, electricity is seized and converted into an agent for bringing man nearer to the Infinite. We not only apply this all-pervading, subtle, but mysterious power to domestic and artistic purposes, but we make it our messenger—our Ariel—and silently put a girle round the world in such an incalculably small space of time, that the operation absolutely annihilates the idea of time.

But of all the discoveries and revelations which crowd around us, none have a higher importance than those that relate to man himself—to his mission, his destiny, his hereafter. For centuries he has been the least studied. Mechanicians, both surgical and metaphysical, have subjected his frame to the closest anatomical examinations; but his great self—his hidden and inner life—the real cause of his power and his being, have, until only very recently, been systematically neglected.

The old pagan heresy, which forbids too curious inquiries into things not patent to the ordinary senses, has operated against the pursuit of all such studies: and the result is that, amid all triumphs in steam—our directions of the electric current—our painting by the sun—our use of the atmosphere itself as a motive power—we know no more of the organisation of human nature than Galen and his contemporaries did three thousand years ago. Happily this indifference is being rapidly dispelled, and one of the predilections of our time is beginning to be a feverish anxiety to analyse man—his nature, characteristics, and power—with exactness, sagacity, and suggestive, wide-reaching, and independent thought. Phrenology has been accepted. It is useless now for the timorous carapists to kick against its truths. In close alliance with it is Mesmerism—alleged to be a discovery of the last century, but which, within the past ten years, has been brought into more prominent notice. Charlatans, by building up out of it a system of imposture, have considerably retarded its development as a science; but now that the public—especially the thinking public—have taken it into their philosophical consideration, we have sanguine hopes that the doubts and suspicions which surround this presumed revelation in the territory of blended physical and spiritual science, will speedily be dispelled, or confirmed and changed into certainties. We indulge in this remark, after perusing an extraordinary little book—or rather pamphlet—which has been placed at our disposal by the author, who has generously surrendered his copyright to the public. And as we are positive our readers will agree with us in classing his data and arguments among the most original ever advanced, we will, without further comment, introduce the principal part of the essay into our pages.

The title of the brochure is "Mesmerism Solved, Divested of Mystery, and shown to be simply an overlooked Branch of Medical Science, to be received and practised as an auxiliary by the Medical Profession and Heads of Families, for Curative Purposes."

Mesmerism hitherto has been a dreaded and mysterious something, when brought under the eye of an observer; and to the mere hearer of its powers, a delusion—the medical profession, as a body, stoutly denying its existence, and refusing to examine into the alleged proofs—asserting that the numerous cures are either false or only the effects of imagination; and that it is even a burlesque on human credulity to suppose for a moment that the passing of the hand over a diseased part, at the distance of from an inch to a foot, could remove inflammation, rheumatism, palsy, amaurosis, tumours, chest and lung affections; and other persons, silenced by the testimony of men and women of known probity, who have declared what they have witnessed of mesmeric power, cut the knot of difficulty by flatly asserting it is done by Satanic agency—though by what agency they have procured the information from the nether world we know not. To such as really have religious scruples, we kindly refer them to 1st Corinthians, chap. xii., verses 4 to 10, but more especially verses 7 and 9; and advise that they ask themselves the simple question, whether it be a Satanic or Divine agency that is there referred to, by which every man is possessed of some gift or power to be used; and in verse 9 the power specially named—the gifts of healing. Others there are, who, seeing the important cures effected, and the total absence of collusion—by relative mesmerising relative, and strangers mesmerising relatives with a like result—acknowledge the great fact of mesmeric power, and there leave it; yea, they even practise it, effect cures, witness marvellous phenomena—but still there leave it; and in the several books we have read, there appears to be no explanation of what mesmerism is; but page after page of general remarks—the best way to mesmerise—and details of numerous cures effected from many of the diseases to which the human family are subject.

So far as the curative power of mesmerism is concerned, the mystery is solved by an examination of the chemical composition of the human body. The component parts consist of lime, magnesia, iron, soda, potash, and other chemical substances; and a human body requires a given amount of each chemical, to be a healthy substance throughout; and "disease" is simply the want of that due proportion of each, or some chemical combination required to sustain the animal system in the condition familiarly known to us by the word "health." If one kind of food is always taken, there is in due time a development of some powers in excess, and the diminution of others; thus excess in the use of malt liquors produces fat; excess in arrow-root, &c., produces a fullness of flesh at the expense of fibre and muscle; while oatmeal, &c., produces an excess of bone and muscular fibre, and a diminution of fleshiness: so that, as the food of one person differs from another's, and the law of proper quantity and quality of food is neglected, so will there of necessity be a proportionate difference in the chemical composition of the human body.

The body having laid hold of the food thrown into the stomach, manufactures it into chyle, chyme, and blood; and by the law of affinity (which we all acknowledge, but cannot explain), during the blood's passage through the system, absorbs to itself, at particular parts, that quantity and quality in the blood adapted for its peculiar functions:—bone, muscle, fat, bile, gastric juice, saliva, tears, serum, oil, &c.,—being, in other words, lime, albumen, potash, soda, iron, magnesia, water, &c.; and the rougher and unnecessary parts of the food, having their strength and virtue extracted by the chemical process detailed, pass off and out of the system by the draft.

Food thus sublimated, and endowed with vitality by means of the immense volume of oxygen inhaled by us as air, performs its allotted task; and then stands out in bold relief that marvellous phenomenon, physical nature throwing off itself.

The human body is perpetually in action, throwing off, by the innumerable pores of the skin, by breathing, and by other means, the chemical essence from the compound of which the body is made: the principal machinery in action to concentrate and throw off the essence, appears to be a life electric battery, produced by the alkaline acid quality of the blood perforating the skin of the blood-vessels, and so coming in contact with the acid juice of the flesh, thus creating a battery for the discharge of animal chemical electricity, analogous to the galvanic battery of copper and zinc, the product of which is mineral electricity.

That the human body is ever throwing off an essence, may be observed in the unhealthy effluvia we are conscious of, when in contact with diseased individuals, from breath, &c.; and though not more marked in healthy persons than pure air to those living in it, yet from them it comes as strong. Witness the scent-power of the bloodhound: it tracks its victim through the jungle and prairie, having only the odour or essence retained by a blanket or portion of dress which may have been worn by the party pursued: showing to demonstration, that every individual has his distinctive chemical composition, as marked as the features of the human face. It is therefore plain that the body is ever giving off, by breath, by heat, the chemical properties of which it is composed; in the same manner as heated water, by steam is ever giving off a portion of its body, its properties, its nature; and if not controlled, confined by machinery, is drifted off into the atmosphere, and its power lost: so is the essence exuding from man ever passing off, ascending into the atmosphere, and becoming part of some fresh combination in nature. Other agents there are in nature, throwing off a healthy or unhealthy influence; even flowers—the bright, the beautiful flowers—are throwing off an essence for good or evil; and it is an acknowledged truth, that plants allowed to remain in a bed-room at night are injurious to animal life, and that conservatories opening into sitting-rooms are improper, as the night essence thrown off by plants is dangerous: in the day they absorb their food of light, air, and moisture; and at night throw off that subtle something here called essence. Again, minerals are ever throwing off an essence, which fact is made more obvious by their being subjected to the action of heat and whatever of power there be—be it in the animal, mineral, or vegetable—that power is not in the rough, the visible parts seen by the eye; but in the essence which, attracted by atmospheric influence, is drawn or magnetised out of the body so operated upon.

The power known universally by the name Will, is something so subtle as to have eluded the most analysing genius who has yet appeared on the surface of time. Still it exists; every living being feels its power—feels he has it in possession—and that power has under its control bones, muscles, nerves, and the very finest fibres of the physical body: it can move the head, the arm, the hand, and the feet at will—it is “the will,” and that is the end of all the definitions possible to be given. If the body is inert, apparently helpless, in a moment it seems to animate the feet: we feel strength—sudden, powerful—and we walk, we run. The Will has under its control—so far as the voluntary muscles and nerves are concerned—the chemical essence or electricity in the body; and by its power sends into the feet the surplus essence in the course of passing off the body in waste, which, uniting with the life essence already in the feet, gives the requisite power to carry out the operation of the will—and so on as to any other member of the body which it is necessary to bring into action. Does the carpenter, or the blacksmith, require strength in his arm, his hand? He wills: the chemical electricity comes, his hand heats, an immense energy seems in his power; and the blow—whether upon the wood or upon the heated iron—tells with effect. His will has directed his animal power, and the surplus essence, having a direction given to it, passes off by the hand, and continues so to do, till that surplus being exhausted, and a larger amount being taken from the other parts of the body than can be afforded, weakness, lassitude, exhaustion are the result; and till nature has had time to manufacture in its wonderful laboratory the food for its battery, man is prostrate.

Mesmerism is, therefore, simply the surplus chemical essence passing off the hands and fingers, by the exercise of the will, as in the ordinary every-day action of the mechanic—with this difference: to an observer, the mallet and the hammer show something in the hand producing a result; while the mesmeriser shows nothing but the will and the essence: the two invisibles are equally performing their duty, and the result in both cases shows equally their existence and power.

The essence has a living energy and power—a subtlety of action in its sphere—which the mere mineral or vegetable cannot have. It is not possible that minerals collected, ground to powder and boxed up in a laboratory, or that the root, bark, or leaves of the vegetable, dry and withered, can have the same active chemical power that the essence has, flowing, streaming from the healthy vital body; and as the surface of the body is crowded with innumerable pores, it presents a natural and incomparable passage for the essence to be thrown by the operator into that part of the body which is diseased—say the chest, the lungs, the head, the foot, the spine, the arm, &c.; whereas ordinary medicines have to be swallowed, digested, extracted, and absorbed; and in many diseases almost uniformly unsuccessfully.

Disease, in ninety-five cases out of a hundred, is simply an obstruction of the blood-vessels, created by the languid action of the blood, for want of the due admixture of chemical substances, producing inflammation, mortification—death. It is evident, therefore, that if the stoppage could be removed inflammation would cease, disease would be removed, and the healthy tone of the body be in full power. The essence streaming from man, when directed by the will, and poured, shall I say, upon the diseased part—be it rheumatism in the arm, or wrist, where the action can be watched—causes a powerful heat to be felt by the patient, frequently accompanied by a “tingling” sensation; the veins visibly swell, the chemical action of the essence acts upon and appears to dissolve the obstruction; the enlarged veins, like an enlarged drain, give passage for carrying off the inflammatory matter; and the ever onward course of the life blood forces the way, and the restored action, and cessation of pain, attest the cure.

The mesmeric passes are generally made by pointing the fingers at a distance of a quarter of an inch to two inches from and over the diseased part; by contracting the fingers, and holding them over it, with the same kind of feeling and in the position as if a pen were in the hand, and in the act of writing; and after holding the hand in that position for a short time—say a minute—gradually move the fingers from the diseased part, and at the same distance, and draw off the hand at a more rapid pace to the nearest extremity—thus, for the head, over the ears and off at the shoulders; for the arm, off at the fingers; for the legs, the feet; repeat the process, do it heartily, kindly, and you will, in from five to fifteen minutes, be gratified with the result.

On the essence being absorbed by the disease, it is more than likely the operator will feel as if something were coming off at his finger-ends; and also frequently accompanied by a throbbing, accelerated pulsation in one or more of his fingers; a sensation which reminds one of water pouring out of a narrow-necked phial. Nature is then carrying out the well-known law of demand and supply. Fire attracts air, and combustion is the result; heat attracts electricity, and the flash of lightning and the roll of the thunder proclaim that atmospheric health is restored; animal inflammation attracts animal essence, and health is the result. Thus nature is everywhere, in its several divisions, carry out the great law of equilibrium; and as the atom, minute of itself, has, within its acknowledged littleness, all the qualities, character, and laws of the mountain of granite; so a human body, minute of itself, has within itself all the qualities, character, and laws which govern the mass of animal matter existing on the surface of the globe.

Returning to the action of the essence on a diseased part, if at the close of the sitting—say from fifteen minutes to thirty—there should be any stiffness in the limb operated upon, blow over the part, and the stiffness will be removed, let the plan indicated be carried out once or twice a-day till the cure is effected. If it should happen that the patient be inclined to sleep—which is likely, when operating upon the chest or lungs—encourage it, as it shows the essence is laying hold of the system, the same as laudanum or morphine, in the usual routine of medicine.

Medicine—whether applied internally in the form of a pill, powder, fluid; or externally in the form of a blister, lotion, or fomentation—is simply a chemical combination, scientifically mixed and applied by the practitioner, for acting upon disease, and stimulating the physical powers, so as to enable them to overcome an obstruction, and perform their functions naturally.

Mesmerism is a chemical combination scientifically mixed by Nature, and found in every healthy human body, male or female; and when applied by an earnest will on a diseased part, or as near that part as is possible, acts at once; and, by stimulating the physical powers, enables them to overcome an obstruction, and perform their functions naturally.

I have not touched that part of the subject which involves the magnetic power residing in animal essence; my object has been simply to solve the problem, “What is Mesmerism?” I have done so, by proving that curative mesmerism is simply the chemical essence flowing out of every healthy human being; which, being absorbed by a diseased body, acts medicinally, and so produces health; the effect in both cases being to him increased health, strength, and length of days. But I affirm that, from experiments personally made, I have found that a strong, muscular hand is able, without touching, to draw a passive outstretched feeble hand to the right or left—up or down—even at a distance of more than nine feet; and that as animal fibre is able so to draw animal fibre, as a strong magnet is able to draw a weak magnet, thus is accounted for, practically and scientifically, the rapidity with which inflammation is drawn from the patient's body by the operator; and that the magnetic power residing in man is to the homo essence, what an instrument is in the hands of a practitioner.

Pure air, inhaled and absorbed by the lungs, produces health; impure air, inhaled and absorbed by the lungs, produces disease. This vital truth is now universally admitted, by the immense sanitary efforts that are being made in all parts of the civilised world: and as this great law in nature is so marked, and as so many thousand lives are annually sacrificed at the shrine of consumption and its satellites, for many years it has occurred to me, that surely in nature some substance could be found, the fumes of which, inhaled by the patient, would act upon the diseased lungs, chest, and blood. I have thought of several, but the practical difficulty of getting the system to accept anything by the lungs but its ordinary food of oxygen, has been too great to be overcome; but, on perceiving the chemical character of the human essence, it at once erected itself as the solution of the problem.

Diseased man will accept freely, and by inhalation with the air he breathes, a chemical essence manufactured by, and in affinity with, his own nature. The blood passes the air-cells in the lungs three times in about eight minutes, and absorbs the oxygen required for its purification. At the same moment of time the inhaled essence presents itself, and is absorbed by the lungs and blood, endowed with the living vital energy of the operator's will and health; while mineral and vegetable essence has to be extracted from the solid by digestion, &c., before it can attach itself to disease; and even then it lacks that subtle vital power, that due admixture of chemical quality, necessary for grappling with lung and chest diseases; and so powerful and effectual is this remedy, that if applied, I believe 80 per cent. of the ordinary patients would be cured of those scourges of Britain—consumption and inflammation of the lungs, as well as of minor throat complaints.

In operating by inhalation, I suggest, after the patient has taken his seat, that the operator take a chair on the right side of the patient, facing him, or, if more convenient, stand beside the person: then let the operator simply place his fingers close to the nostril or mouth, in the position before detailed, and every breath drawn by the patient will carry in the essence to do its duty. Avoid conversation. You are at your work; do it, and talk after. Keep before your mind the great truth that your fingers are the wires of your chemical battery, and that your essence is streaming off as surely, though as invisibly, as electricity by the wires in connection with a galvanic battery. If your patient drops off to sleep, let him sleep on.

I have avoided amplifying on the several points placed before the reader. The subject is full of life; and the more it is considered, and the mind brought to bear on its anatomy, the more will it unfold its wonders for scientific research; and if by this effort I have so far influenced the medical profession, and heads of families, as to try for themselves the power of the chemical essence upon any one of their own family, where collusion is impossible, my object will be accomplished; soon mesmerism will be fully acknowledged, and become a powerful auxiliary in the hands of the practitioner for restorative purposes.

I have, so far, only cleared up the mystery of CURATIVE MESMERISM. As to the further question of clairvoyance, I am not disposed in this essay to clear up the difficulties that surround it. That it exists is true; and the film that spreads itself before the subject has only to be cut by the analysing knife of reason and science, and then the eye of clairvoyance will be seen, in all its symmetry and beauty, a monument of Divine power, and an additional evidence of that great Scripture saying: “We are fearfully and wonderfully made.”

Fearfully and wonderfully indeed; for, if this theory be correct, who can say where the discoveries in this branch of science will terminate? Already it has opened to our gaze a new principle, a new living world. And why, we may be allowed to ask, should our inner life be buried? Why should we be prohibited from revelling in our other existence—our purer, more ethereal moiety? Nothing, we are told on the highest authority, was created in vain; and if mesmerism can explain and show us some of the links that connect us with higher intelligences than ourselves as developed to our present comprehension, let us accept its revelations with gratitude and reverence. And if we hesitate, in the absence of assurances acceptable to every capacity, do not let us, for the dignity of reason, descend to vulgar scorn and abuse. Let us remember that in darker ages all new ideas were ridiculed and persecuted.

Harvey, who first discovered the circulation of the blood, was styled “vagabond or quack,” and persecuted through life. Ambrose Paré, in the time of Francis I., introduced the ligature as a substitute for the painful mode of stanching the blood after the amputation of a limb—namely, by applying boiling pitch to the surface of the stump. He was, in consequence, persecuted with the most remorseless rancour by the Faculty of Physic, who ridiculed the idea of putting the life of man upon a thread, when boiling pitch had stood the test for centuries! Paracelsus introduced antimony as a valuable medicine: he was persecuted for the innovation, and the French parliament passed an act making it penal to prescribe it; whereas it is now one of the most important medicines in daily use. The Jesuits of Peru introduced to Protestant England the Peruvian bark (invaluable as a medicine), but, being a remedy used by the Jesuits, the Protestant English at once rejected the drug as the invention of the devil. In 1693 Dr. Groenvelt discovered the curative power of cantharides in dyspepsia. As soon as his cures began to be noised abroad, he was committed to Newgate, by warrant of the President of the College of Physicians, for prescribing cantharides internally. Lady Mary Montague first introduced into England small-pox inoculation, having seen its success in Turkey, in greatly mitigating that terrible disease. The faculty all rose in arms against its introduction, foretelling the most disastrous consequences; yet it was in a few years generally adopted by the most eminent members of the profession. Jenner, who introduced the still greater discovery of vaccination, was treated with ridicule and contempt, persecuted and oppressed by the Royal College of Physicians; yet he subsequently received large pecuniary grants from government for the benefit he had conferred on his country, by making known his valuable discovery; and at the present time its observance is very properly enjoined by the whole medical profession and the legislature.

Franklin and Priestley were laughed at for their discoveries in electricity; the early phrenologists were divided; and a little before our own day, the promoters of railways were treated as enthusiasts fit only for lunatic asylums. Yet notwithstanding all this moral and mental obtuseness, railways are accepted as a necessity, phrenology takes high rank among the physical sciences, and civilisation could now scarcely do without the electric telegraph. The fact is, that nothing new, however true, is accepted with cordiality. Suspicion, at once the handmaiden and the bane of intellect, receives it with surly indifference and ignorance; the direct cure of mankind with brutal scorn and contempt. But such labours as those of the gentleman whose pamphlet we have adopted, will liberally contribute to the destruction of this bad feeling; for his exposition of the theory of mesmerism divests it of all mystery, and presents it to us as a natural law.

THE TEMPLES OF BUDDHA, AT RANGOON.

MOVING along with the guns, ample time was afforded to behold, with admiration, the temples which lined the road on each side. These temples appeared similar to those we had already seen—the distinguishing temple of this region—an irregular, solid cone, surmounted by an elegant top, over which is the “tee” (umbrella), gracefully fringed with bells, which emit music at the bidding of Æolus. It may interest the reader to learn that Solomon, King of Israel, about one thousand years before the Christian era, had bells suspended about his temple, probably intended, “by the sound they produced on being agitated by the wind, to keep off the birds from the consecrated edifice.” Like means are said to have been adopted on the Grecian temples. Some of the numerous edifices we now beheld were evidently the work of an age long passed away: perhaps raised in honour of Gaudma, to celebrate successive victories gained by the Burmese over Chinese kings. We next came upon smaller shrines, with an open space in the centre, containing one or more Gaudmas; and had it not been for the desolation produced by war—had the spots around, where our guns had done dreadful havoc, been adorned with living beings, and bright, green foliage, and clear streams, the sweet song of cheerful birds gladdening the air the while—that “avenue” of temples would have caused the antiquary, or lover of picturesque beauty, to exclaim: “Within, without—all is enchantment!” Eighteen or twenty images of Gaudma were found in one small temple: some of these were composed of pure alabaster, others were of brick, churned over, and beautifully gilt. Proceeding on our interesting march, we came to a magnificent descent of steps. On each side a huge griffin, admirably carved, beside a small shrine; then, leading along to the base of the steps, flanked by the superb design of a gigantic crocodile, with open jaws, as if ever ready to devour the ruthless invader of the sacred fane! Having now moved along the summit of a chain of heights commanding the plains to the eastward, we came round, after much trouble with the guns, and passed on the second terrace, the north entrance to the Great Pagoda. Not far beyond, the artillery officers put up for the night in a respectable Burmese house. Its construction seemed admirably adapted to the climate. Stout posts are sunk into the earth; the bamboo floor of the house is then laid four or five feet above the level of the ground, which keeps off the damp of the soil in the monsoon. The walls are of plank, or of mat; and the roof is a simple framework, covered with a thatching of palm-leaves, which, when properly managed, are always water-proof. [In one of these dwellings the author of this narrative is now writing, while the rain is descending in torrents.]—April 16th. The artillery moved to the upper terrace, or that round the base of the Great Pagoda. We had now a good opportunity of beholding the vastness of this Guadma's "solemn temple." The canopied staircase, grotesque with red and gold, seemed not in keeping with the dignified grandeur of Shoé Dagoon and his associates. They served as excellent quarters for the European troops. The great temple on its gorgeous summit being viewed through a telescope, suggests to the fancy some enchanted hill, on the top of which a band of fairies have found an abode where they might for ever dwell, undisturbed, far away from the haunts of men. Waving golden leaves attached to tinkling bells, and rich gold work, all so snugly protected by the golden tee, draw forth admiration. Carrying the eye downwards, the gilding becomes far less bright; the spectator is then astonished by its immensity, as, gazing on the beautifully waving lines and rectangular stones, extending to a sort of enormous pedestal, on which the temple seems to stand, and huge monsters which look not of this world, and small windows set in golden array, he approaches the mighty base. From this to the summit measures three hundred and twenty-one feet; and yet, from its graceful proportions, it is difficult to believe the height so great. Shoé Dagoon is encircled, at some distance, by smaller pagodas, all possessing more or less beauty. One, situated to the north-east of it, is larger than the others: its body, black with age, and the bright golden summit forming a striking contrast. But all sink into insignificance before the great fane, built in an age long passed away, in honour of the representative of a wonderful religion—Guadma, an incarnation of Buddha, whose followers are more numerous than those of any other creed among the whole human race! Viewing this stupendous edifice by moonlight, one might be led to feel that there must be some mysterious power in an intricate and symbolic worship which could draw forth such general sympathy in the east—that the creed of Buddha is derived from pure materials; or, to repeat a speculation hazarded in a former work, Buddha, being invested with many attributes which belong only to the Messiah, was simply a less refined creation than that of the Redeemer, as set forth in the Old Testament. The stranger, on beholding the Shoé Dagoon Pagoda, is apt to imagine that it is all built of some rare stone or granite, like the massive temples in Southern India, or the gigantic pyramids of Egypt. But in reality it is one vast cone of brickwork, ingeniously covered over, and to which age has given the appearance of stone. The winged monsters at the base, and other figures—some with comely faces—go far to strengthen this idea. About the temple you may be forcibly reminded of a celebrated description in "Eothen;" for you may there find a visage gazing on—gazing on—with tranquil mien and pouting lips, like "the very Sphynx;" infinitely smaller, but still with a similar sad and solemn countenance.—Lieut. Laurie's Second Burmese War.

A MAN ASLEEP FOR FIVE YEARS.—On the 19th of June, 1848, a man named Cornelius Vrooman, of Clarkson, in this county, went to sleep; since which he has slept all the time, awakening at long intervals—sometimes four or five months—and staying awake an hour or two, when he resumes his nap. He is fed by his attendants during his sleep; when awake he eats voraciously. This is certified by some leading physicians.—Bochester American.

A WOLF SUPPER ON THE PRAIRIES.

ONE day my Indian companion and I were out for many hours, and though hunting most indefatigably, had bagged nothing. It came on to snow slightly in the afternoon, and I had turned about, and was making for our rendezvous, which was at the corner of a wood not far off, when I saw, at a little distance, something grey lying down. I looked carefully, and saw a wolf, which on approaching appeared to me dead, and therefore I did not remove the gun-cover from my rifle. I walked close to the spot, and was surprised a second time by the brute jumping up and scampering off at full speed. I lost as little time as I could in tearing off my gun-cover, cocked my rifle, and made an excellent shot, rolling the wolf over and over. On coming up I found I had killed a very fine she-wolf in prime condition. I re-loaded, and put back my rifle in the gun-cover, heaved my prize on my shoulders, freshened my way as much as possible, and, nearing our rendezvous, had the pleasure of seeing the Indian rapidly approaching me. He quite surprised me by the delight he showed at my having secured the wolf.

We made ourselves pretty comfortable in the willows near the river, and, under a bush to windward, with a good roaring fire at our feet, and well sheltered by walls of snow which we scraped up with slabs of drift-wood, we sat down and cooked our wolf, the Indian assuring me all the while that it was a great deal nicer than lean deer-meat. Hungry, however, as a whole day's unsuccessful hunting had made me, I was still very unwilling, in spite of his assurances, to try it; but the evident relish with which I saw him eating it quite disarmed me of my prejudices against wolf-meat, and, in fine, I feasted on the fat ribs, which proved most palatable, and certainly very superior to lean venison. My companion laughed at observing me completely conquer my scruples, and detach a couple more ribs from the savoury fore-quarter then hissing at the fire. We certainly enjoyed our supper that night, nor was my stomach a whit the worse for the strange food with which it had been astonished. After supper we lighted our pipes, and smoked, dozed, and conversed alternately till sunrise, when we roasted more of the wolf, ate a good breakfast, and again continued our hunting.—Palliser's Solitary Rambles in the Prairies.

(THE CAVALRY CAMP.)

THE CAMP AT CHOBHAM.

THE camp at Chobham by night is a solemn scene. Imagine the wildest country possible to be found in England. A barren heath, broken at fitful intervals by clumps of stunted trees, and everywhere heather, looking just like the sky does when masses of clouds gather for the awful battle of the lightnings and thunder. The moon in placid beauty sheds down a soft light, which mellows everything but the dark heather. There is a gleam of steel at intervals, and the tall shake of a grenadier, or waving plume of a Highlander, may be discerned going to and fro amid the glistening, ghastly white of the tents; but not a footfall is heard, or the murmur of voices, to break the monotony of night. A dread, solemn silence prevails—the artillery, looking grim in their lengthy repose, are mute. And yet there—amid that silence—are at least ten thousand human beings, of whom nine thousand are men trained and disciplined to all the severities and hardships, and pomp and glory of war. Their slumber is as profound as that which overtook the army of the Assyrian monarch on the night when the destroying angel—the plague—came among them, and withered them away. However, let but that sentinel on the crest of a slight elevation on the borders of the camp utter but one cry of alarm, or fire one shot, and that camp will rattle again with the energy of men who, at every moment, night or day—snowed or sunrised—are prepared to do or die; men who emphatically merit the poet's eulogy:

Men of England! who inherit
Rights that cost your sires their blood.
Men whose undegenerate spirit
Has been proved on land and flood.

In a few minutes that host are armed and standing shoulder to shoulder, charger to charger; they are rock-like in their firmness. "A forest huge" of bayonets glitters in the pale moonbeams, and those guns are ready to "volley like the bolts of heaven." Give but the word, and those serried files will move over the dark heath as proudly and steadily as a fleet of a hundred guns steamers ploughing their way through the waters of the ocean. But, happily, the dreadful necessity does not arise—there is no occasion to "join the dreadful revelry"—it was only a false alarm; and at the sound of the trumpet which summoned them to arms, they lay aside their accoutrements, stable their horses, and drop to sleep again, as placidly as if nothing had occurred to break their refreshing slumbers.

In the morning, generally at nine, the men have breakfasted, and are turned out in full marching order, for inspection. It is to be a grand field day, and every officer is looking his best, and the men are passively and cheerfully making up their minds to do any quantity of hard work—which, considering the season and the nature of the duties to be performed, is very hard work indeed.

The respective colonels inspect their regiments with professional keenness; and while they are doing so the country teems with life and busy preparation to enjoy the spectacle. The principal approaches to the camp are thronged by carriages; and, toiling up the steep and broken roads, the aristocratic brougham, or imposing travelling carriage, precedes a wretched looking hack. The farmer on his plump steed, jogs along expectant and rosy, but sedately; while the pedestrians—who are numerous and of every variety—jog on cracking jokes, and indulging in that species of badinage technically known as "chaff." Before ten o'clock thousands are assembled on the common, and the most motley groups crown the various eminences. The maids of merry England are there in abundance, smiling in curls and braids of jet and auburn; and ruddy country lasses are there blushing, as gay Londoners, with quite an airy manner, invite them to tread a measure to a tune which a band has just struck up:

O the roast-beef of old England!
And O the old English roast-beef!

Viewed in its imposing ensemble, the scene on these grand days, as they are termed, is very animated and brilliant. The long lines of the troops drawn up in the various quarters of the camp present a magnificent spectacle. The noble-looking Guards, with their flashing helmets and cuirasses, present one of the most conspicuous features. The light cavalry look handsome and plucky, while the infantry, living walls of strength and courage, remind you of many a field on which their splendid but terrible valour had been exercised. And amid all, and on the skirts of the camp, the artillery present a murderous aspect. We can observe that the men are remarkably fine fellows, and that they carry in their sun-burnt visages an expression of intelligence which excites both pleasure and admiration.

However, we must remark, that intelligence and good conduct are by no means confined to one section of the British army. The schoolmaster, during the past few years, has not been idle; and we venture to assert, that in moral and mental, as well as physical discipline, the British army surpasses every other in the world; and when to this is added a chivalrous love of country, it is but just paying them that compliment to which they are so eminently entitled.

But, hark! While the spectators are clustering like bees on the common, and the air peals with merry laughter, a trumpet is heard: the next instant a gaily-attired horseman dashes into the field, and, quick as lightning, it is passed through the crowd that "The Queen is coming!" This announcement creates the liveliest commotion; and the path by which she is to arrive soon becomes lined with dense masses of pedestrians, equestrians, and vehicles of every description. Presently the royal cavalcade approaches; and, as the newspapers say, her Majesty rode a magnificent dark-bay charger, richly caparisoned in blue and gold. Her riding habit was of dark-blue cloth, with a Basque jacket, fitting tightly to the figure. The hat was remarkably elegant. It was of black felt, of the prevailing shape, with an arrangement of white and red feathers flowing along the brim, which had a very graceful effect. And the cannons rear, and the musketry rattle a right loyal welcome; and after her Majesty has ridden along the lines, she is conducted to the royal tent, which stands on a ridge gently sloping towards a broad valley, or rather flat, made by the long-untended condition of what was once known as the "Gracious Pond"—a well-cared-for receptacle for carp, made in bygone centuries by a rich abbot of Chertsey, whose garden smiled in this now uncultivated spot. On the left rises a high, unwooded knoll, of somewhat abrupt, though not very steep ascent. Behind this are two more gently-elevated hills, round the other side of which the valley sweeps back again towards the encampment. It will thus be seen that the royal tent, or "gazebo," is the centre of an amphitheatre; and when we mention that this is two miles in extent, some commensurate idea may be formed of the extent and grandeur of such a scene.

The signal given, the troops march out of camp, and the mimic but noisy strife commences. As they proceed to take up the ground assigned to them, and while the pulse beats rapidly, we cannot help remarking that, after the lapse of one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three years, war is still an institution—still a necessity. Has it become naturalised among mankind, or is it an inheritance of the instincts? Here, on rugged Chobham Common, is being enacted, in the presence of the British Sovereign, foreign potentates, and the élite of the great and lovely of the land, a scene almost the exact counterpart of which used to delight the Roman emperors on holidays. Here is the camp, and there are horse and foot, and the ensigns, the meteor-flag of England—not an eagle of silver or gold on the top of a spear, as among the Romans, but still an ensign, which the bearer is to guard and defend to the death.

There is the music—wind instruments and drums. The Romans had the trumpet, the cornua, and the buccinæ—all wind instruments, made of brass. And hark! as in ancient days, the general shout at the first onset—the barrius of the Germans, from whom the Romans borrowed the custom.

We may here observe, par parenthèse, that the cheer did not owe its origin to any incident in a battle during the crusades. It is a custom which has been common to all countries and all ages. The soldiers of every martial nation have cheered each other on going into battle. Homer tells us the Trojans did; Tacitus says the same of the Germans, Livy of the Gauls, and Quintus Curtius of the Macedonians and Persians. The Greeks, we all know, cheered lustily at the first encounter; and their writers are at some pains to inform us, that Pan was the originator of the custom, and that he first put it into practice, as lieutenant-general to Bacchus, in the Indian expedition. So that the Anglo-Saxons did not invent the cheer—it was handed down to them from their Hercynian forest-dwelling progenitors, who ruled under the green-wood tree, from the Rhine to the Vistula.

However, the cheer of battle still rings upon the ear as it did in the olden time, and men are as eager to engage. Let but the cause and the hour come, and British soldiers will rush to the fight with as fierce an enthusiasm as animated those fallen but still brave cherubim, who, when their leader spoke —fierce with grasped arms

Clashed on their sounding shields the din of war,
Hurling defiance toward the vault of heaven.

Gunpowder does a good deal now towards settling the question, but steel still plays its part, and battles, as in the great Roman time, are fought by line and rule; even more so—for modern battles are pre eminently subjects for the profoundest sagacity, the coolest calculation, and the most accomplished subtlety.

It is to develop in the British army all the admirable qualities which an able general demands in his troops, that this Chobham encampment has been held this summer, and that the Queen and the public have encouraged the soldiers by their presence and unbounded admiration.

The newspapers of the day have minutely described these bloodless battles; but to explain our second illustration,—the first is the Cavalry Camp, taken from the rear of the Rifle Brigade, the position of which we described in our last number,—we say to explain our second illustration, we must describe the encounter, of which we had the good fortune to enjoy a very fine view, albeit the smoke now and then completely swathed up both the field and the combatants in one dense canopy of blue.

After leaving the camp, the troops were formed into line, the cavalry on the flanks. The length of the infantry, standing two deep, extended two miles. Immediately in the rear of the infantry, the Royal Artillery were placed on eminences commanding the whole of the plain, facing the foot brigades.

The battle began by the whole line of infantry, as far as the eye could reach, pouring a continuous fire on an imaginary advancing foe; while the guns of the Royal Artillery opened a most tremendous cannonade from the heights in the rear. Nothing could be more grand and exciting than the scene at this moment. The whole line of infantry was wrapped in flame and smoke, produced by unceasing file firing; while the cannoniers of the artillery, on the southern hills, could only be faintly discerned in the dense cloud, going through the movements of discharging and re-loading their pieces, with all the steadiness and precision for which that arm of our forces is so remarkable. To the left might now and then be distinguished, as the wind happened to sweep the dense clouds of smoke for an instant from the plain, the shining helmets and bright swords of the cavalry gleaming in the sunshine. The position of the Rifle Brigade, whose sombre uniform rendered them almost invisible against the dark pine wood near which they were posted, could only be discovered by the stunning volleys which they occasionally sent forth. At this moment orders were given to the cavalry and horse artillery to advance to support the infantry, and cover their retreat. They accordingly moved forward in squadrons, with the Royal Horse Artillery in front, keeping as much to the rear of the infantry as possible; and making a détour round the southern end of the common, towards the heights on which the foot batteries were planted, commanding the rear of the whole line.

This is the feature in the engagement which our artist has selected for his embellishment. In the distance, under the trees, the foot artillery are firing upon a hill, which is supposed to be the object of attack. The Horse, or flying artillery, are advancing under protection of their heavy fire, while on the left, the infantry—the household brigades—are formed into squares. The pace at which the artillery went was not rapid; and they availed themselves, during their steady progress, of the declivities and inequalities of the ground to shelter themselves, as it were, from observation, until they arrived at the point desired. Here they remained under cover, awaiting the order to charge. By this time the brigades of infantry on the plain were formed into hollow squares, to repel the expected charge of cavalry. This manoeuvre was brilliantly accomplished. No sooner had the front rank prepared itself to receive cavalry, by kneeling down, than the lines within the square poured forth a continuous discharge of musketry, the smoke of which enveloped the whole plain in a dense and impenetrable cloud; but when that cleared away, and the troops became again visible, the whole infantry force was seen retreating in beautiful order to the shelter of their batteries on the heights. Having formed into columns, and thrown out their skirmishers, who maintained an unceasing and rapid fire on the supposed pursuing enemy, and having stretched for nearly a mile along the plain, and covered the retreat of the steadily-retiring columns, the shrill notes of the bugle were heard from behind the hills, where the cavalry and artillery were posted, sounding the signal for the charge. Instantaneously the horse artillery and four regiments of cavalry rushed from the hills like a mighty and overwhelming torrent, and halted on the plain below, within range of the supposed retreating enemy. In less than a minute the artillery guns were unlimbered, and were pouring forth their loud thunders in the direction of the retreating columns. The effect at this instant was most thrilling, when, amid the roar of artillery reverberating along the hills and awakening echoes which added an awful grandeur to the din of war, the cavalry regiments having formed two deep, made one of the most gallant and dashing charges that could be witnessed. The line of advance was kept with the greatest precision—a matter of manifest difficulty, when it is considered that the horses were almost at racing speed. Nothing could have been more brilliantly executed than this movement. The enthusiasm and soldierly bearing of the officers, the intrepid steadiness of the men, the sounding of the bugles, all tended to produce upon the spectators an overwhelming and electrical effect, and was calculated strongly to convey a notion of the horrors and dangers of the battlefield. Immediately after this manoeuvre the retreat was sounded, and the entire army swept across the plain to the shelter of the batteries, which still remained posted on the heights in the rear.

This concluded the operations of the day, and the troops marched back to camp, where they defiled before her Majesty. The bands struck up, and the cavalry regiments trotted past in columns of troops, followed by the horse artillery and field batteries. The infantry marched past in columns of companies, the band of each filing off as it approached her Majesty, and remaining stationary till its regiment had passed, when it fell to the rear. The sight of the infantry sweeping in open columns over the side of the hills was most striking and picturesque, and her Majesty expressed herself highly delighted with the grand spectacle afforded.

The appearance of the men was really magnificent. No country in the world can bring nine or ten thousand troops into the field. For height, breadth of shoulders, depth of chest, and development of limb, it would be scarcely possible to match them. We do not think the Emperor of Russia, out of his tremendous army—six hundred thousand, according to rumour—could pick such a body of men. The infantry reminded us of the men of whom the historian of the "Peninsular War" said, it was only on the field of battle that the might and majesty of British valour was to be seen to perfection; and should the sad hour ever arrive when their services shall be called into active requisition, we can conscientiously echo the exclamation made by the French general after the Battle of Waterloo: "Nothing can beat that astonishing infantry." As to the cavalry, with their fine equipments, proud martial bearing, and beautiful horses, eulogy would be superfluous. Had Richard Cœur de Lion seen them, he would have slapped his thigh, and, uttering his usual oath, would have cried: "Eureka! Master Saladin, we'll tickle your sides this time!" Of the other branches of the service everything was presented—in look, discipline, and physical power—that could be desired. The artillery were almost frightfully perfect in practice. The bellows of their thunder over Chobham plain and heights, will not soon be forgotten by those unused to the roar of the big guns to whose arbitration big quarrels are referred. Their deafening roar forcibly brought to our recollection Campbell's lyrical description of a battle on a large scale:

Then shook the hills with thunder riven;
Then rush'd the steed to battle driven;
And, volleying like the bolts of heaven,
Far flash'd the red artillery.

THE GERMAN STUDENT'S STORY.

Do I dream, or am I again holding converse with the world of men, from whose haunts I have been so long estranged—with whose impulses, for years, I have had nought in common? I have long been shut out from communion with my kind, and now, like the plant reared in darkness, which languishes for light to give it health and vitality, and turns to the slenderest gleam, my spirit pines for the companionship of man, and now would fain win the benison of his sympathy.

I tread once more amid the haunts of men. Once more I bathe my brow in the free gushing of the blessed air of heaven. Once more I look upon the earth, daedal though it be, and worship the might, the majesty, the magnificence of nature. For this I aspired through the weary days, and more weary nights, which passed heavily over me—as though they would never pass—in my dreary dungeon thrall. For this I languished, with a faded cheek and fevered brow, with withered heart and baffled hopes, until it was scarcely a marvel if I deemed that my very nature was changed. Ay, thus rose my fervent aspirations, through the darkness of what I feared would be an endless, and felt to be an oppressive prisonment; for there dawned no ray of promise within me, or around me, to lighten the gloom which clouded my mind in my noon of life.

I had nerved my spirit to endure perpetual enthrallment. I had striven to forget the living glory and the breathing beauty of the world from which I was shut out; and now, whatever I panted for comes, all unsought, to my enjoyment. Wealth—great among the magnates of the land—vigorous manhood, to plunge, if I would, into power, pleasure, and possession—all that can administer to luxury, that can feed ambition, that can throw a loveliness of aspect over even the laidly features of vice, or strew spring odours upon the path of virtue; an enfranchised and instructed mind, to tower among and above my fellow-men; knowledge, whether won in early years from books—those undeceiving friends—or gleaned from the action and passion of experience, or gained through long years of captivity and endurance, when memory alone was left to a disturbed and distracted mind to link me with the past, and console me for the present, and supply me with hope for the future. These—varied in their aspects, multiform in their powers, unconquerable in their union—these now are mine. Yet now, when they have come, I sadly feel that they are not what I sought. They cannot fling freshness into this withered heart; they cannot erase the memories inscribed by sorrow on the red-leaved tablets of my heart; they cannot bring back the face and form of beauty which won my love in happier hours; they can bring me neither happiness nor forgetfulness; and I smile in bitterness, as I think how idly my spirit could once imagine that such as these would be all-sufficient to secure me happiness.

Through unnoted time, through wearying monotony of prisoned hours, I have had no heart to throbb with the passion-tide of love to my wildly-beating heart, which hath panted for the sweet companionship. The low, soft voices which I loved to listen to in the solemn silence of the still night—the aerial forms of beauty which floated around my couch, while my mind was far away in Dream-land—all are vanished; and long ago, my loftiest auguries of imagination have fallen to the dust, like the priceless vase which drops from the hands of a careless child, shattered beyond all power of restoration.

If I can no more hold converse with her—the fairest and the best—whose name, amid the dreary waste of mournful years, I have uttered but to the voiceful zephyr which glided by me, fraught, I have fondly fancied, with some remembered tone of hers; nor with those, the faithful and the fond, the friends who were mine on earth, as they may be in the starry glory-beds of heaven; nor with those, the deceiving and the heartless, who flitted around me in the prosperous hour, and fled when the wintry blast was heard: if with none of these can I hold converse, yet I may calm the disquietings of a stricken spirit, by tracing on these pages the records of wounded feelings and wasted hopes.

The mother who bore me could not recognise her son in the changed being who sits here to pour out one memory of his heart: my very lineaments are changed—premature troubles have ploughed furrows on my brow and my heart; but let that pass, for I must back to my humanity, for I mingle once more with men.

I am the youngest of many children, and—for surely I may say it now, when for me Fame has lost its spur—was first among them in the gifts of understanding. The glorious writers of the antique times, who poured forth melody, wisdom, and joy (for it is wise to be happy) in a full gush from the exhaustless fountains of their own hearts—these were familiar to me, almost from the time when Reason first bathed my inquiring soul in the rich dews of its eternal power. With little effort did my mind acquire and my memory retain the treasures of knowledge and imagination which these chroniclers of other times and olden inspirations so lavishly have scattered over their venerable and venerated pages. Pleasant was it for my soul to bask in the glorious sunshine of theirs. Delightful was it for my younger and tenderer thoughts to borrow strength and vigour from the calm and matured serenity of theirs.

Nor were the mind-magicians of later times unknown to me, or unprized in their worth. As my knowledge of them increased, so increased my thirst for knowledge. Thus those through whom the Past yet lived, and those from whom the Present might hope for memorials as permanent and bright, were the chosen companions even of my hours of holiday, nor knew I any playmates so untiring, and ever friendly, as these, my books.

Boydhood passed away, and I shot up into the stature of manhood. A proud heart was mine, which brooked not the efforts of the haughty to look me down. To such, a stern glance, a cold, contemptuous eye, was my sole and sufficient answer.

Yet, though I sought not the fellowship of man, it pursued me—like a shadow in the sunny day, or a thought in the starry night—even into the recesses of retirement. And, though I strove to shun it, still it followed me, until I was subdued by the admiration which, despite my coldness, still sued for my regard. So I sometimes mingled in the crowds, a welcomed guest; and all said that even to mirth herself I had lent riches and smiles, which brightened where they fell, and that I had bound the temples of that joy-voiced nymph with flowery wreaths, which I had snatched from the generous lap of bright-eyed pleasure.

Thus I shone as a star among them, the distinguished of the circle. Many a tongue grew eloquent in praise of the young and half-haughty student, whose smile, even as a gerdon, was treasured up by sensitive hearts, through hours of thoughtful solitude. Many a cheek alternated, at my approach, from pale to damask. Many a dark eye, passion-lighted, flashed forth its heretofore latent fires, with eloquent expression, as it met my gaze. Many a maiden trembled with sudden and not undelighted emotion, as the touch of my fingers came thrillingly upon her delicate hand, in the wilder movements and mazes of the passion-nursing dance. Many a heart longed for my appearance, and then—through an infinite excess of deep feeling—shrank back when it felt the consciousness of my presence. And when I presented a rose—ay, or even the humblest meadow flower—to any of that galaxy of loveliness, how often was it secretly worn and fondly cherished next her throbbing heart—even after its beauty had departed, and its odour fled—as a memorial, slight but tender, of him whose touch had sanctified even its worthlessness, and whose gentle thoughts might have gone, if but for a fleeting moment, with the trivial gift.

It may well be conceived that a nature like mine could not be insensible to the feelings I thus excited; but, flatteringly as this consciousness came upon my soul, I then but slightly heeded the incense it wafted there. I felt something within me whispering that I was born for more than the admiration of the few. The aspirations of ambition fed my spirit with auguries of hope; and though I grieved to part from the kind hearts which had made themselves the intimates of my heart, yet I nerved myself to part with them; and, with a compelling desire to win fame, I left the scenes of my youth, of my triumph; and there went with and after me, prayers for success from the aged, and fond anticipations of my renown from the young.

So I went into the busy world of men, yet did not leave the world of my own hoarded contemplations. I mingled with the many. I visited various scenes, and observed all things. I grew familiar with that riddle, the human heart. I learned the arcana of philosophy and art. I read the ever-open page of Nature—for my study had hitherto chiefly been among books—and then I surrounded myself, in the silent night, with the records of heroic history, and trod the starry paths of immortal poetry, until at length I knew, by the struggles of my heart, that for me, also, the hour had come; and then I called up, as with a magician's power, the spells of imagination and the talismans of knowledge, until, blending them together, I poured out on the mute page, in the melody of poetry, the gush of burning thoughts which, from my youth upwards, had been mustering in my mind, vague, erratic, and aimless; and as I wrote, the full tide of passion, pathos, and power rushed from my pen.

I sent my pages into the world of men, and a few felt, and the many said they felt, the witchery of my strain. I became a marvel and a wonder. Poets, as they saw what riches I was scattering with a lavish hand, confessed that I had won, at one bound, what they had spent weary lives in quest of. Philosophers mused, in rapt wonder, over the pages whereon the stern intensity of truth was mingled with the airy fictions of fancy. The Scholar—as, with throbbing brow and silently sickening heart, he studied by his midnight lamp, or upon some sunny bank, beside a gurgling stream in his own native land, whither he had come to die—forsook the lore of antiquity, to ponder, with an elevated spirit, on that which I had produced; and still glowed with admiration while, with impatient delight, he hurried over my page. Beauty—as she sat in the leafy solitude of her rose-wreathed bower, waiting (how anxiously!) for the one who was all the world to her—felt a fever-flush mantle her cheek, and strange spirit-strivings throng through her heart, as she sighed or joyed over my strains. The widowed Matron—as, with half-understood emotion, her children read my writings to her—wept, not in sorrow, over the awakened remembrances of her youthful love, which, from the cells wherein they long had slept, my burning verse evoked. The stern Patriot, who had almost thrown aside the hope of rendering the land of his birth also the land of his pride, felt, from my strains, that despair was a crime. The Painter was not ashamed to own that from my revealings he took his most beautiful picturings of heroism, love, and sorrow. The Melodist, whom they besought to wed my verse to music, flung his lyre away, exclaiming that music was a useless appendage to my songs, which had in themselves more tuneful symphonies than his art could frame. The Lover, whom deep passion had rendered incapable of using the strength of his own oratory, used the persuasiveness of my songs to win from blushing beauty all that she had denied before. Envy was silent for once; for if she did not echo the praise which fell from the multitudinous lips of admiration, at least she did not deny that it was deserved. Thus, all places were full of—all persons familiar with my songs. Many a wounded heart blessed him whose verse had beguiled it into a momentary forgetfulness of sorrow. The aged and the young, the enthusiast and the cold, the proud and the lowly, united in lauding him who, they said, had laid open the heart of man, in its affections, passions, griefs, and joys; who had shown what undreamed-of treasures lay in its secret places; who, they declared, had drawn spells from truth, fancy, and wisdom, and, binding them in the silken coils of melodious verse, had won favours from the geni of the mind, which many, through the long eternity of bygone time, had eagerly sought—which few have found. Thus did I reap the richest honour that a poet can desire—the boon of fame.

Soon I found that fame, to be perfect, must be shared. Even amid the concourse and festivals of the magnates of the land, I sighed for some congenial spirit to cheer my solitude at home—to guide me to other and loftier achievements of renown—to send me to adventure on some hitherto unpatented ocean of thought; and this longing, alike nursed in crowds and loneliness, did not long remain unsatisfied.

One day I had wandered from the din of the crowded city, to win from the balmy quietude and gentle breath of the country some cooling for the fever of my cheek and brow; for the continued exercise of thought and the birth of poetry are painful and exacting. I rested on a shady bank, wearied by my lengthened walk—for the city had unnerved my endurance of fatigue, and my step was less springy in the noonday than it had wont to be in the morning of my youth. A clear rivulet ran, rippling, at my feet—its sound was music to my ear. Around me was the magnificence of nature. In the clear sky, far above, the chorists of the grove warbled their thrilling songs. The evening shades came on. The sun sank, like a conqueror, far away beyond the western horizon, and then gradually the minstrel-birds ceased their song. Musing on the fame which I had won, I was thinking how to exceed what I had already done, by throwing the concentrated power of my increased and still-increasing knowledge, and the whole sensibilities of my heart, into expression and language. But the chain of my reveries, and the sleep-like silence of that lovely evening, were a little broken by the silvery sweetness of a woman's voice. I started at the sound; for there is that in the melody of such accents which falls on the heart refreshingly as the shower on the sultry summer, or as a fall of water upon the ear of a solitary, or as the distant, dying echo of sweet-souled music heard afar off, amid the rocks and trees.

My heart beat with joy as I heard that sweet voice warble one of my songs—lending a rich and powerful expression to the passion of the verse. She who sang came towards where, unseen, I lay. Then, though she saw me not, the glory of that unrivalled beauty met my gaze. I heard her words as, with maiden and mutual confidence, she and her sister conversed. My name was on her lips, linked with the expressed desire to see and know him whose songs had filled her heart with emotion. They passed on. From that hour a new feeling filled my soul. I had beheld the all of loveliness it had ever fancied as what female beauty ought to be. In her I recognised the perfect admixture of every element of form, feature, or divine thought—for the mind may be read in the features—which I had sighed to find in woman, but I had vainly sighed for, until then. It was that visible and mental beauty which I had described in song.

I soon became known to her through a service happily rendered, which preserved her life, and, for a time, endangered mine. I discovered that our sires had been friends in youth, and thus, orphan as she was, she had an hereditary claim to my regard. But, ere she knew me as myself, she had learned to love me for myself. We read, and conversed, and walked together. Sweet was our interchange of thought. At last, when I told her that I was the poet whose passionate earnestness she loved so well, she cast her noble spirit, with a trusting tenderness, as an offering upon the altar of my heart.

She loved me with that fervent sensibility which Woman alone is capable of feeling, and which accompanies only her first love. She eagerly enjoyed the applauses which were showered upon me—for Love had now re-awakened all the Poet in my heart. They told her how safely she had ventured the treasure of affection within a barque where Hope was at the helm, bound for the haven of hearted happiness.

Yet she sometimes doubted—for, though Love be strong as death, it can be helpless as infancy. She doubted—not the worthiness of the beloved, but the certainty of reciprocity. Soon was this doubt dissolved. One summer's eve I sat by her side in the haunt where I first had seen her, and I poured out, with the full utterance of love, the passion which disturbed my soul. Her reply was given—not with spoken words, but in her low and happy sigh. In her tear-gemmed eyes, her blushing cheek, her throbbing bosom, I saw the assurance that I did not sue in vain.

Once, and once only, did a cloud seem to float across our confidings. She was singing to me, and into the air, which of itself was mournful, she had thrown such a flood of pathos that my soul was carried away to the thoughts of other years—for Music holds the silver key of Memory. The strain ceased, and as my wonted tribute of thanks did not at once reward it, she feared that she had failed to delight me. Tears filled her eyes, as she gently breathed this fear. At such a moment I could not utter cold words of explanation. Taking the instrument from her, and striking the chords in soft accompaniment, I threw into rapid and voluntary song the feelings which overpowered me. The words were these:—

"Still, still, beloved! pour along
Thy wildering passion-tide of song,
For, oh! the ear which once hath heard,
Must treasure up thine every word.

And if no instant burst of praise
Reward the pathos of thy lays,
How sweet—how exquisite must be
That voiceless eloquence to thee.

For Flattery's honeyed words will throng
To welcome every breath of Song;
The tuneful and the tuneless strain
Alike his heartless praise can gain

While Admiration—heart and ear—
Anxious, will hold her breath to hear,
Inhale each sweet sound, until,
Even when 'tis past, she hears thee still

Poor as was this tribute, she received it with joy, for it came from me, and she said that it had merit in her eyes—for that, unpolished by the rules of poetic art, it was the prompt and faithful expression of my thoughts. Thus brief was the only shadow which dimmed, but for a moment, the sunshine of our love.

Why do I dwell on the memories of these fleeting, happy hours? Even now, as they arise before me, like things of yesterday, my temples throb beneath the weight of strong emotion. I had thought my heart was tamed down to this narration. Let me hasten to conclude it.

We were betrothed. A day not distant—for my love did not brook delay—was named for our espousal, when an event took place which changed the colour of my fate.

Light in heart, I had sped to my paternal home—unvisited since my triumphs—to devote to my father and my kindred the few remaining days of my celibacy. The hours passed on—slowly, as I thought; but my father and my kindred lamented the rapidity with which they flew.

The land in which I lived was in a tyrant's thrall. Men knew not friend from foe. The spy was everywhere. Oppression ruled. The iron yoke of tyranny was exalted. All who know the history of man, must know that such things cannot endure. There inevitably comes a night to dim this noon of tyranny. There comes on an hour in which this star of bitterness must be quenched. It needs but the linked union of heart to heart to unpedestal the Dragon. It may be that a word—but one word—will prove the unpremeditated signal for revolt.

The dungeons were crowded with the high-hearted, eared or suspected by the tyrant. But he could not chain the free exercise of thought, nor curb the race of high-minded indignation. There only was needed some rallying point where to commence—some leader to array the disaffected. Both came. A satellite of that haughty Court dared to violate the sacredness of a poor man's hut, and drag thence a maiden—that poor man's sole wealth, his only child. Seeing, I resisted the outrage. My arm at once rescued the maiden, and levelled the lustful minion to the dust. An universal cry arose throughout the land, when the slaves of power were sent for my arrest. The torpor of thralldom was at an end. Men arose, as from a trance, to buckle on the brand. Me did they choose to lead them. With but one regret, I took the post of honourable danger; for though Love be happy, Liberty is holy—one, without the sun-tints of the other, would be a gloom indeed.

Beneath my banner, thronging thousands marshalled. Months passed on, in warfare with the foe. At last, strong in the justice of our cause, I met the tyrant—sword to sword. The hopes of a nation gave strength to my arm. The oppressor fell. His death was the death of his cause.

The Nation was herself once more. Equal rights, and awe, and liberties were proclaimed. Then the deliverer was hailed as Lord. I pushed aside the thorny coronet of power, to return to the peaceful life I had quitted.

When the excitement of success was over, I sank beneath a fever of mind and body. If aught could alleviate the pain of sickness, it was the affectionate devotion of my disenthralled countrymen; and, through their kindness, and the skill of the leech whom, at a great price, they had brought to me from afar, I gradually recovered health.

One night—I have dwelt too minutely, it may be, upon the previous narrative, but it was in avoidance of this part of my story, and now I must relate it, for though my heart swells with emotion, bleeding afresh as these memories of departed years rise up before it, yet it must nerve itself to the endurance of recording them; for there is an impulse which prompts me to tell my story, even to its bitterest conclusion.

More than once during the early period of our acquaintance—but after each to each had communicated the heart-secret which, when thus told, changed doubt into certainty—Clara and myself had indulged in speculations as to that Future which lies before mankind—a great, unpathed ocean. Vague, solemn, and mysterious were our fancies upon this subject. Religion pointed out that Eternity as a haven in which, after Life's troubles, we should repose in safety—but human doubts would arise as to the manner of this life-after-life into which we then should pass. For my own part, I loved to imagine a state in which the Mind should have eternal and ever-varying enjoyment—in which, purified from the soil of earth, Imagination should soar into higher and clearer heavens than it had dreamed of in its pilgrimage below—in which Faith, sublimed into a serene hope, should prepare us for joys in which mere sense would have slight participation—in which there would be, but with a subtler and keener faculty of feeling, companionship with those whom we had loved and lost on earth. For we both felt that Heaven itself would be of little worth without the hope of that companionship—the link between the bodily state here and the spiritual state beyond. And ever, as we thus thought and talked, came the trust that among the "many mansions" in the world to come, might be found some place in which the fond and faithful in this probationary life might be admitted to abide.

"I feel," said Clara, "when we had been thus earnestly and fondly indulging in such thoughts, that, in His goodness, the loved on earth will be allowed to meet in heaven, with a memory of what has passed below, a consciousness of as much of this life as has been pure and virtuous. So strong is my conviction of this (and, oh! is it not sweet to think that we shall meet again in eternity, when time has passed?) that, if the power be mine, when it please the Omnipotent to summon me from earth, I shall be with you in the spirit, and declare, if then I can, what state of being that eternity may be. Promise me," continued she, as she raised her lustrous eyes towards my face, "promise me that, if you should die first, you will speak to me from that far spirit-land!" and then, gently pressing my lips upon that snowy brow, I promised.

The time rapidly approached in which, at length, I was to call Clara mine own—wedded to me by the rites of the church, as she had already been united by the ties of strong affection. I sat, in the calm repose of the twilight hour, in the chamber which I had occupied when a boy—in which I had mused, and studied, and written—in which I had carried on the studies which had won me fame. In the crimson west, like a glory, the sun was going down, and the meadows, the corn-fields, and the wooded heights were ruddy in that purpling glow. Now and then, from the adjacent grove, was heard the even-song of some winged melodist. Far off, faintly came the tinkling of the bells, as the shepherd led his flock to the fold. And, farther yet, was the music of the peal from the village church in the valley, fitfully floating up through the silence, along the broad, smooth river, and across the dewy plain. My casement was open, to admit the gentle sounds, and the breeze came softly in. It seemed as if I breathed an atmosphere of soft repose.

Suddenly, in that fading twilight, it seemed as if the chamber were filled with a rosy flush, which showed every object clear and distinct, as if a hundred tapers had at once sent forth a simultaneous lustre. And in that flush of light there seemed a glorious Presence—the semblance, but purer, brighter, and more beautiful, of her to whom my love was vowed—on whom my thoughts had been dwelling but a moment before. I rose; but the Presence did not move. I advanced, and put forth my hand: it touched thin air! And then, sinking back into my chair, I knew that I gazed upon something which was not of this world. I spoke to it, and questioned whence and why it came. Then, in a voice low, but clear, came the response, which told me that my visitant was from another sphere. And while I listened, awe-struck, the same voice told me that beyond this life the loved of earth do meet, knowing each other there, and with eternal happiness meted unto each, according as in this life the soul had kept itself pure from the stains of earth.

Awe-smitten as I was—in capable of motion—feeling as in the sight of an immortal, I yet had the courage to ask, what was the sign that the thing was true. And then, as the Presence put forth its hand, and touched my brow, I felt a thrill throughout my frame, which, from that hour to this, has, more or less, continued—a burning throb, which ever seems to press upon the brain. At once there followed the flutter of wings, and a snow-white dove swiftly flew out of the open casement. I could trace its heavenward progress by a lengthened track of light, as it cleaved through the empyreal. When I looked once more within the chamber, all was dark. Sensation became suspended for a season, and I remained for some hours unconscious of the world around me.

When the morning came consciousness returned, and, fearing the worst, I flung myself upon a fleet courser, and hastened to where my love resided—far, far distant. Hour after hour the noble barb flew onward. At the decline of day the city was in view. The horse strained his utmost speed, at my urging, and sank down, as we reached her home, wearied with his exceeding toil. He never rose again. In after days I often fancied there flashed reproach in his eye, ere it was glazed by death.

I hastened within the hall. All was still and silent there. I passed on. Her chamber was open. There was a whisper of low, sad voices. I entered. The glare of many tapers dazzled me. I saw the funereal equipage. I felt that cold mortality lay there. I saw Clara, beautiful and passionless, her long hair bound with the death-fillet—flowers in her hands and scattered on her breast—her face pale as the white sculpture of a tomb! At the very hour in which I had been visited by that Presence, in which an immortal had touched my brow—in which the snow-white dove had soared upward, beyond my straining sight—she had died! Could I doubt that, true to the compact we had made, the liberated soul's first action, when it reached the Life beyond the grave, was to bring me the assurance which I needed?

I have slight memory of what followed. They told me that since I had left my Clara she had drooped like a flower. She had all the sweetness of the violet, and its fragility also. They said that, day after day, her form became more and more attenuated—her cheeks wasted and hectic-flushed. She knew that she was dying, but forbade them to acquaint me with her condition, lest my love, my fears, might cause me to relinquish the station, in that glorious strife for freedom, into which my country's voice had installed me. Oh, that I could have seen her die—have watched and solaced the fleeting spirit of the fairest and the best; but it was destined otherwise.

No further consciousness remains. A dim memory, oppressive madness, cling to me. Then came a release, and a return to the world, with a changed aspect and a saddened soul. The very name for which I had won high triumphs remains with me no more. I had hoped that she would have borne it—so how could I retain it when she was no more? My kinsmen—my friends—know not whether I yet breathe the difficult air of human existence. Many high minds have not disdained to yield their sympathy to the troubled wanderer—but my heart has thanked while it resisted their kindness. My hopes reposed on one fair flower—the storm crushed and strewed its beauty in the dust; it can return no more, but, at least, no meaner blossom shall bloom where that beloved one grew and withered.

EMBARRASSING SITUATION OF A WOLF-HUNTER.

ISHMAH's relationship to the Lupus family was often productive of much inconvenience to me, as he used to run off and engage in play with the young wolves, chasing and being chased by them in turn. At first I was amused at this indication of his wild origin, but became subsequently much annoyed, and on one occasion seriously alarmed, at the result of these gambols. One day, after a long march, I was looking out for a convenient camping-place, when a she-wolf crossed the ice at some distance from where I was standing. In spite of all my exertions and threats, Ishmah immediately gave chase, and they continued their gambols, until I attempted to approach them, when, of course, the wolf made off at full speed, followed by my dog with his trail behind him, loaded with everything I then possessed in the world. I followed shouting after him in vain, until he entirely disappeared from my view, after which I continued running on the tracks, till darkness obliged me to abandon the pursuit, and I found myself a long way from timber, out on the broad prairie, alone on a vast, barren waste of snow stretching around me on every side.

My sensations were anything but enviable, on reflecting that I was about one hundred miles from any known habitation, and nearly one hundred and fifty from my destination, destitute of robe and blankets, with but very little powder in my horn, and only two bullets in my pouch. In short, I was in a pretty considerable sort of a "fix," and had nothing for it but to make tracks again with all speed for the timber. Fortunately I found my way back to the river without much difficulty. It was a beautiful moonlight night, which enabled me to collect some fallen wood, and, having lighted a fire, I seated myself beside it, and began to consider the probabilities of my ever reaching a trading post alive, in the event of Ishmah not returning, and how I should economise my ammunition and increase my rate of travelling, so as to effect this object. My prospects were dismal enough, nor did I feel cheered as the cold north breeze froze the perspiration which had run down my forehead and face, and formed icicles on my beard and whiskers, that jingled like bells as I shook my head in dismissing from my mind one project after another.

At last, resigning myself to my fate, I took out my pipe, determined to console myself with a smoke, when, alas! on feeling for tobacco, I found that was gone, too. This was the climax of my misfortunes. I looked to the north star, and calculated, by the position of the Plough, that it must have been about ten o'clock—the time at which, in England, we have our knees under the mahogany, surrounded by friends, discussing a bottle of the best, and awaiting the summons to tea in the drawing-room. I tried to see a faint similarity to the steam of the tea-urn in the smoke from the snow-covered wood on my dreary fire, and endeavoured to trace the forms of sweet familiar faces in the embers, till I almost heard the rustling of fresh white crêpe dresses round me, when, hark! I did hear a rustle—it approaches nearer, nearer, and I recognise the scraping of Ishmah's trail on the snow; another moment, and the panting rascal was by my side. I never felt so relieved, and laughed aloud from sheer joy, as I noticed the consciousness he showed, by his various movements, of having behaved very badly. I was too well pleased, however, at his reappearance to beat him, particularly when I found nothing of his harness and load either missing or injured in the slightest degree. Even the portion of meat which I had secured from the last deer I shot was untouched: so that I had nothing to do but unpack the travails, make my bed, and cook my supper.—Falliser's Solitary Rambles in the Prairies.

[THE GROUP OF ZULU KAFFIRS NOW EXHIBITING.]

THE ZULU KAFFIRS.

THE British empire is the most extraordinary territorial accomplishment of which the world has had any experience; but in our opinion the variety and number of the races over which its gigantic authority extends is the greatest historical marvel. It actually embraces an aggregate population of two hundred millions.^{*} Take away India, and there is a population of fifty millions, which, as regards muscular development and mental power, is at least equal to one hundred millions of the kind of races of people that constitute the, in figures, formidable population of the Russian states.

But this two hundred millions presents features which comprise every attribute incident to the human family. Their diversification is absolutely astounding, and the imagination almost recoils in dismay from the examination.

First, we have the home population. What an agglomeration! In Britain—the most absolute realisation of the cosmopolitan idea—we have a population made up of descendants of the ancient Britons, the Saxons, the Danes, the Normans, the French, the Flemings, the Irish, the Scotch, the modern Welch, and immigrants from every land under the sun. Yet all these elements are fused, and constitute a mass of some twenty-two millions, which, for womanly beauty, manly vigour—ay, Herculean development and mental power—are immensely superior to every population extant, and far surpass any of which we have even semi-fabulous accounts. But if we look at Great Britain and Ireland as a federation, we find four distinct races, preserving some of their ancient characteristics with strange tenacity. In England there are the English—a compounded race—in Wales the Welch, in the Highlands of Scotland the northern Celts, and in the west of Ireland the southern Celts—the descendants of the Celts who colonised the Spanish peninsula. Midway between these agglomerations of blood and temperament there are the Manx, a vestige of the ancient world. What a magnificent variety this forms! Magnificent, because in variety of race there lie the foundations of all national strength and dignity. The harmonious blending is the triumphant realisation of the object which Providence had in view in bringing together such a congregation of the human family.

But if the diversity at home is wonderful, how much greater is it abroad, among those one hundred and seventy-two millions over whom the meteor flag of England flies in proud defiance of the envy and ambition of other nations. First, there are our kith and kin in Canada and the West Indies. Negroes in both, and in the former those aborigines—the red-skinned children of the west—whose discovery created a greater revolution in the moral and mental kingdoms of the world than any which has occurred since the mythological dispersion on the plains of Assyria. Then there are the Esquimaux in the north, and, piercing through that imaginary north-west passage which has ingulphed Franklin and his crew, we enter the Pacific Oceans—and other links in the chain of humanity are reached. Tribes of Malays, in Borneo and the adjacent islands—fierce savages, in whom war and plunder are inherent passions. Then there are Australia, New Zealand, Van Diemen's Land, teeming with wonders, but barren in primitive population. In the east we have Ceylon, with a people devoted to a faith as old as the Jewish; in China, some fragments of territory holding people following a variety of the same Buddhist faith; and in India, a hundred and fifty millions of human beings, the majority of whom reverence the incarnations of the Hindoo Vishnu, and point with startling earnestness to ages which dwarf all our preconceived notions of the history of man, and the revelations which the western world has borrowed from their eastern source.

Homeward, we have possessions in the Mediterranean. Spaniards, Greeks, and Maltese acknowledge the British authority; and then, spreading sails to the winds of the Atlantic Ocean, we reach the Cape of Good Hope—one of our latest acquisitions—and are introduced to a perfect medley of races—Britons, Dutchmen, Boers, Earthmen, Hottentots, and Kaffirs. All sprang from one Divinely-formed original: yet how different in shape and complexion! The Dutch still luxuriate in their rotundity of form; so do the Boers, their half-kindred; and the Hottentots preserve their uncouth and greasy appearance. But the Kaffirs are the aborigines of Southern Africa.

The generic name of "Kaffir," or "Caffre," as it is sometimes spelt, is usually applied indiscriminately to all the inhabitants of the south-eastern coast of Africa, from the Keiskamma River to Delagoa Bay. It is derived from an Arabic word, signifying liar or infidel, being synonymous with the Turkish Giaour. The trade between the eastern coast of Africa and India was once wholly in the hands of the Arabs and Moors, who, being Mahomedans, gave the general name of Kaffir to all the people with whom they traded, who were not of the same faith as themselves.

The physical characteristics of all the Kaffir tribe consist in an external form and figure wholly at variance with those of the other natives of Africa. The Kaffir is neither a Bushman nor a Hottentot. He is superior to both in personal appearance, bodily strength, and martial spirit. He has a peculiar countenance—the elevated forehead and prominent nose of the European, the high cheek-bones of the Hottentot, and the thick lips of the Negro. Some of the laws and usages which prevail among the Kaffirs, seem to be the relics of a higher state of civilisation than that in which they at present exist, and tend to support the idea of philosophic ethnologists, that the savage is a degenerated man, and not the type of humanity in its primeval state. Barrow supposes the Kaffirs to have originally wandered to Africa from Arabia, and to be descendants of the Bedouin tribes. Lichtenstein believes them to be of a more ancient origin. He asserts that "the practice of circumcision, some slight knowledge of astronomy among a few of the tribes, their superstitions, and the faint traces to be found in their words and names of being derived from Arabic roots, prove that the Kaffirs are descended from a regularly formed people. It is not improbable that they came from Arabia and Egypt, or that they are the Agasymbæ or Ptolemæus." It has also been conjectured that they are descendants of the Troglodytes, one of the most northern of the Ethiopic nations. The fatal objection to any of these theories is that they are woolly headed, and that some of the tribes assimilate too closely to the Negro.

Four principal nations—originally, it is believed, of one family—now compose the Kaffir race. The Amakosas, whose country adjoins Cape Colony, and with whom we have so long been at war; the Amatembu, beyond them; still further on, the Amaponda; and, most northern of all, the Amazulah, or Zulus. These last—the Zulus—are a warlike, nomadic people, who, it is thought, have conquered and extirpated the former inhabitants of the country which they now possess. They are a fine, handsome race, bold, fearless and commanding in appearance; superior in stature and beauty to the Amakosas, the Amatembus, and the Amapondas. In shape tall, robust, and athletic, good-humoured, frank and pleasing in manner; and with a dignity of carriage and an openness of eye, indicative to the beholder of dauntless courage and perfect independence. Their language is soft, full-toned, harmonious, and spoken with clattering. Their root-words are of one or two syllables, their sounds simple without diphthongs, the pronunciation distinct, except the speaker be excited, and an accent placed on the last syllable. The dialects of all the Kaffirs differ; but approximate sufficiently for a Zulu to understand an Amakosa, and vice versa.

A difference of complexion is perceptible among the Zulus; some being of a light copper-colour, others a chocolate, while those who inhabit the most northern part of the territory approach to a jet-black. The skin of the men who have arrived in this country, is a rich Vandyke brown; not very glossy, but more pleasant to the eye than that of the American Indians. The Zulus do not tattoo the face, as do some of the Kaffir tribes. They have a practice of rubbing the skin with red ochre, and then anointing it with oil. The polish communicated by this process is not so disagreeable as might be expected, however much it may be in opposition to cleanliness. Both men and women shave the head close: the females leaving a small tuft on the crown called an imbecti, and the males allowing just sufficient hair to remain for the attachment of a ring-shaped ornament, called an issigoko. Neither of these ornaments are worn until the individual has arrived at maturity, and attained sufficient development of mind duly to appreciate their value: consequently the heads of the youths remain in unshaven wooliness—and even when the dignity of manhood is achieved, it depends wholly on the will of the king whether or not the subject may decorate himself according to his desires. Sometimes a whole regiment is ordered to adopt the ring at once, and then the whim of the monarch changing, it has to be dispensed with without delay.

The mode of putting on the ring deserves a moment's notice. A piece of rush is cut and smoothed to the proper size and length, some sinew is then closely twisted round ft, and it is formed into a circle by uniting the ends. By means of shreds of sinew it is then sewn to the scalp, and blackened over with the black wax of a honeycomb, the hair being entirely removed from the area of the ring, as well as from every other part of the head. A bunch of feathers is sometimes attached to the ring, and at other times it serves as a sort of pocket or depository for various useful little articles. Like the Chinese, the Zulus take snuff with a spoon, and when the spoon is not in use, it is generally to be found thrust through the head-ring. The snuff-box they carry in the ear as an ear-ring.

The dress of a Zulu is classic in its simplicity—the two chief articles of male attire being the umtcha and the senanie. The umtcha is worn around the hips, and is formed of a number of strips of skin and fur fastened to a piece of hide; and the senanie is also formed of fur, but reaches from the waist to the knees. The women wear a skin petticoat, reaching from the waist to the knee, called an isecarber. The rest of the body, both in males and females, is left naked, except that they decorate themselves with a profusion of beads; that the men delight in having brass rings on their arms, and brass or copper collars around the neck. Boys under ten wear neither dress nor ornament, while the little girls seldom have any other clothing than a girdle made of the roots of trees or strips of skin, very like that worn by the young women of Nubia and Ethiopia.

The war-dress of a chief is more elegant and imposing than that of the civilians. It is composed of a cap or ring of otter's skin round the forehead, with the feather of a crane introduced in front. A tippet made of tigers' tails is worn over the shoulders. A large cow's tail is fastened round each arm and wrist, and another above each ankle. A kilt made of the skins of the civet-cat is appended to the waist, and descends to the knees. If the warrior be not a chief, the tippet is made of cows' tails. When the king goes to battle he wears the mantle of tigers' tails, each tail swinging majestically as he marches on, and causing him to present an aspect of ferocious royalty which might put to the blush any Turkish bashaw, no matter to what number of tails he had attained.

A Zulu is allowed any amount of wives, according to his means of purchasing them. The value of the lady depends chiefly on her age, her agility, and her agricultural capabilities—to plant and to gather in the corn being among the principal duties which await her in the married state. The price demanded for an accomplished young lady is usually very moderate. It averages about six cows, and she must be a Helen or a Venus whose worth is considered equivalent to that of twelve cows. The mode of bartering for her we shall presently take occasion to explain. When once purchased she cannot be re-sold, but may be dismissed if refractory. The females are shorter in stature than the men, and their features are less pleasing. The stoutest are considered the most handsome. Nearly all the operations relating to husbandry are performed by them, in addition to the domestic engagements. In fact, they are the only labourers—the males considering any occupation beneath that of fighting, hunting, or of buying cows, to be inconsistent with the dignity of their sex. Strict allegiance to her husband is one of the best moral traits in the character of a Zulu woman.

The marriage festival is a very noisy and animated affair. Preliminary matters having been gone through, the bridegroom, in company with his friends, seats himself, and waits the arrival of the bride, who comes escorted by the people of her tribe. She is tastefully attired: her hair being decorated with feathers, in imitation of a coronet, and her skin well oiled and polished for the occasion. Rows of beads in varied colours are suspended round her neck, and she brings many strings of beads with her. The overture is as often made by the women as the men. The bride's father usually sends a cow with her as a present. When she arrives in the presence of her future husband, she and her attendants perform a dance, accompanied with as large an amount of noise as they can conveniently get up for the occasion. It is the aim of the lady, on this occasion, to appear as agile as possible in the presence of the bridegroom's friends, and that which she may lack in grace she compensates for in expertness. The ballet being finished, and all present being satisfied with the lady's performance, her friends proceed to settle the important business of how much she is worth. They value her at six cows. Her lover offers three: the offer is rejected. Very much clattering and haranguing takes place, but at length the bargain is struck at the price originally demanded; and the bridegroom is made a happy man by the gain of a wife and the loss of his six cows. Then an ox is slaughtered, and a feast takes place; after which comes the Issigaziso, or washing with beads for joy. The newly-married couple, with their friends, being assembled, a calabash of water and a basket of beads are brought. The beads are put into the calabash, which is then presented to the bride, who pours a little of the water first upon the hands of her husband, and then upon those of her friends. She then consigns the calabash to her partner, who in his turn pours some of the water first upon her hands, and then on those of his friends, until it is exhausted, when he returns it to her. The bride then throws the beads at his feet, and any of the party but himself are at liberty to pick them up and appropriate them. In fact, a general scramble ensues; after which may come another dance, with other manifestations of general felicity, the bride always passing the marriage evening with her own friends, and the bridegroom with his. A representation of a Zulu marriage is given by the Zulus in the course of their performance.

The moral habits of a people who live in a country peopled by almost every variety of wild beast, must be very primitive. The rhinoceros, elephant, camel leopard, lion, tiger-cat, panther, hyæna, wild boar, wolf, jackal, porcupine, buffalo, zebra, springbok, antelope, kangaroo, hare, ant-eater, monkey, and civet-cat, are all to be met with in Zulu Land; while its rivers contain alligators and hippopotamuses, which in size dwarf those of the Nile. Surrounded by such associations, the Zulu Kaffir is necessarily a hunter. He is the Nimrod of Southern Africa. But war is the principal business of the Zulu Kaffir, and they pursue it with the ferocity and cunning of savages, as the British, to their cost, have learned in their sanguinary wars with the Amakosas. A people devoted to hunting and war, are naturally ignorant and superstitious. They have no laws beyond the will of the reigning monarch. Their ignorance painfully reminds us of one or two phases in the early history of our own boasted race.

The Zulus believe illness to be always the result of witchcraft. All benighted races entertain the same belief—which has almost warranted the assertion that knowledge begins and ends in superstition. When any of the Zulu tribe are taken ill, the services of the "Inyanger," or witch-finder, are called into requisition, to "nooker," or smell out, the "Umtgartie," or witch, who has caused the illness of the invalid. They abhor the tiger-cat, or "Imparker," as they call it, and believe it to be as necessary a companion to the witch of Zulu, as a black cat is thought by some people to be indispensable to the witches of more civilised nations. The witch-finder, or "Inyanger," makes his appearance, attired very demoniacally in shaggy strips of fur; all the people seat themselves before him. He dances in their presence, flinging himself about in the wildest manner imaginable; then smells the ground, and eventually pouncing upon one of the party present, declares him to be the person who has bewitched the sick man. The "Inyanger's" assertion is unhesitatingly believed, and the denounced individual is at once hustled away by his neighbours, and beaten to death with their knob-kerrees. It is almost needless to add that these "Inyangers" are the vilest impostors.

The religious impressions, as might be expected, are very indistinct.

No religious ideas seem to influence them in their conduct, yet the idea of a Supreme Being seems to be extant among them. Captain Gardiner made inquiries among them on this point, and from one of the more intelligent he got the reply: "We always believed that there was an 'Inkosa-pezu' (a great chief) above, who, before there was a world, came down and made it; he made men, too." But the majority among them do not seem to be thus far advanced in knowledge. They think the body to be annihilated at death, but that the spirit of a bad man may pass into and animate a snake or a buffalo; they believe that mankind sprang from rushes; they sacrifice to their departed friends; they have faith in omens, and everything which is beyond their comprehension, or not of ordinary occurrence, they unhesitatingly affirm to be the result of witchcraft and sorcery.

A people possessing such characteristics cannot fail to be regarded with intense interest. They form another link in the chain of human nature; and now that the study of man himself and all his attributes, his history and probable destiny, is one of the most popular as well as the gravest pursued in the present day, every illustration of the actual condition of the various members of the human family dispersed over the earth, must be received with fixed, if not melancholy attention.

Our illustration represents several members of the Zulu Kaffir tribe, who are now being exhibited at St. George's Gallery, Hyde Park corner. They were brought to this country by Mr. A. T. Caldecott, a merchant of Natal, whose long residence in that colony had placed in his way peculiar facilities for carrying out such an undertaking.

For many years past it had been Mr. Caldecott's wish that the English public should be gratified with a sight of the interesting savages by whom he was surrounded, in the fertile and flourishing colony of Natal. On various occasions he endeavoured to form a party to accompany him across the ocean to Great Britain; but their own reluctance, their fear of the voyage, the difficulties to be overcome before the colonial government would permit them to embark, and other causes, rendered for awhile all his efforts nugatory. By dint of continual perseverance—by telling the poor fellows the grand sights which awaited them—by engaging one this month and another the next—and by promising to each a good and just reward for their services—he was at length fortunate enough to secure eleven men, a young woman and a child. But the consent of the people themselves was not all that had to be obtained. It was necessary that the British government should sanction their removal. Mr. Caldecott memorialised the authorities accordingly. Fortunately the circumstances of having been thirty-three years in Africa, and of his being known as a merchant of respectability and a highly honourable man, influenced the government in his favour; and after some negotiations, and his giving a bond—himself in £500 and two in £250 each—that the natives should be well treated, he was allowed to embark with them, on condition that he conveyed them back to the colony in eighteen months after their arrival in England.

It may be interesting to give the names of the thirteen people, and the signification of each name, so far as it admits of interpretation. We accordingly subjoin them:

Nkulunkulu (the Greatest of the Great) is the husband of Sonile (we have sinned), who has a child called by the same name. Sonile is sixteen years of age, and her female child is fourteen months old. Her name is a common one amongst her tribe, and probably originates in some misdeed committed by her progenitors.

Noswenzo, a cousin of Faku, the chief of the Amapondas, a tall, powerful man, standing six feet without his shoes, twenty-nine years of age, very taciturn in disposition, and who, though he has seen much in his time, is so mysterious in manner as never to refer to any incident of his younger days.

Zibayoyo, an interesting and very intelligent fellow.

Mankanana (the Athlete), so named from his agility and athletic skill.

Umlawu (the Hottentot), a name given him, probably, because of Hottentots having been in the land at the time of his birth. He has been a soldier, and now plays the part of the wizard doctor.

Manyosi (Honey), a name which may have reference to extraordinary sweetness of disposition, or to eloquence of tongue. He is the son of a Zulu chief, has been a soldier, and bears the marks of many a battle-wound.

Umlunga (White Man), probably deriving his name from having been born while some white man was in the country.

Madadasa (the Duck), so named from having been fond of waddling among the ducks in a pond near his father's dwelling.

Umpependuka (Beware of the knob-kerree), named from his proficiency in using that implement of war.

Umbomvana (the Red One), deriving his name from his colour.

Mahlaline (the Great Forest), so called from having been born on the borders of a forest of considerable extent.

These thirteen aborigines wear the dress of their country, and have brought with them to England their habiliments and implements of war, their domestic utensils, and everything which, in the course of their representations, may tend to realise to the spectator actual Zulu life. They are not repulsive-looking savages, like the Bushmen, nor are they so wild and uncontrollable as to be exhibited with danger. In reality they are very pleasant people, delighted with the new world which has opened upon them in this country, and anxious to appear as amiable as they can be before those who may honour them with a visit.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

MULTIPOTENT PROPELLER.—This is a name given by Captain Goble to a novel method of propelling vehicles. It consists of a series of endless drags running along under the bottom of the vessel, commencing either at the bow, midship, or mizen section, in accordance to what is the object desired to accomplish. As far as the resistance to the water or earth can be applied, no engine of one thousand-horse power could ever cause it to perform a single revolution, without either moving the vehicle attached to it, or destroying the machinery. As this plan can be so arranged as to lift the bows when in action, it is just the desideratum required to work Mr. Brown's patent flying vessel. For steam-tugs it would be admirably adapted, particularly in shallow or rapid streams, as the Indian rivers possess.

SINGULAR CASE OF SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.—In making the excavation for the lock on the Hove Ship Canal, near Brighton, a quantity of shale, of a blackish colour, which was thrown out, spontaneously ignited. The stratum of shale is about eight feet in thickness; the quantity thrown out is therefore large; and the whole of it, extending over a space of some score of square yards, gives signs of approaching combustion, while in many parts it is already burning like a lime-kiln—so that it has been removed from around the piling, for fear of its being destroyed. The process of combustion gives out a stifling and offensive vapour, and leaves upon the surface a deposit of a white colour, and also of a yellow substance: the former resembling saltpetre in appearance and taste, and the latter sulphur. A small quantity of shale, evidently forming a part of the same stratum, has been thrown up from under the clay in a brick-ground near the Chalybeate, at Brighton, about three miles distant from the lock—and this has also ignited.

SILK is, from its nature, more susceptible of absorbing moisture than any other fibrous article. In fact, it approaches, in this respect, to the quality of sponge: well-dried silk, when placed in a damp situation, will very rapidly absorb five or six per cent. of moisture; and, being very dear, and always sold by weight, this property gives large opportunity for fraud; yet it is not the only channel for mal-practices. Silk, as spun by the silk-worm, contains amongst its fibres, in very minute portions, a quantity of resin, sugar, salt, &c., to the extent, generally, of twenty-four per cent. of the entire weight.

RHUBARB WINE.—However good the wine made from rhubarb may be, I take the liberty of advising your readers not to drink it. It is well known that the acidity of rhubarb stalks is owing to the presence of an acid salt—the binxalate of potash—a combination of the poison oxalic acid and the alkali potash. This salt does not exist in sufficient quantity in the rhubarb stalks to produce its poisonous effects, and the same may be said of the wine. But there is another danger attending its use in the form of wine, which ought not to be overlooked. All hard water contains lime, and when mixed with the juice of the rhubarb stalks, the binxalate of potash is decomposed, and an oxalate of lime is formed. Now, this oxalate of lime is the constituent principle of the mulberry calculus, and there is a peculiar condition of the human body known to medical men as the Oxalic Diathesis, which depends upon the presence of this oxalate of lime in the blood (I use the word blood for obvious reasons). This Oxalic Diathesis has been proved by Dr. Golding Bird to be much more common than it was supposed before this gentleman brought the microscope to assist him in his pathological researches. Such being the case, it is obvious that any article or common use which contains this oxalate of lime, or even the oxalic acid or its salts, must be more or less injurious to health, more particularly to those in whom there exists a predisposition to assume the Oxalic Diathesis. It must be borne in mind that oxalic acid is formed in the human body by the decomposition of sugar, urea, &c., and the Diathesis is not uncommon from this cause. If it is thus easily produced indirectly, à fortiori, it is still more likely to arise from the direct means of rhubarb wine. Therefore, I say to your readers, eschew the doubtless very agreeable beverage which has entered, through the medium of your columns, into competition with genuine "Sillery mousseaux."—C. R. Bree, Stowmarket.

RELATIVE PURITY OF DIFFERENT DESCRIPTIONS OF ARTIFICIAL LIGHT.—Professor Frankland, of Manchester, has given the following statement as the accurate results of his important investigations as to the comparative purity of different descriptions of artificial light, as taken from a lecture recently delivered by him in the Royal Institution of Great Britain.

Quantity of carbonic acid and heat generated per hour, by various sources of light equal to twenty sperm candles.

	Carbonic acid.	Heat.
Tallow	cubic feet 10.1	100
Wax.....	8.3	82
Sperm oil	6.4	63
Sperm oil (Carcel's lamp)	5.0	47
London gases (coal)	4.0	32
Manchester gas	3.0	32
London gas (Canuel)	2.6	19
Boghead hydro-carbon gas	2.5	19
Lesmahago hydro-carbon gas

Professor Frankland adds: "The two objections most frequently advanced against the use of gas in dwelling-houses are the deterioration of the air by the production of carbonic acid, and the evolution of so much heat as to render the atmosphere oppressively hot. It will be seen from the comparison exhibited that in these respects even the worst descriptions of coal-gas are, for an equal amount of light, superior to all other illuminating materials; whilst with the better descriptions of gas, three or four times the amount of light may be employed with no greater atmospheric deterioration."

DANGER ATTENDING PRECOCIOUS DEVELOPMENT.—There can be no doubt that many a child has been sacrificed in early youth to the pride of parents, who, delighted with the intellectual activity of their children, have striven to make them prodigies of learning. By these cases of early and undue employment of the brain, inflammation of the hemispherical ganglion, or the living membrane of the ventricles, with serous effusion, has usually been the cause of either a fatal issue, or of subsequent mental imbecility. An extremely intelligent boy, of about twelve years of age, was once brought to the late Dr. Delville, an English phrenologist, for examination, by a parent who was very proud of the intellectual endowments of his child. Mr. Delville gave his opinion of the boy's character, at the same time cautioning the father of the dangerous course he was pursuing. But the father's reply was: "All that other boys considered labour and hard study were merely child's play to him; and that his studies could not be hurtful to him—he employed them so much." Again Mr. Delville endeavoured to save the child, but the father would not attend to the warning. Two years from that time he again called on Mr. Delville, and, in reply to his inquiries about the child, burst into tears, and stated that the boy was an idiot.

SALT AND SEA-WATER.—At the recent general meeting of the Society of Arts, the society's medal was awarded to W. Bollaert, F.R.G.S., for his essay on common salt and other saline bodies, including researches as to their primary origin and subsequent formations. We are informed that the author of the essay attributes the origin of the greater portion of common salt to volcanic sources, rather than having been deposited by the ocean; for even at the present time the sea does not contain more than three and-a-half per cent. (the Red Sea is said to contain four per cent.) of saline and other bodies, which it is reasonably conjectured have been washed into it from the land, and composed of salt (chloride of sodium), chlorides of magnesium and potassium, bromides and sodides, sulphates of magnesia and lime, carbonate of lime. Chlorine is said to have been detected in sea-water; and, according to some French savants, copper, lead, and silver.

CONSUMPTION OF TEA AND COFFEE IN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.—The consumption of tea in the United States is said to have been, in 1852, 25,587,083 lbs. In England it was 54,724,615 lbs.: so that we consume nearly double as much tea, in proportion to our numbers, as the people of the United States. In 1852, however, they consumed 180,531,489 lbs. of coffee, while we only consumed 35,044,376 lbs.: so that, having regard to the population, they consume six times more coffee than we consume. In ten years, the consumption of tea in the States has increased from 12,788,969 lbs. in 1843, to 25,587,668 lbs. in 1852—or it has doubled; while in England the consumption has increased nearly one-third, or from 40,293,303 lbs. in 1843, to 54,724,615 lbs. in 1852. In the States, the consumption of coffee has increased from 85,816,666 lbs. in 1843, to 180,531,489 lbs. in 1852—or it has more than doubled. In England, the consumption of coffee has increased from 29,979,404 lbs. in 1843, to 35,044,376 lbs. in 1852—or one-sixth. The population of the empire has on the whole increased very little in the last ten years. The population of the States has increased from 18,155,561 to 24,500,000—or one-third. The consumption of both coffee and tea in the States has increased much faster than the people—from which we see that they, like the English, are advancing in wealth, comforts, and luxuries, as they increase in numbers.

FACETIÆ.

SUM FOR THE BOYS.—If a newspaper editor "stops the press to announce," what would he do if it was a pound?

A NEW READING.—An aphorism floating through the newspapers, says that "an egg to-day is better than a hen to-morrow." This is a new way of expressing the sentiment, "A bird in hand is better than one in ambush."

A correspondent recommends as a motto for a railroad car, Dante's famous line—"All hope abandon, ye who enter here!"

A tradesman advertises "Ham and Cigars, smoked and unsmoked, for sale."

FUN AND FACT.—"Those sewing machines are great inventions," said a friend to a wag. "Yes, sir," said he, readily, "gown it seams."

A country fellow came to the city to see his intended wife, and for a long time could think of nothing to say. At last a great snow falling, he took occasion to tell her that his father's sheep would be undone. "Well," said she, kindly taking him by the hand, "I'll keep one of them."

A PROGRESSIVE.—Scene, a dinner-table.—Lady of the House to Waiter: "James go to the kitchen and get some more fried sole." James goes out, and presently returns and whispers: "Missus, I couldn't get no more sole—there ain't only just enough left for the kitchen."

YOUNG LADIES who faint on being "proposed to," can be restored to consciousness by whispering in their ears that you were only joking.

SAM SLICK says, "I see the sunny side of life always, unless weather is too hot, and then I go to the shade."

"HAVE you much fish in your bag?" asked a person of a fisherman. "Yes, there's a good eel in it," was the rather slippery reply.

"JURY," said a western judge, "you kin go out and find a verdict. If you can't find one of your own, git the one the last jury used." They returned a verdict of suicide in the ninth degree.

JUDICIAL WIT.—"Take off your hat, man!" cried Lord Abinger to an Amazon in a riding-dress, who appeared as a witness in the nisi prius court of a certain county-town. "I'm not a man," replied the indignant lady. "Then," said his lordship, "I'm no judge."

MORE PROOF OF ASTROLOGY.—A Boston astrologer predicted that an extraordinary literary work would be produced in New England about this time. The prediction has been fulfilled to the letter, for a Boston publishing house has "got up" a Quaker hymn-book, having heard that no such work was in existence. It seemed to be a pretty good opening, but one unlucky circumstance attending the speculation is, that the Quakers never sing!

SOME time ago there was a trial under way for trespass in cutting wood from a neighbour's premises without authority. One of the plaintiff's witnesses was a plain old farmer, whose testimony went clearly and directly to prove the charge. The defendant's counsel, a blustering man of brass, after the most approved fashion of country pettifoggers, thought to weaken the force of his evidence by proving idiocy to be a trait of his family. He therefore interrogated him thus: "Mr. —, you have a son who is an idiot, have you not?" "Yes, sir." "Does he know anything?" "Very little." "How much does he know?" "Well, almost nothing; not much more than you do." The witness was allowed to retire without further question, amidst the most uproarious "skreems of laughter."

COCKNEYISMS.—Witness: "This here feller broke our winder with a tater, and hit Isabella on the elber, as she was playing on the pianer."—Magistrate: "The conduct of the prisona' and his general characta' rends' it propa' that he should no longer be a memba' of society."

A YOUNG HOPEFUL.—"Have you ground all the tools right, as I told you this morning when I went away?" said a carpenter to a rather green lad whom he had taken for an apprentice. "All but the hand-saw, sir," replied the lad, promptly; "I couldn't get quite all the gaps out of that."

TO KEEP WELL.—Take a sherry cobbler early in the morning, and throw it out of the window, after which dress yourself, walk out into the country and wade through clover, till you get an appetite that can saw through penny nails.

WERE a man not to marry a second time, it might be concluded that his first wife had given him a disgust to marriage; but, by taking a second wife, he pays the highest compliment to the first, by showing that she made him so happy, as a married man, that he wishes to be so a second time.

TRICKSTERS CAUGHT.—Lately, two tradesmen at Forfar forwarded upwards of 10 cwt. of beef and pork per rail for the London market, but managed to elude the vigilance of the officials, and got the meat deposited on the waggon without being weighed, giving in a schedule for the same, with 5 cwt. marked thereon. The waggon took fire between Forfar and Perth, and the meat was damaged so as to be unfit for the market. On the railway clerk going to the individuals and offering compensation, the damage was stated to be about £30; but the clerk could not see how 5 cwt. could come to be so much. "Oh, but there was 10 cwt." "There is only five entered on my books." "Oh, but you ken brawly we never gie you in a' the weight." "Then you should do so; you will get payment for no more than was entered." Honesty is the best policy.

A modest contemporary calls veal "unfinished beef." This is pretty good; but why not extend the vocabulary? Suppose we term lamb "incipient mutton," and denominate pig "premonitory pork?"

A man's spirits depend a good deal on the way he moves. Rush along at the rate of a mile a minute, and your sensations will become as buoyant as the stock market. Substitute for this the inanimate crawl of a canal boat, and in less than an hour your soul will feel as if it were labouring under two fifty-sixes and a supper of pig's feet. If you don't wish to become melancholy, and dwell on the advantages connected with charcoal fumes, never travel behind a horse that takes over three minutes to do a mile.

"GHOSTS be hanged!" said Tom Hood. "No such things in nature. All laid long ago, before the wood pavement. What should they come for? The colliers may rise for higher wages, and the Chartists may rise for reform, and Joseph Sturge may rise for his health, and bread may rise, and the rising generation may rise; but that the dead should rise only to make one's hair rise, is more than I can believe. Suppose yourself a ghost. Well, if you come out of your grave to a friend, how are you to help him? And if it's an enemy, what's the use of appearing to him if you can't pitch into him?"

A young fellow in Paddington recently went to "pop the question" to a young lady with whom he was very slightly acquainted. On his return, he was asked by a friend how he had succeeded. "Oh, I met with a very warm reception," said he. "Indeed!" "Yes, indeed! for as soon as I knocked at the door I had a panful of hot soap-suds thrown on to me from the kitchen window. It was so very warm, that I took the hint and retreated."

STATISTICS OF DANCING.—An ingenious French arithmetician has calculated that the space which a young Parisian belle, who is fond of the salutary exercise of dancing, traverses in the gay salons of Paris, amounts, in the course of one dancing season, to four hundred and thirty-four miles and a half. He has also estimated that a French lady, fond of performing the functions of tee-totum, will spin round in a waltz in one night as many times as the wheels of a steam-boat revolve while running the distance between Dover and Calais!

WORK AND PLAY.—"I ask again what is happiness? It ain't bein' idle, that's a fact—no idle man or woman was ever happy since the world began. Employment gives both appetite and digestion. Duty makes pleasure doubly sweet by contrast. When the harness is off, if the work ain't too hard, a critter likes to kick up his heels. When pleasure is the business of life it ceases to be pleasure; and when it's all labour and no play, work, like an unstuffed saddle, cuts into the very bone. Neither labour nor idleness has a road that leads to happiness: one has no room for the heart, and the other corrupts it. Hard work is the best of the two, for that has at all events sound sleep—the other has restless pillows and onefreshin' slumbers: one is a misfortune, the other is a curse; and money ain't happiness—that's as clear as mud."—Sam Slick.

TOM MOORE tells the conclusion of a letter from a Dutch commercial house, as follows:—"Sugars are falling more and more every day; not so the respect and esteem with which we are, &c. &c."

AN ARABIAN having brought a blush on a maiden's cheek by the earnestness of his gaze, said to her, "My looks have planted roses in your cheeks; why forbid me to gather them? the law permits him who sows to reap the harvest."

WEST END TRICK.—A mischievous urchin being in a pork-shop at the West End, where sausages were made and sold, took occasion, when the butcher's back was turned, to fasten the following notice to the wall:—"No whistling allowed in this shop while the sausages are lying on the counter." The owner did not see the placard till most of his customers had read it.

WATER AND MORALS.—A very slight declivity suffices to give the running motive to water. Three inches per mile, in a smooth, straight channel, gives a velocity of about three miles per hour. Now, what is true of water is equally true of morals. The best of men only need slight push from adversity to obtain a downhill momentum. Be careful, therefore, how you lose your equilibrium.

MRS. PARTINGTON wants to know why they don't bring the whole of China over at once, instead of bringing it in junks.

PROFESSIONAL POMPOSITY is well taken off in the following anecdote. Shields Doctor: (looking learned and speaking slowly): "Well, mariner, which tooth do you want extracted? Is it a molar or incisor?" Jack (short and sharp): "It is in the upper tier, on the larboard side. Bear a hand, you swab, for it is nipping my jaw like a lobster!"

GRAVITY.—"Which, my dear lady, do you think the merriest place in the world?" "That immediately above the atmosphere that surrounds the earth, I should think." "And why so?" "Because I am told that there all bodies lose their gravity."

NEW TRICK.—The Paris correspondent of the Times divulges one of the tricks which gentlemen who live by their wits play upon the shopmen: A well-dressed man (things have come to such a pass, that it is always safe to be suspicious of well-dressed men), purchases some insignificant article, and stands waiting. In a few minutes, with an air of vexation, he asks if they are not going to give him his change. "You have not paid, I think, sir." "Why, yes I did; I gave you a five-franc piece, with a scratch on one side of it." The till is searched, and the coin is of course found. Upon such overwhelming evidence, the change is given. The scratched coin was taken a few moments before from one of the gang, who had made some trivial acquisition on purpose to get it into the drawer. An adroit thief has been known to make the sum of fifty francs a day in this way, by the perpetration of the rendez-moi.

A LINE SUGGESTED BY THE NEW BONNET SEASON.—The Best Hydraulic Press.—Your wife's tears.—Dionenes.

WE trust that the lowering of the duty on tea, will lead to the reduction of other articles, even though it be slow.—Ibid.

GIVE HIM HIS DUE!—Much has lately been said about the Emperor of the French's intention to revive the guillotine; but we cannot help expressing our opinion that Napoleon's purpose had been misinterpreted, and that after all he is only thinking of having "an occasional chop."—Ibid.

THE BATTLE-EYE AT THE VILLAGE OF CHERTSEY.—The delightful village of Chertsey, so pleasantly situated on the banks of the South-Eastern Railway, was, on the battle-eye, a scene of heart-rending excitement. A report having spread that the enemy intended to lodge in the neighbourhood, caused the price of beds to rise considerably. Perhaps this was in some measure owing to an order from the Commander-in-Chief to give no quarters to the enemy. We heard that sixteen shillings was offered, and refused by a Mrs. Fleasay, for her turn-up sofa. A scarcity of provisions having been felt, the usual sixpenny plate of boiled beef instantly rose to eightpence. Pickles were also highly affected. These war prices gave general dissatisfaction. Several highly respectable landlords were grossly insulted, and it was at one time feared that violent hands would be laid upon a silvery round of beef, the property of — Wigman, Esq. Nothing but the sudden appearance of Policeman K, with a strong staff, led at one end, could have quelled the hungry rioters.—Ibid.

PROBLEM IN TABLE-MOVING.—Is it possible to make an unsteady table turn over a new leaf?—Punch.

THE MEMBER FOR COUNTRY BUCKS.—In reference to the Succession Duty, it is a question whether the Ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer does not run with the heir, and hold with the hounds.—Ibid.

THE CANTEN AT CHOBHAM.—When the camp has been washed—just washed by a shower—then will be the time to brew the beverage which may be called Chobham negus—a potation composed of Tent-and-water.—Ibid.

AH! COME, RAPIDA!—We really cannot profess to understand the mystery of spirit-rapping; but we have seen several authenticated cases, in which a devotion to spirits has caused many to be without a "rap."—Ibid.

A LOCOMOTIVE CITY.—In these days of table moving, there is no sort of movement that can astonish us much; but we are surprised a little by the change of place asserted in the following item of American news: "The City of Manchester had arrived at Philadelphia!"—Ibid.

INTELLECTUAL ENTERTAINMENT AT THE MANSION HOUSE.—The Lord Mayor is, as we anticipated, going to feast the preceptors; bravo, Lord Mayor! Witness this card: "The Lord Mayor will be gratified by your attendance at the Mansion-House on the 30th instant, at six o'clock, p. m. to meet the masters and mistresses of the British and Foreign, National, Parochial, and other schools of the metropolis." (On this festive occasion, an entirely new variety of dishes will be added to those good things which constitute the usual bill of fare at City banquets. His lordship states that he is adopting various measures for the promotion of a knowledge of science and art among all classes, and that "With this view he has, with the valuable assistance of the Society of Arts, collected at the Mansion House a large assortment of educational models, diagrams, books, apparatus, &c., showing the latest improvements that have been made in these important departments." A new feature will accordingly have to be introduced into the report of this improved entertainment at the Mansion-House. It will behove the chronicler of that event to record, that not only covers but books were laid for so many, and that besides the regular number of tureens of real turtle, &c., there was such or such a lot of cases of geological specimens, of globes, charts, maps, quadrants, electric machines, galvanic batteries, air-pumps, mathematical instruments, plants, and objects of natural history. We heartily congratulate our worthy Civic monarch on his introduction of food for the mind into his dinners, thus combining the rational feast, and the psychical libation, with eating and drinking in ordinary. We trust that he has laid the foundation of a new style of gluttony and guzzling at the Mansion House; that he will have created a greediness for information which will expand the intellect instead of the stomach, and a thirst for knowledge which will get into the head—and remain there.—Ibid.

RUSSIA AND THE FEMALE WIG PARTY.—The submarine telegraph brought the other day the following extraordinary intelligence: "RUSSIA.—A new ukase which has been published in the kingdom of Poland, prohibits the wearing of false hair by the women of the Jewish nation. Several infringements of this new law have already been punished." To prohibit the ladies in Poland, or anywhere else, from wearing false hair, is indeed to strike a blow at the Polish interest which nothing can compensate. We tremble to think of the number of bald facts which will be brought to light among the female population, when they are no longer permitted to assume that false front which has been hitherto opposed to Time's unwelcome ravages. We presume the Emperor of Russia begins to be fearful of conspiracy among the Jewesses of Poland, and is determined to know what they have really got in their heads; though many of them will, we are quite sure, prefer to dye rather than disclose in black and white—but particularly the latter—their real condition. Every effort will no doubt be made to resist this cruel ukase, but we know not how to recommend the Jewesses to meet the attack upon their hair, unless, by rubbing in a tremendous supply of bears' grease, they can strike at the root of it. Possibly the ukase may have for its object the encouragement of the consumption of the native article of commerce, by inducing the Jewish females to plunge into unlimited bears' grease, with the vain hope that it will tend to restore that luxuriant crop for which the wig-maker has hitherto provided a substitute. If the women of England were to be subject to such an oppressive ukase as that issued by the Russian government, we are convinced that for the loss of their ornamental head-dress redress would be generally demanded. Happily our own government is far too gallant to wish to hurt the hair of a British female, even though the hair is hers by right of purchase only.—Ibid.

DODGING THE RESPONSIBILITY.

"Sir?" said Fieryfacias, the lawyer, to an unwilling witness, "do you say upon your oath that Blimpkins is a dishonest man?"

"I didn't say he was accused of being an honest man, did I?" said Pipkins.

"Does the court understand you to say, Mr. P., that the plaintiff's reputation is bad?" inquired the judge, merely putting the question to keep his eyes open.

"I didn't say it was good, I reckon."

"Sir!" said Fieryfacias, "sir, upon your oath, you say Blimpkins is a rogue?"

"You say so," was Pipkins's reply.

"Haven't you said so?"

"Why, you have said it," said Pipkins; "what's the use of my repeating it?"

"Sir!" thundered Fieryfacias, the Demosthenean thunder of Thumtowntown, "sir, I charge you, upon your sworn oath, do you or do you not say that Blimpkins stole things?"

"No, sir," was the cautious reply of Pipkins; "I never said Blimpkins stole things; but I do say—he's got a devil of a way of finding things that nobody lost?"

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

MUCH labour is unseen, so that tasks usually seem easier than they are.

THE only aim worth possessing is the good opinion of the good.

ALL the integral parts of nature have a beautiful analogy to one another, and to their mighty original, whose images are more or less expressive, according to their several gradations in the scale of beings.

It would be well, indeed, if selfishness came into play on those occasions only where self is really concerned.

To enjoy to-day, stop worrying about to-morrow. Next week will be just as capable of taking care of itself as this one is.

NEVER apply yourselves to read any human author with a determination beforehand either for or against him, or with a settled resolution to believe or disbelieve, to confirm or to oppose whatsoever he saith; but always read with a design to lay your mind open to truth, and to embrace it wheresoever you find it, as well as to reject every falsehood, though it appear under ever so fair a disguise.

Seize upon truth where'er 'tis found,

Amongst your friends, amongst your foes,

On Christian or on Heathen ground;

The flower's divine where'er it grows,

Neglect the prickles, and assume the rose.

TRULY has it been said, that if we wasted our money as we do our time, we should be bankrupts all. Nevertheless, we find that, as we advance in years, our eyes open to the worth of those hours we have been so long in the habit of wasting.

THEMISTOCLES being asked how he would marry his daughter—whether to one that was poor but honest, or to one that was rich, but of an ill reputation—made answer: "I would rather have a man without an estate, than have an estate without a man."

OUR pleasures resemble those fabulous trees described by St. Odeic—the fruits which they bring forth are no sooner ripened into maturity, than they are transformed into birds, and fly away.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.—That great captain, the Duke of Marlborough, when he was in the last stage, and very infirm, would walk from the public rooms in Bath to his lodgings, on a cold, dark night, to save sixpence. He left at his death more than a million and a half sterling. Sir J. Lowther, after changing a piece of silver in St. George's Coffee House, and paying twopence for his dish of coffee, was helped into his chariot (for he was then very infirm), and went home. Some little time after, he returned to the same coffee-house on purpose to acquaint the mistress that she had given him a bad halfpenny, and demanded another in exchange for it. Sir James had about £40,000 per annum, and was at a loss whom to appoint his heir.

THE words of the widow of Helvetius to Napoleon are worth remembering. "You cannot conceive how much happiness can be found on three acres of land."

HE who administers medicine to the sad heart in the shape of wit and humour, is most assuredly a good Samaritan. A cheerful face is nearly as good for an invalid as healthy weather. To make a sick man think he is dying, all that is necessary is to look half dead yourself. Open, unrestrained merriment is a safety-valve to the heart and disposition. If overburdened with the noxious gases of care, pull the string of wit, up flies the valve of fun, and out go the troubles and vexations of life to the four winds of heaven.

THE INVENTOR OF INK.—The Chinese think that the inventor of ink was one of the greatest men that ever lived; that he enjoys a blessed immortality, and is charged with keeping an account of the manner in which all ink is used here below, and for every abuse of it he records a black mark against the offender.

"RAPPINGS" AT LISKEARD.—Considerable excitement prevailed here a few weeks ago, in consequence of a strange knocking or rapping, heard in a certain part of the graveyard belonging to the church, which seemed to proceed from the ground where bodies had been lately deposited. Great numbers assembled, and so evident did it appear that the sound proceeded from below, that preparations were made to dig into the grave of a person recently interred; when an individual with a better exercise of his perceptive faculties, discovered that when the wind blew, the sound was heard, and when the wind ceased to blow all was silent. This led him to look up, instead of down, for the origin. Then he observed a branch of one tree, when in motion, to strike against the branch of another; and wood being a good conductor of sound, it proceeded down through the trunk, and the effect was as though issued from the ground beneath.—Plymouth Journal.

THE BRIGANDS OF TERRACINA.—One of the brigands who recently extorted 6000 scudi for the ransom of an inhabitant of Terracina, has been captured. The system adopted by these scoundrels, on gaining possession of a wealthy victim, is to cast lots amongst themselves who shall undertake the perilous message of venturing into the town to inform the prisoner's relations of the sum required for his release. The messenger presents himself with the unwelcome tidings, adding, that if he is in any way denounced, or prevented from returning to his expectant comrades by a certain hour, the prisoner will be murdered. Anxiety for the hostage usually insures the safety of the brigand, who returns to the mountains with a messenger from the family, bearing the required sum of money. If the first brigand sentry perceives more than one individual accompanying his comrade, or that one armed, or discovers any appearance of gendarmes, he fires his musket as a signal of alarm to the band, who immediately stab their victim, shout "tradimento," and make off to a more distant lair. If, on the other hand, the appearance of the messenger and money-bag is en règle, the intelligence is conveyed from sentry to sentry, the hostage brought down and consigned to the messenger, who pays his money and departs homewards with as calm a step as he and his released friend can muster on the occasion.

THE SOCIETY OF LADIES.—Whatever be a man's station in life, whether higher or lower, public or private, he will become a better man, and escape many a disaster, if he will listen in due season to the voice of the intelligent and the refined among the other sex. Not only do they generally excel us in their nice perception of the proprieties of life, and in their tender sense of duty to both God and man, but they are equally before us in their instinctive faculty of foreseeing evil before it is upon us, and of wisely discerning the character and motives of men. It was not all a dream which made the wife of Julius Caesar so anxious that he should not go to the Senate-Chamber on the fatal Ides of March; and had he complied with her entreaties, he might have escaped the dagger of Brutus. Disaster followed disaster in the career of Napoleon, from the time that he ceased to feel the balance-wheel of Josephine's influence on his impetuous spirit. Washington, when important questions were submitted to him, often said that he should like to carry the subject to his bedchamber before he had formed his decision; and those who knew the clear judgment and elevated purposes of Mrs. Washington, thought all the better of him for wishing to make her a confidential counsellor. Indeed, the great majority of men who have acquired for themselves a good and great name, were not only married men, but happily married.

NATURE'S TEACHINGS.

Oh! ye flowers blooming in your golden beds,
Wild and unassuming, lifting your fair heads;
Of your bright forms spreading in the meadows wide,
And rich perfumes shedding where glad streamlets glide
Though boasted not in story, each of you outvies
The regal pomp and glory of Solomon the Wise.

Oh! ye billows rolling in your power and pride,
Beyond man's controlling onward ye will glide.
Underneath you slumber, in a dreamless sleep,
High hearts without number, hidden by the deep.
Yet will cease your power, mighty though it be;
In God's appointed hour there shall be no more sea.

Oh! ye bright stars gleaming from yon lofty sphere,
In your splendour beaming on us mortals here,
Deeming it your duty darksome paths to light.
Shining in your beauty, "watchers of the night:"
They who are forgiven—their whose faith endures,
Shall yet wear in heaven brighter crowns than yours.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

R. HALL.—According to the last census, the population of Manchester was 240,367, of Glasgow, 257,592, and of Liverpool, 282,656.

JOSH. HOLMES.—The total length of the Britannia Tubular Bridge, is 1513 feet; height at the middle, 30 feet; height at each end, 22 feet 9 inches; extreme width, 14 feet 8 inches.

EDWARD LAWRENCE.—To make pomatum which shall have a crystalline appearance, the hogs' lard should be well blanched. Perfumers cut the lard into small pieces, and cover it with clear spring water, which is changed every twenty four hours, for eight days. When it is perfectly white, it is put into the pan and melted with a little mutton suet.

SOLUS.—Love should always be made in propiâ personâ. Letter-writing is cold work. When the question has been popped, it is useful as an auxiliary.

MULLINGAR.—Black spots on the face can only be removed by sneezing them out, and then washing the part in diluted spirits of wine.

TERRA NOVA.—Your "Past, Present, and Future" betrays ability, but the composition shows inexperience. The best line—"Time unimproved is time destroyed"—

Is not original. We cannot at present positively name the author, but we have an impression that it may be found in one of Franklin's essays.

LELFEDA wishes to know if a gentleman has fallen in love when he looks at a lady very much, and frequently asks her to dance? A good symptom, but not an infallible one. Gentlemen are curious in their preferences. Some are like butterflies—they like to rove from flower to flower. Beware of all such.

W. D.—The annual grants to her Majesty the Queen are not much below £400,000.

J. G. A.—Cobham Common is the place where the camp is formed. Cobham and Cobham Park are a few miles distant.

PROBY.—When the parties are of full age there requires no consent on the part of the parents to a marriage; but as every bride must have had a father, custom and propriety suggest that she should be given away by her father or a male relative. It would be unseemly in a woman giving away a woman in marriage. The male is the head.

NELL GWYN.—The Queen's College for general female education is 67, Harley Street. There is a City branch, Artillery Place, Finsbury Square.

H. H. HALL.—This is the nineteenth century, because 1853 is a portion of 1900. The full term of 1900 years will not be completed until the 31st of December, 1900.

TRUTHFUL.—When we said the English sculptors were the first in Europe, of course we meant those of the present day. The school which produced Flaxman, Chantrey, and Gibson has not been excelled by any other.

ALPHA.—If a young gentleman falls in love with a young lady, and has not the opportunity of paying his addresses to her, which is the best way to proceed in the matter? Silent love is dumb stupidity. Write, speak, or do anything but gaze at a distance, spell-bound. Columbus did not discover America by gazing wistfully at the Atlantic Ocean. You must approach the lady respectfully, but with spirit.

E. ENGINEER.—It is one of the privileges of the surgeons of a public hospital to be allowed to dissect the body of a patient who died within its precincts; but good feeling and delicacy would suggest that the consent of the friends of the deceased should be previously obtained.

J. CURTAIN.—The point is undecided, for magistrates differ in opinion; but as an omnibus is a public vehicle, we should say that the conductor could not legally retain a booked seat, if a person finding room demanded to be taken as a passenger.

EVA ST. CLARE.—You ask, Is it the lady's or the gentleman's place to defray the expenses of the wedding-cards and carriages? The gentleman's, of course, if he can afford it; if not, why the lady must open her purse.

A. BESWICK.—A collector of debts sending a printed notice, with the royal arms at the top, threatening legal proceedings, commits an illegal action; for, without being authorised, he is assuming the functions of an attorney.

J. A.—The Sovereign of England, the Lord Chancellor, the Prime Minister, and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, must be of the Protestant faith.

A WIDOW.—Your daughter will be entitled to your share of the property—namely, one-third.

J. S.—The Royal Exchange has been twice destroyed by fire. First, in the Great Fire of London, in 1666, and lastly, on the 10th of January, 1838. The new Royal Exchange cost £137,000, and was opened by Queen Victoria, in October, 1844.

JESSE GREY.—The conduct of your lover is unmanly and paltzy. He should give you a reason for his estrangement. It would be unmanly to call upon him, but you have a right to demand an explanation. Should he refuse it, you had better strive to forget him. Happiness with such a man would be problematical.

SUCCESS.—In an enrolled friendly society there is the guarantee that the trustees will be prosecuted should they embezzle the funds. The members also are protected from other frauds, and when aggrieved can seek redress from a magistrate. 2. The notice to quit was good, and you must obey it.

CHICARD.—The young lady wishes you to shave off your mustache as a proof of your devotion. You object, and both refer to us for a decision. We must pronounce against the young lady—for it is evidently a mere whim of hers. The mustache was no doubt a tolerable help to you in your love-making, and why does she fall out with it in the last happy moments of courtship? She is unreasonable.

LITTLE DOT must not think anything about the young gentleman until she is positive he thinks a good deal about her. His message was a great liberty—it bordered on rudeness; but as love, or the semblance of it, is no friend to good manners, Little Dot must be forgiving.

EX FIMO DARE LUCEM.—You contradict your nom de plume, for you have not shown any light yet. You are all smoke. How can the girl respond to your tender avowals, when you woo so bashfully? Your passion wants a little pepper in it. Young women are afraid to trust shilly-shally lovers with a confession of attachment.

T. D. P.—An apprentice who absents himself from his master's service without leave, or otherwise neglects his duty, is liable to be imprisoned and put to hard labour. A master may also have his retaliatory apprentice put in the stocks.

P. W. W.—The Metropolitan Hospital for Diseases of the Skin is 25, Bridge Street, Blackfriars. It receives poor persons suffering under cutaneous complaints, and advice free is given daily to out-patients, who are supplied with medicines and appropriate medicine, of which this institution possesses a more extended suite than any other public charity.

GEO. FRAXON.—The Metropolitan Institution for Convalescents was established in 1843. The office is 32, Sackville Street. The hospital is at Carshalton, a beautiful place in Surrey. Patients are admitted on the recommendation of a governor, and in some cases by the payment in addition of 12s. per week, every Friday, at four o'clock. A donation of £10 10s., or a yearly subscription of one guinea, constitutes a governor.

WELCHMAN.—To clean brass or copper, take an ounce of oxalic acid, six ounces of rotten stone, half an ounce of gum arabic, all in powder, one ounce of sweet oil, and a sufficiency of water to make a paste. Apply a small portion, and rub dry with a flannel or leather.

B. T. has received a bachelor's-button from a young lady, and is at a loss to know whether she meant it as an insult, or a gentle hint to change his present way of living for that of matrimony? The lady meant it as a reproach. Sweets to the sweets, and sours to the sours. In our younger days, the little yellow flower called a Bachelor's Button was considered to be typical of that mysterious existence familiarly called single blessedness. Like the mountain daisy, it might be asked what it fed on? You have now an opportunity—make her a present of a red rose, and deliver it yourself.

H. H. S.—A hair-wash may be made as follows: Take one ounce of borax, half an ounce of camphor, powder these ingredients fine, and dissolve them in one quart of boiling water, when cool, the solution will be ready for use.

CHADJIAN.—The religion of Mahomet has been a curse and a blight to the world. It is a purely material system, and, having no spirituality, cannot last. Another of its fatal defects is the repudiation of the idea of the immortality of woman. With all strict Mahomedans woman is only regarded as a servant, a convenience—a substitute for the celestial bride promised in the paradise which the founder of the faith described.

A. C. R.—The oil of elder is extracted by distillation from the flowers of the sambucus nigra. It has the consistence of butter.

C. F.—The imagination, no doubt, exercises great influence in inducing hydrophobia; but there unfortunately is no doubt of the existence of the disease, or of its incurable character. The number of dogs running wild in our streets is quite a nuisance. The authorities ought to order a wholesale razzia.

THOMAS CALVERT.—Use the following cream for the hair. Take two ounces of marrow pomatum, two ounces of almond oil; put together in a basin. Place them near enough to the fire to melt, and while cooling, stir in two drachms of oil of jessamine or bergamot.

LILY OF THE VALLEY.—The young man's preference for you was a penchant—not a passion. You must forget him. As he made no explicit declaration, it is evident he was not violently smitten. Besides, your subsequent coolness extinguished the faint spark your beauty had kindled.

E. U.—You have known the lady four months, and, being inspired by the tender passion, wish to know whether you would be justified in making a declaration. Certainly—the pulsations of the heart, when in love, determine the peculiar etiquette to be observed.

NIGHT.

BY ELIZABETH HERON.

When the silvery moon is shedding
O'er the earth her mellow light,
And the summer stars are shining,
Tis then I love the night!

When the perfumed breezes wander
O'er my cheek, among my hair,
Causing a sweet and pleasing languor,
'Tis then I own the night is fair.

With her I love beside me,
Her soft hand clasped in mine,
Her smiling eyes turned on me,
Then night is indeed divine.

G. J.—You must apply personally at the Foundling Hospital, Guildford Street. This institution is no longer a foundling hospital, because the legislature has carefully provided for orphan and deserted children. It is now an asylum for poor illegitimate children, whose mothers are known, and they are only received with the view to the amendment of the unfortunate parents. The income of the hospital is above £10,000, and the number of children maintained 500, who are, while infants, sent out to nurse, and are afterwards kept until fifteen.

HENRY ASHTON.—A lady attains her majority at twenty-one. The sovereign, when a woman, is of age at eighteen.

KATHLEEN.—Yes, Ebenezer Elliott was the son of a blacksmith, and a blacksmith himself.

DELTA.—A creditor requesting payment of a sum of money due to him on a Sunday, does not in the slightest degree prejudice his claim. According to the law of England, Sunday is a die non only as to contracts and bargains. A discharge of a debt on that day would be allowed to be proved, and the evidence would be held to be good as to the payment. There is a wide moral difference between discharging an obligation and contracting one. The former is a duty, the latter a bit of business, the contraction of which on a Sunday would be an invasion of the statute and moral law.

W.—Wigginton's invention of an air supply for the ventilation of ships and deep basements of buildings, &c., conveys the air in pipes round the floor of a mid-deck cabin immediately under the berths, whence it would be diffused throughout the whole space of the cabin. There are escapes in the upper deck for carrying off the attenuated air.

W. P. T.—Evertton Toffee.—Tons pound of good moist sugar, four ounces of fresh butter, and four table-spoonfuls of good vinegar, into a clean saucepan or preserving pan; set it over a moderate fire, let it boil, carefully stirring it until it becomes somewhat thicker than treacle. Drop a little from time to time into some clean cold water, in order to ascertain when it is hard and crackly—it is then enough. The chief secret in making good toffee is to have it sufficiently done to be hard and brittle as glass, and yet not to let it get burned. Rub a shallow tin or plate all over with butter, pour your toffee into it, and put it by to cool; it may then be turned out, and is ready for use. Loaf sugar and white wine vinegar will give the toffee a more delicate appearance, but they will add nothing to its goodness or flavour.

ANDREW DUNCAN.—Depression and poverty cannot be removed by sentimental reprimand, or the elaboration of political dogmas. All such displays are evidences of weakness rather than strength. The study of those conditions which give as well as alter the complexion should be preferred. The object to be attained is to adapt and discipline society to practical ideas of redemption from poverty, misery, and vice. What are we doing? Is the question; and when once opened, what an extended view bursts on the mental vision. Setting aside the too obvious material depression of certain classes, we find that not only is the country richer than ever it was, but that promises of a mighty, stupendous change, are everywhere visible. The poor are becoming less poor, misery less sordid; and while physical wants are multiplying, the means of satisfying them are accumulating. Our manufactures are increasing in a faster ratio than before, our commerce is steadily rising, our internal trade prospering, our agriculture paying well, and there is on all sides presented the evidence of a nation blessed with all that imparts stability to greatness, ease to penury, and comparative comfort to every inhabitant of these islands. In addition to these physical advantages, education is rapidly progressing, morals are improving, and a vigorous national mind springing up, which, if rightly directed, might be able to contribute to the most brilliant results. The intellectual and practical consideration of these working forces is the great want of the age.

BOZ.—All money and personal property absolutely belonging to the wife, becomes her husband's after her decease.

HENRIETTA TEMPLE has attracted the notice of two gentlemen whom she is in the habit of meeting at a musical lecture, three times a week. They sit directly opposite her: one is apparently forty years of age, the other is about twenty-eight; the elder one keeps looking round occasionally with timid glances, the other looks bold and earnestly at her. She has heard they are both excellent characters, and wholly dependent on a loving maiden aunt. Henrietta says she would like to be introduced to one of the gentlemen, if it could be effected with propriety. Henrietta must put a curb on her inclination. Her dread of poverty must not induce her to forget what is due to her maidenly dignity. If the gentlemen are impressed they will speak, and then Henrietta's heart must make a choice. Forty and twenty-eight are rather too wide a difference.

AMATUS naively asks, what is the best present a gentleman could give to a lady on the eve of her marriage with another, after she had heartlessly jilted him? It is a funny question to answer—but we should say a pillow stuffed with thorns or nettles, would convey to her a significant hint of your opinion of her fate. What is better, probably, charitably warn her that her future is more fraught with danger than her past. But it is better to leave such cold-blooded creatures to their destiny. The jilt generally becomes the dowry wife and eldritch mother, and so fades away from the affection of all her respectable friends.

R. S.—Swedenborg was a religious enthusiast who lived in the eighteenth century. He was the son of the Lutheran Bishop of Skara, and was born at Upsal, in 1688. After having passed the greater part of his life doing nothing, as it were—for he had been a poet, a philosopher, a mineralogist, an astronomer, a sailor, a divine—he began to publish his reveries on the infinite, the creation, the spirit and matter, nature and God. He believed that he was inspired to reveal new truths. He lived till 1772. In his books of revelation he teaches that everything is allegorical; that there are two senses—the one celestial, spiritual, and interior—the other, natural, exterior, and literal. One of his remarkable doctrines was a denunciation of the idea of a place of torment. He contended that it was contrary to the Divine Essence to deprive a single man of his mercy, and that the opposite opinion was irreconcilable with the Divine nature. Another of his doctrines was, that the instant of a man's death was the moment of his resurrection, that no other resurrection is allowed. He then appears in the spiritual world under the human form, exactly as if he were in this world; under this form he becomes an angel, and no other angels exist but those who become so at the time of their departure from this world. The great aim of Swedenborg was to give a new interpretation to the mission of the Saviour.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer cloud,
Without our special wonder? SHAKESPEARE.

JOE BEANS was snugly sleeping in his comfortable truckle bed at the rectory, where he still continued to take up his abode. Perhaps his dreams were of Susan. Indeed, we think we may venture to assert as a fact that they were so—for only a few hours before retiring to rest, by dint of great coaxing, wheedling, and promising, he had obtained from the pretty rustic a promise that, if her dear young lady should marry Henry Ashton—that if the bride and bridegroom particularly wished it—and, above all, if Joe would promise to make her an excellent husband, the same day which united the lovers should see her Mrs. Susan Beans.

We appeal to our fair readers. What could the sleeper be dreaming of, except his sweetheart, after such a promise as that?

Several smart raps had been made at the window of Joe's bed-room. Still he slept. None so hard to waken as the happy dreamer. A stone, thrown with more force than the preceding ones, cracked one of the panes at last, and the fragments of broken glass came rattling down upon the floor. The honest rustic started from his sleep, and, staring round, demanded who was there?

The reply was made in the form of another pebble falling upon the bed.

Joe sprang upon his feet, and rushed to the window.

"Who's there?" he repeated.

"It be I, Mister Beans!" answered the well-known voice of Red Ralph.

Crouching under a tree upon the lawn, was the uncouth figure of the cow-boy, who, after the terrible apparition in the hut of the warren, could not rest till he had imparted what he had seen to his rustic patron.

"And what do you want at this hour of the night?" said Joe, in anything but an amiable tone of voice—for he naturally felt annoyed at being disturbed. "I am afraid, Ralph, you have been drinking!"

"Two water, then!" replied the boy.

"Go home directly, sir!"
"Go home!" repeated Ralph. "Noa—noa, Mister Beans! I dare not pass the common, arter what I ha' seen to-night! Do 'ee come down," he added, in a tone of entreaty. "Indeed I beant a-larkin'! If I tell thee a lie, thee canst take it out on me wi' a good thrashing!"

As there was some sense as well as earnestness in the last proposition of the speaker—and Joe knew him to be shrewd beyond his years—he at once resolved to comply with his request. He had frequently asked himself the question whether, despite the deaths of Meeran Hafaz and Will Sidel, the troubles of Master Harry and Miss Ellen were all over yet.

"Wait!" he said; "and make no more noise, lest you alarm the rector and the servants!"

"I won't, Mister Beans! But do 'ee make haste!"

In a few minutes Henry's friend made his appearance upon the lawn. His first intention had been to scold the boy for what he believed some foolish alarm; but no sooner did he perceive his pale face—which, in the moonlight, appeared both ghastly and distorted by nervous twitching about the mouth—than he changed his purpose; and, placing his hand kindly upon his shoulder, inquired what was the matter.

"I ha' seen him! I ha' seen him!" exclaimed Ralph, wildly.

"Seen him! Seen who?" demanded the bewildered Joe.

"The war—ren—er!"

The teeth of the lad chattered with terror at the recollection, as he endeavoured to pronounce the name of the murderer.

"Fancy, Ralph—fancy!" replied the young man. "The dead never return to visit us!"

"Don't they, though?" exclaimed his protégé. "I thought so once, but I know better now! I tell 'ee, Mister Beans, I ha' seen un, just as he wor dressed in Cromwell House, wi' his game bag on 's shoulder, and broad hat drawn over his bushy grey eyebrows! I'd swear to un!"

"But where was this?"

"In the hut in wood, where he used to live! I dare say he has done many a murder there, and that be why he can't rest!"

"Imagination—all imagination, Ralph!" said Joe Beans, assuming a conviction which he was very far from feeling. "Even supposing now," he continued, "that the ghost of Will was condemned to revisit his old haunt as a punishment for his crime, I don't see why the ghost of his old clothes shouldn't rest in peace! It was quite disgrace enough for them to be hanged with him!"

There was a deeper vein of philosophy in this objection than the honest rustic dreamed of.

"But he worn't hanged in 'em!" said the cow-boy. "He wor dressed in clothes he wore at Cromwell House, when he towzled Mistress Susan, and tried to kill I! I could swear to un agin by patch on shoulder, and big, swagging pockets!"

"Still more unlikely," objected Joe, "that a ghost should have gone all the way from Norwich to Mortlake to dress itself in the ghost of the old clothes it had left behind! It won't do, Ralph! You must have been drinking or dreaming!"

This was said quite as much, perhaps, to test the conviction of the lad in the truth of his strange story, as to express the speaker's own doubts upon the subject, which were considerably shaken. There is an innate credulity and love of the marvellous in most minds, and Joe was not exempt from the common weakness.

"Did you see his face?" he demanded, after a few moments' reflection.

"Noa—noa! The soight of his old coat and hat wor enough for I!" answered Ralph, with a shudder. "I am sure it wor he! He had gotten a box on table, square, black and silver, lolke! I ha' seen it somewhere afore, tho I can't tell where! Can 'ee, Mister Beans?"

At the mention of the box, a new light broke upon the mind of honest Joe. He had seen such a box. He knew that the much-wronged widow of Sir William Mowbray had just such another, which she placed nightly under her pillow; and that it contained the letter of the colonel to the Abbate Lucas, as well as other papers necessary for the vindication of her honour.

"Thee art a sharp lad, Ralph," he exclaimed, "after all; and possess far more wit than I do!"

"Do I, though?" answered the boy, with a grin of satisfaction—for hitherto he had looked up to the speaker with great respect, on account of his superior shrewdness.

"Well, I shouldn't ha' thought it!"

"This is no ghost, I feel convinced," continued the young man, thoughtfully.

"Beant it?"

"But some designing villain, who has assumed the appearance of Will Sidel, in order to terrify those whom he might encounter in the execution of his project. He will not terrify me," added the speaker, with an air of determination. "Wait for me a few moments, Ralph, whilst I get my pistols: we will soon unkenel the dark schemer!"

"But is 'ee quite sure, Mister Beans?" exclaimed the still terrified lad, but half convinced. "It wor awful loike un!"

"Convinced! I'd swear to it! It must be Colonel Mowbray, or one of his agents! His aim is to obtain the box, which contains the proofs of his villainies! I see it all!"

"And so do I!" said Ralph, joyously; "for I recollect now where I seed it, or one just loike it! Lady in black, with pale face, that Master Harry carried out of carriage into the hall yonder, had it in her hand! What a fool I wor! But sin' it be no ghost," he added, with an air of satisfaction, "I'm for 'un! I don't mind real live flesh and blood, loike ourselves, Mister Beans: I'll have a pop at un!"

Joe returned to the rectory, and in a few minutes reappeared, well armed. The cow-boy readily consented to accompany him through the wood, to the hut of the warren; but to all his entreaties for a pistol, Joe Beans turned a deaf ear. He knew the urchin to be not only as cunning but as agile as a fox, or wild cat; and he determined, in the event of danger, to let him trust to his wit and agility: a pistol, he justly considered, would be a dangerous weapon in such hands.

Cautiously gliding through the wood, more like shadows than living things—for not a word was spoken on either side—the two adventurers at last arrived at the secluded dell in which the lonely hut of the warren was situated. Although the moon was shining brightly, the broad shadows of the stately oaks and firs which it cast athwart their path, had hitherto screened them; but on the open sward before the cottage they were compelled to use the utmost caution, lest their approach should be perceived by any one lurking within.

Just as Red Ralph—who had been marching first—was about to advance from the friendly shadow of the wood into the full light of the moon, his more cautious companion gave a peculiar kind of signal, imitating the cry of an owl: the boy stopped, like a well-trained spaniel, in an instant; the same device having been agreed upon between them when they wanted to discover each other's whereabouts, at the time of their adventures in Mortlake.

"What does 'ee want, Mister Beans?" whispered the boy, as soon as he crept stealthily to his side.

"Not so fast, Ralph; there may be danger!"

"Door be open," replied the urchin; "and light out!"

"S say here!" said Joe, firmly; "I will venture first!"

"Noa, Mister Beans—noa—if I do I'm danged!" answered the lad, firmly; "these has been kind to I—given I good advice—got I a place w' Farmer Ashton, and not left I to starve when I had saved thee turn at Cromel House, as some folk would ha' done! It be no use—I will go with 'ee! I bea'n't a bit afraid: tho' I be little, I be tough—so say no more about it!"

"Well, then," replied his companion, patting his rough elflocks—for he felt touched as well as pleased at Ralph's fidelity; "thee shall, lad—thee shall! but remember, not a word, unless I speak!"

"All right, Mister Beans!"

"And if anything occurs to me," added the young man, in a voice which betrayed some slight emotion, "run as fast as you can to the rectory, alarm the servants, call up Master Harry, and tell him what you have seen!"

Red Ralph began to blubber at the idea of any danger occurring to his friend and patron.

"I will, Mister Beans—I will! but do gi' I a pistol! Indeed I know how to use it! I popped at sparrows and blackbirds a hundred times at Mortlake, and never missed un—it be too bad to doubt I!"

"So it is," whispered Joe, his reluctance to intrust him with the weapon quite overcome by the feeling which the urchin displayed; "there it is—but be careful!"

"Ees, Mister Beans!" answered the boy, with a grin of satisfaction at the confidence reposed in him.

"And remember, you are only to use it at the last extremity!"

"At the what? Mister Beans."

"At the last extremity," repeated his patron; "that is, to defend your life!"

"Or yours!" muttered Ralph. "I understand—I bea'n't such a fool as folk do say I look!"

The door of the hut, judging from the outside fastening, had been broken open; inside it was easily secured by means of a strong oaken bar, left standing against the walls. After groping about for some time in perfect darkness—for the rude wooden flap which served as a shutter had been let down—without meeting the least interruption, or hearing any sound beyond their own footsteps, Joe Beans ventured at last to strike a light.

A candle, half burnt down, placed in an empty bottle, was upon the table: he lit it, and the place became distinctly visible—they were alone.

"There be no one here, Ralph!" observed the young man.

"No, Mister Beans—the bird be flown!"

"Was there a bird?" said his companion; his former doubt, that the boy's imagination had deceived him, returning as he viewed the desolate, deserted place.

"Thee canst easily tell!" answered the mortified lad.

"How so?"

"I be as I used to do," continued the urchin, "at Mortlake, when I wanted to know if the birds were hatching—feel if the nest be warm!"

Joe took the hint, and began to rake the ashes, gathered in a lump upon the hearthstone: as he displaced them, several bright sparks flew upwards, and particles of half-burnt wood began to glow and redden, exposed to the reviving influence of the atmosphere.

"By heavens, you are right!" exclaimed the young man; "the nest is warm!"

"I told 'ee so!"

From this moment no further doubt remained upon his mind of the poor boy's truth. A further examination of the hut proved, had further proof been wanting, that it had lately been inhabited. Not only were remains of provisions found on the shelf, but straw and grass had been gathered into a heap in a recess close by the chimney, to serve as a bed.

This was not all. Under the straw they discovered a carpet-bag, carefully concealed: it contained linen and a suit of travelling clothes, evidently belonging to some one holding the position of a gentleman.

"What does 'ee think now, Mister Beans?" demanded his informant, with a triumphant grin.

"That you are right, Ralph. I was a fool to doubt you."

"Noa—noa—not a fool—only hard of belief, loike I!"

answered the urchin. "Won't 'ee feel in pockets?"

Joe took the hint, and began carefully to examine them. They were all empty, save one: in that he discovered a card, with several memoranda written in cipher.

"Hold the candle!" he exclaimed; "I can make nothing of this!"

Ralph brought the candle, and although he could make nothing of the memoranda, the name upon the card was plain enough—it was that of Colonel Mowbray.

The presence of the scheming uncle of Miss De Vere in such a place and under the disguise of the warren, coupled with the circumstance of the box, were quite sufficient to convince the friend of Henry Ashton that something was being plotted against his happiness, or that of the unfortunate Lady Mowbray, and he determined to proceed at once to the abbey, and communicate all he had seen and heard to our hero. A chill of horror ran through his manly frame, as the fearful thought suggested itself, that perhaps he was too late.

"Ralph!" he exclaimed, in a tone of decision, "we are losing time here! The villain has the start of us, and even now may be succeeding in his infamous attempt! We must start."

"Where to?" demanded the boy.

"To the abbey. There the solutions of this night's work will take place."

"I be with 'ee, Mister Beans," said the urchin, "an I know it be no ghost, I bea'n't a bit afraid on un! I should like to shoot a man," he added; "a real thief or a murderer! I never killed anything bigger nor a cat yet! How the folk will talk about I at Mortlake!"

"If he attempts to harm Master Harry or Miss Ellen," said his companion, with an air of desperation, as they left the hut together, "shoot him, Ralph—shoot him like a dog!"

"I will, Mister Beans—that I will!" answered the urchin, with a grin of intense satisfaction at the permission. "I should loike to know," he added, "how a chap feels arter killing a man!"

Byron, if we remember rightly, once made the same observation.

It was now Joe's turn to take the lead. He was too well acquainted with every road leading to Carrow to require a guide. So rapidly did the honest fellow pursue his way, that Red Ralph was compelled to run and bound along the footpath like a kangaroo, to keep up with him. In less than an hour they reached the wall of the park.

"Shall I ring at lodge?" demanded the boy, half out of breath with his exertions.

"Do as I do!" said his kind friend, at the same time catching a branch of one of the trees which overhung the wall, and swinging himself to its level.

"Canst follow?" he said, looking down to his companion.

"Like a cat, Mister Beans! See here!"

In an instant the speaker was beside him.

Once in the limits of the park, they ran rather than walked towards the house. A dead silence reigned around the venerable pile—not a light was to be seen from any of the windows—all seemed buried in repose.

"See—see!" whispered the urchin, suddenly grasping the arm of Joe Beans, and pointing at the same time towards the shrubbery, which extended from the stream into which he had pushed Parson Twintext, close to the north wing; "we bea'n't alone!"

Joe looked in the direction pointed to, and distinctly saw the dark shadow of a man retreating amid the trees and bushes, in the midst of which was an old Gothic summer-house, which, ever since he had known the place, had been carefully locked. It had once been the favourite resort of Sir William and his lady. After her supposed infidelity the baronet never entered it.

"Thank God!" he muttered, "we are in time!"

After beating about the shrubbery for some time, they found the pavilion, or summer-house. The key was in the door. Joe pushed it open, and, with his pistols ready for use, sprang into the room, closely followed by Ralph: it was empty.

A dim light appeared to issue from the earth. Creeping towards it, they discovered that a flag-stone had been removed, and could feel a flight of stairs descending beneath the foundations of the building. The light was evidently carried by some one who had preceded them, for its rays became fainter and fainter as they gazed.

Without an instant's hesitation or a word being spoken, both began to descend. Joe had nearly reached the bottom step, when he heard the click of his companion's pistol. The urchin was preparing for action, as he termed it.

"Be careful!" he whispered.

"I will, Mister Beans!" replied the boy, in the same low tone; "but this be a mortal queer place—summat like Cromwell House!"

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

Old gossips love on winter nights to sit
Close to the cheerful hearth, telling strange tales
Of moor or hall haunted by spectre grim—
Of murder wondrously brought to light,
Or wrong made right at last.

HEIR OF THE SEPT.

ALTHOUGH the return of the ancient servants of the Mowbray family to Carrow Abbey was a source of considerable satisfaction to them, a feeling of terror was not unmixed with it. If they naturally felt pleased at the thought of returning to end their days in the home where most of them had passed the best years of their lives, it was alloyed by the recollection of the fearful scenes they had witnessed in it.

None cared to admit it, but each felt a dread of passing alone through the old-fashioned, dreary chambers and dark, panelled corridors. They started at the echo of their own footfall, and hastened their steps till they reached the housekeeper's room, where a cheerful fire and the society of their fellow-servants gradually recalled the colour to their cheeks.

The picture-gallery, the apartment in which Ellen had been terrified by the warren, and the library, the scene of Sir William's murder, were carefully avoided. No one, save old Martin, would venture in them—and he wandered about in meditation and sadness. Not even Mrs Jarmy, who had known him so many years, or Nicholls, the butler, could understand him: frequently they heard the old man repeating to himself:

"Not yet! no rest yet! the aloe has not bloomed!"

"What does he mean by the aloe not blooming?" inquired the worthy housekeeper of the servants.

None could explain the mystery to her, and it was little use asking Martin: he had never been of a very communicative disposition, and late events had made him more taciturn than ever.

All the inmates of the abbey, except the domestics, had retired to rest: they, although the abbey clock had long struck the hour of midnight, still remained, like a herd of frightened deer, gathered round the fire in Mrs. Jarmy's room—who so far waived her dignity on the occasion, as to admit even the kitchen-maids to her apartment, to the great disgust of the servants of the Duchess of Devonshire, who, between themselves, pronounced the arrangement to be low, radical, and subversive of all order of the funny hierarchy.

Still they did not choose to withdraw themselves—for the gloomy old mansion had infected them with its terrors, too.

"How can you live in such a horrid place?" exclaimed her grace's own footman, to whom, as a point of hospitality, Nicholls had resigned his own place opposite the housekeeper. "It ain't fit fer heavy one has as nerves!"

"Use, Mr. Flip—use!" replied the old lady, to hide her displeasure at hearing the ancient house of the Mowbray family called a "horrid place."

The butler bit his lips, and remained silent; not so Martin, who occupied an easy chair in the chimney-nook.

"What does he say?" inquired the old man.

"He calls Carrow a horrid place," answered the kitchen-maid, who had noticed the disdainful glances which from time to time the aristocratic servants of the duchess cast towards her.

"You should see Chatsworth!" continued the flunkey, without condescending to notice the interruption.

"Ay, that you should!" chimed in the lady's-maid.

"And what is Chatsworth, compared to Carrow?" exclaimed the aged groom, his eyes flashing with anger. "The mushroom to the oak: Carrow had stood five hundred years before the founder of Chatsworth had laid a single stone of its foundation!"

"At any rate we have no ghosts there!" observed the abigail of the duchess, tartly.

"Of course you have not!" replied Mrs. Jarmy, who began to feel her temper getting a little ruffled; "it is only in very ancient houses, like Carrow, and in the families of our oldest nobility, that such things are ever heard of! Thank heaven!" she added, with a very equivocal expression of satisfaction, "we have plenty here!"

"I don't believe a word of it!" exclaimed Mr. Flip.

"Nor I!" added the lady's-maid.

The housekeeper twined the bunch of keys at her girdle rather nervously—a usual habit with her when thoroughly vexed.

"Perhaps ma'am," she said—it is a bad sign when ladies begin to "ma'am" each other—"you would like to be convinced?"

"Convinced!"

"You or the gentleman—it is immaterial which of you: you have only to pass the night, or rather morning, in the green chamber, where Lady Blanche Mowbray was found dead on her wedding night, to be thoroughly satisfied! Shall I order it to be prepared for you?"

It is needless to say that the offer was instantly declined.

"Or Mr. Flip, if he prefers it, may sit in the great hall," quietly observed the butler, "and see the marble statue of Sir Richard bow its head as the clock strikes twelve: pity it is too late to-night!"

"Or meet the ghost of the nun in the cloister!"

"Or that of the crusader in the chapel!"

These last suggestions were made by the two old house-maids, who most devoutly believed the truth of every word they were uttering. The two sceptics, who were sceptics only out of opposition, began to look very blank at the variety of offers enumerated; and the chivalrous Mr. Flip seriously meditated soliciting permission of the butler to pass the rest of the night in his apartment, instead of his own, which was situated unpleasantly near to the green chamber.

"Do you mean to say, my dear Mrs. Jarmy," said the abigail, drawing her chair still closer to that of the housekeeper, "that you have actually seen any of these horrible sights?"

The old lady shook her head, and observed that it was not for her to speak of the strange sights she had seen in the family she had so long and faithfully served.

"One thing I will tell you," she added; "for although I was but a girl when it occurred, I remember it as distinctly as if it had happened only yesterday!"

The domestics crowded round the speaker, every eye earnestly fixed upon her countenance, anxious to discover, if possible, whether she were in earnest, or sporting with their credulity.

"I had been sent for," she continued, "to assist my grandmother, the housekeeper, at Carrow, at the time of the Lady Blanche's marriage: half the nobility of the country were present. Well, the wedding passed over, the garter was dropped—they kept up all such odd customs in those days—and the bride retired to rest, when the dancers in the long gallery were startled by a loud scream and the ringing of a bell—"

"Well—well!" exclaimed several of her auditors, looking very anxious and terrified.

As she was about to continue her narration, a shriek from a distant part of the abbey was distinctly heard: it broke the stillness of the night, like some despairing wretch's cry, struggling with hooded murder.

Mrs. Jarmy turned deadly pale—the maids began to cling closely for protection to the valourous Mr. Flip, who seemed half dead with fear; even old Martin, who had been listening attentively, in his easy chair, half rose from his seat.

"Did y-o-u h-e-a-r it?" demanded the lady's-maid.

Not only was the scream repeated, but it was followed by a violent ringing of one of the bells—in their terror they could not distinguish which.

"We shall all be murdered!" groaned the aristocratic footman.

"Worse—worse!" shrieked the duchess's waiting-woman; "carried off by the ghosts!"

Martin's first idea was, that one of the domestics, in order to punish the impertinence and incredulity of their visitors, had quietly withdrawn from the housekeeper's room at the commencement of her tale, and given the scream and rung the bell to alarm them; but no—every servant was present.

"This must be seen to!" he said, addressing the butler.

"Y-e-s!" faltered the terrified Nicholls. "Don't look so angry, Martin!" he added; "I am a coward, I confess; but I will do my duty!"

The two aged men took each a pistol from the chimney-piece, and left the room. It was in vain that Mrs. Jarmy entreated of Flip to follow them. "He had every inclination," he said; "but duty prevented him."

"Duty!" repeated the old lady, in a strong tone of contempt; "say rather fear! No matter! I will go myself!"

And the faithful creature would actually have put her resolution into practice, had not the maids thrown their arms around her, and forcibly detained her in her seat.

The report of a pistol was heard, followed by loud and continued screaming.

"It's my lady's voice!" exclaimed the housekeeper, violently agitated; "let me go!"

"There will be murder going on!" sobbed one.

"The ghost!"

Again the cries were repeated. With a desperate effort the aged woman broke from them and rushed out of the apartment, leaving those who remained more dead than alive with terror.

"It is all your fault!" observed the kitchen-maid, reproachfully.

"Mine!" exclaimed Mr. Flip.

"Yours: you would make Mistress Jarmy speak of the ghosts! They don't like it; real quality never does like to be talked about! As for me, I be'n't afraid; but you—well—I don't wish to make you uncomfortable, but I wish you well out of Carrow!"

From the bottom of their hearts the domestics of the duchess echoed back the wish; mentally blaming their kind-hearted mistress for ever having set foot in such an uncomfortable abode.

It is now time that we invited our readers to accompany Joe Beans and his companion in their pursuit of the shadowy form which had so strangely disappeared in the pavilion in the shrubbery.

The narrow passage along which they stealthily followed the bearer of the light, was entirely of stonework, and of equal, if not greater antiquity, than the mansion. It had as many windings as a rabbit-burrow, and where the abrupt turnings formed an acute angle, the arch was curiously grained with rude attempts at ornament, consisting principally of heads of monks and saints, carved in the corbels and coigns.

Once or twice the light became stationary, as if the bearer of it had paused to listen. Joe and Ralph paused, too, scarcely daring to breathe. After a moment or two it again advanced.

Joe, who was taking the lead, paused to permit his companion to approach close to him. Placing his lips close to the ear of the boy, he whispered:

"Take off your shoes; I will remove mine. Our footsteps alarm him."

"Ees, Mister Beans!" faltered Ralph.

The light was nearly out of sight before they resumed their way.

After groping their way a considerable distance—made longer by the deviation of the passage—they arrived at a narrow flight of stairs, similar to the one by which they had descended. Both paused to listen.

"He is opening a door!" observed the young man to himself, as he heard the clicking of a spring or latch above.

The next moment the last ray of the lamp had disappeared, and they were left in total darkness. The fear now was that the midnight ruffian had gained entrance to the abbey, and closed the communication upon them.

The heart of the young man beat despairingly at the thought. Bidding his companion follow him, he mounted the steps, and arrived at what appeared to be a solid partition of wood, barring his further progress: a deep groan escaped him as he made the discovery.

"Lord have mercy!" exclaimed Ralph. "What be that?"

"Silence!" whispered Joe; "here is a door!"

"Be it open, Mister Beans?"

"No!" replied the rustic, despairingly. "Fool that I was to come without the means of procuring a light!"

From this dilemma his companion fortunately relieved him by producing the tinder-box and matches which he had used in the hut of the warrener. A light was quickly procured. It burnt sufficiently long to enable the faithful friend of our hero to discover an iron ring carefully let into the oaken frame-work of the panel. After pulling and pressing it in various directions, he felt the partition give way, and the next instant he and Ralph both stood in the well-remembered picture-gallery of Carrow Abbey.

"It be all right, at last!" whispered the latter.

The moonlight was streaming through the stained windows, which ran the whole length of the apartment, rendering every object distinctly visible. Joe paused for a moment to reflect, before he decided on his proceedings.

"Stay here!" he said, to Red Ralph, "close by the secret entrance."

"But where beest thee a-goin'?" demanded the boy.

"To my duty! yours is to remain here. You can easily hide yourself behind one of the cabinets. If the pretended ghost should attempt to pass by the way we came—"

"I'll shoot un!" exclaimed the urchin, with an air of determination, "thof I hang for it!"

At this moment the first scream and ringing of the bell, which had so alarmed the servants in the housekeeper's room was distinctly heard. Joe judged in an instant the direction it came from.

"Be firm," he said, "and I'll make a man of you!" Then, rushing to the end of the gallery, he disappeared through the door.

"I'd rather thee comed back agin," blubbered the boy, upon whose uncouth nature the kindness of his companion had made a deep impression, "than have all the gowd they say is buried at Cromwell House! I do wish I knowed how to pray for un! God bless un! that can't do un harm, at any rate, thof it does come from the heart of a poor, ignorant crittur! So I say again, God bless un! And now," he added, carefully examining the priming of his pistol; "now for the ghost! I should like to have a pop at un!"

So saying, he enconced himself, as Joe had directed, behind one of the massive cabinets, which was placed in such a position that he could see all who entered the gallery, either at the east or west end, without being perceived by any intruders.

Never in the course of his brief existence had the lad endured such intense anxiety as whilst watching the entrance to the secret passage; but in the midst of his hesitation he felt proud. Joe—his friend, his benefactor—had trusted him: they might have torn him in pieces before he would have abandoned his post.

We must now follow the footsteps of Joe to the chamber of Ellen and Lady Mowbray. The screams of the unhappy lady easily directed him towards it.

Colonel Mowbray—for the pretended ghost was no other than the infamous brother of the murdered baronet—had easily obtained access to the apartment by means of a key which he had caused to be made during the imprisonment of his niece, in order to aid the mad passion of Meeran Hafaz; though useless then, it served his purpose on the present occasion.

Ellen and her aunt were both sleeping: a smile was on the half-open lips of the fair girl—for her dreams were happy ones; the countenance of the widow was disturbed.

For a few moments the sight of so much loveliness and suffering staggered the villain in his design—which, to do him justice, extended no further than obtaining possession of the papers: for which purpose he had brought the box which his scheming wife had caused to be made—almost a fac-simile of the one containing the papers: his object was to exchange them. This he was determined to do at any sacrifice, even that of life; although, as a point of prudence, he was desirous of avoiding bloodshed. His irresolution was but momentary. Holding his breath, he cautiously advanced towards the side of the bed, and began gently to insert his hand under the pillow.

Slight as was the motion, it disturbed the orphan, who, starting from her sleep, beheld, as she supposed, the shade of the warrener bending over her. With a loud shriek, which startled the slumberer by her side, the terrified girl sank into a state of insensibility—which probably preserved both their lives, as it left the robber only one person to contend with—his brother's wronged and outraged widow.

Lady Mowbray's hand involuntarily caught at the cord of the bell: hence the peal which followed the cry of Ellen. The ruffian tore it rudely from her grasp.

"Who are you?" she demanded, wildly; "and what is your purpose?"

"The box!" whispered the colonel.

Fortunately she had never seen the warrener; otherwise her fears might have exceeded Ellen's.

"Never!" she replied, firmly. "Kill me, if you will; but never will I give up the clue to my lost child—the proofs that I am worthy to bear the name of my murdered husband! What have I done," she added, bursting into tears, "that evil men should thus conspire against me?"

Despite her naturally feeble state, the speaker clung to the casket with the despairing energy of a mother's love. Her cries became louder: the evil passions of Colonel Mowbray were excited. He drew a clasp-knife from his pocket, intending merely to cut her wrists and sever the tendons of her hands—for he was prudent even to the last—when in the struggle his hat and the long, iron-grey wig which he had assumed to make him look like the warrener, fell off upon the bed.

By the light of the night-lamp on the table, his sister-in-law recognised him immediately, and imprudently pronounced his name. The intentions of the monster instantly changed. Murder now became necessary to his safety.

"Fool!" he muttered; "I would have spared you!"

It was at this moment of agony, cruelty, and terror, that Joe Beans, who had reached the chamber, sprang upon him. From his being shoeless, the steps of the faithful fellow had not been heard—so that he took the ruffian unprepared. Seizing him by the neck, he hurried him with resistless force towards the door.

"Save me! save me!" exclaimed Lady Mowbray, clinging to the arm of her protector.

"The box, dear lady?"

"Ah!" shrieked the widow; "gone—gone! Think not of my worthless life—recover it, and I will bless you!"

The energy with which Joe Beans had intended murderer from his victim, had enabled him to overcome the falling strength of the widow, and to seize the casket in his grasp. Although stunned for an instant by the fall, the colonel speedily recovered his self-possession; and, darting through the open door, made the best of his way towards the picture-gallery—Joe Beans following him like a bloodhound on the scent.

In the hope of alarming the household, Lady Mowbray once more sought the cord of the bell.

As the heartless schemer entered the picture-gallery at the west door, with his prize under his arm, Martin and Nicholls made their appearance at the east end of the apartment: even the courage of the old groom was staggered when he beheld a figure so nearly resembling that of his old enemy the warrener. His sight was too dim and the place too obscure to enable him to discern the features—or the imposture, since the loss of the false hair and hat, would have been instantly discovered.

The butler uttered a loud groan, and fell upon his knees. Martin, although terrified, steadily advanced: a determination which proved fatal to him—for the colonel received him with a pistol-shot, which struck the old man in the side: he fell, with a deep groan, but was quickly avenged; for, whilst the assassin was feeling for the spring to open the panel, Red Ralph crept cautiously behind him, and, placing the muzzle of his weapon to the small of his back, fired the contents into his body. The vertebrae was broken—the intention of the boy had been to disable him.

Colonel Mowbray writhed upon the polished floor, like a serpent crushed in its own blood.

"I ha' hit un, Mister Beans—I ha' hit un!" exclaimed Ralph, with a triumphant shout, as Joe entered the gallery; "he can't play the ghost any more!"

The apartment was speedily crowded by the servants, whose terror had given way to the courageous example of Mrs. Jarmy. All eagerly demanded an explanation.

"Send to the rectory," said Joe, wiping the perspiration from his brow; "and remove Colonel Mowbray and poor old Martin into the library!"

"Not into the library!" exclaimed the assassin, faintly; "I cannot close my eyes in peace in the library!"

"He is thinking of his brother!" whispered Joe to the housekeeper; "go you to the apartment of Lady Mowbray—this is no scene for you; I will attend to Martin and the colonel!"

"Take me to the library, Joe!" whispered the old man; "place me in Sir William's chair—I should like to die there! Promise me!"

"I do promise you," said the young man; "but cheer up—thou mustn't die yet!"

"Soon—soon!" replied the aged groom; "but not till all is clear!"

CHAPTER CXXIX.

The dark shall be light,
The wrong made right,
And Bertrem's might,
And Bertrem's right,
Shall meet on Ellangowan's height.

GUY MANNERING.

SCARCELY had the grey-eyed morning dawned on the hills and woody vale of Carrow, before the rumour spread, not only through the village, but from farm to farm, that another murder had been perpetrated at the abbey. Men gazed upon each other, and asked what it could mean. A fatality seemed to hang over the time-honoured walls of the old mansion, doomed to witness such a succession of terrible events. No sooner did Farmer Ashton and his dame hear the intelligence than they set out at once: theirs was the agony and impatience of affection—they trembled lest their adopted son should have been the victim.

"He be safe, farmer—quite safe!" shouted Joe Beans, as he recognised the pony-chaise of his old master rattling at an unusual pace along the broad avenue. "Master Harry be in the library with rector, Colonel Butler, and the gentlefolk—not a hair of his head has been hurt!"

An involuntary "thank God!" broke from the lips of the aged couple at the intelligence.

As Joe stated, our hero, after assuring himself, in a momentary interview with the duchess, of the state of Ellen and Lady Mowbray, had joined the party in the library: he found Colonel Mowbray laid upon the sofa, sinking fast, despair and death in every feature of his terror-stricken countenance. Martin, calm and resigned, had been propped, as he desired, upon pillows in the chair of his beloved master. No sooner did he perceive his young favourite, than he feebly extended his hand, and tried to smile. Mrs. Jarmy and the rest of the servants who were standing around, could not restrain their tears.

"It will soon be over, Harry!" murmured the old man, faintly; "but something tells me that the aloe—you see I have not forgotten the name—will bloom yet!"

Our hero shook his head: his hopes of discovering the heir of his benefactor were buried in the grave of his friend Walter.

"Pray, Colonel Mowbray," said the rector, "reflect upon your dangerous state—make some atonement for the crimes you have committed—do not rush into the presence of your Maker with more crimes than those you have already committed upon your soul?"

"Is there no hope?" groaned the dying man.

The surgeons, who were standing near, assured him that there was none.

"Save me!" he said, frantically, "and I will tell everything—everything! Life—life! even at the price of infamy! I dare not die yet!"

When reluctantly convinced that his state was beyond the reach of human skill, the despairing wretch closed his eyes and maintained a dogged silence; no effort could induce him to speak.

"Hardened!" said the worthy clergyman, with a sigh—"hardened to the last! As he has lived, so will he die! May God forgive him!"

Scarcely a lip responded "amen" to the prayer, so thoroughly had his last murderous act disgusted the spectators with his crimes.

Poor Joe was like a distracted man: first consoling Susan, who had been seized with hysterics on hearing of her young lady's danger; then visiting poor Ralph in the temporary custody of the police; next called upon to answer the questions of the magistrates.

Not even at the death of Sir William had such confusion reigned throughout the Abbey of Carrow.

The door of the library, opened, and, to the astonishment of all, the widowed Lady Mowbray—notwithstanding the sufferings, both mental and bodily, which she had endured—entered the apartment, leaning on the arm of the Duchess of Devonshire. Although her cheek was deadly pale, and her whole frame so weak that she could scarcely support herself, her maternal heart was strong: she came to make a last appeal to her enemy, to give her some clue to her abandoned son.

"Walter," she said, "like you I am dying: in a few hours, perhaps, we shall both stand before the judgment seat! Something tells me that to you I owe the misery of my life—my dishonour in the eyes of the world—the loss of my dear husband's love—of my poor boy! Be generous—let me embrace the image of his father ere I die, and at the bar of heaven my prayer shall be for mercy for your crimes?"

A sneer curled the lips of Colonel Mowbray: although dying, his heart was not touched by her appeal.

"Man!" she exclaimed, sinking on her knees by the side of the sofa; "if you are human, feel for a mother's agony! It is no small bribe I offer: forgiveness of wrongs like mine! I have been driven from my home—outrage has made me steep my hands in blood!—cruelty driven me mad—do you mark me, mad! My youth a blank—my age a withered, childless solitude! One word!"

"Never!" muttered the wretched man, with a look of fiend-like malice; "the only consolation I have left me is, that my death will destroy the last hope of your existence!"

"Monster!" exclaimed a deep voice near him.

"Whose voice was that? Who spoke?"

With a painful effort, Colonel Mowbray turned his head upon the pillow, and encountered the indignant glance of Henry Ashton.

The distracted widow grasped the hand of her persecutor, and, in the most pathetic accents, conjured him to relent. But all was useless. The sight of her tears and agony seemed an alleviation to his pangs.

"You know what it is now to suffer!" he gasped. "Ha! the secret dies with me! You shall not even have the satisfaction of knowing whether your brat lives, or rots, like his father, in the grave! I loved you once," he added; "but, woman-like, you preferred the rich brother to the poor one!"

"Have you no heart?" said the rector.

"None that your sophistry can touch! I have no faith in repentance and the lies which your churchmen preach! You are right!" added the assassin, glaring on his crushed and broken-hearted victim. "The whisperings of your fancy did not deceive you! I incited the fool Lucas to believe you loved him—planned with him the scheme which lured you to your ruin! I would have seen you a dishonoured, guilty, creeping thing! That failed!" he continued, moodily; "but at least I leave you a childless one!"

"God restrain me!" exclaimed our hero, transported beyond control at the dastardly triumph of the speaker. "I shall forget the debt of friendship due to the memory of Walter, and strike the villain dead!"

"Base-born cur!" muttered the dying man.

"Who says that Henry Ashton is base-born?" demanded a tall, gentlemanly-looking personage, who had just entered the library with Colonel Butler, who had been engaged in another apartment, taking the depositions of Joe Beans and Ralph.

It was the Khan; but his appearance was so changed that, but for his voice, even his own brother, who was present, would not have recognised him. He no longer wore the dark beard which hitherto had covered half his face, and his semi-Oriental costume was discarded.

Colonel Mowbray started, and his eyes became fixed with a look of malice and impotent rage upon the speaker.

"Philip," said the farmer, extending his hand to him, "that be right! Tell the proud man that Harry be no base-born cur, but the son of an honest man! I always said thee wor wedded, like dame and I, to his mother!"

"Philip Ashton! It is Philip Ashton!" murmured old Martin. "Thank God, it will be clear at last!"

"Lady," said the Khan—for so we shall continue to call him—addressing the widow of Sir William with profound respect, "Fear not! Whatever the resolution of that bold, bad man, his malice will be impotent to harm your peace! Your son yet lives!"

A cry of joy broke from very heart of the long-suffering mother.

"And will be found worthy of your love."

"Your oath—your oath!" exclaimed Colonel Mowbray, furiously.

"Binds me only whilst you live!" calmly observed the Khan. "Fear not—it shall be kept: a few moments more or less will matter little! If the fiends can wait, so can this injured lady!"

The bitterness of the retort inflicted an additional pang upon the dying man, who would have given worlds but for a few minutes of his former strength, that he might grapple with the speaker, and bury his secret with him in the grave.

"Lift me up, Harry!" said Martin, lightly grasping his hand, "and do not leave me! My eyes grow dim—I would look upon you till the last! Give me some cordial. I must—I will not die," he added, with energy, "till after that bad man! It will bloom yet boy—the old aloe will put forth its long-promised flower at last!"

"What mean you?" exclaimed our hero, bewildered with the strange hopes and imaginings which crowded upon his brain; "do I dream?"

"All will be clear soon. I told you it would."

The aged groom swallowed the cordial which Mrs. Jarmy held to his lips, his eyes all the while fixed with an expression of intense earnestness upon the countenance of Colonel Mowbray, who was sinking fast.

"Keep me up!"—he kept repeating—"keep me up! I shall outlast him yet! For my dear master's sake, heaven will give me strength—I feel it will!"

It was a moment of anxious expectation to all. The assassin gradually sinking, and yet from time to time making furious efforts to rally his departing strength; the Khan calm and observant, standing at the foot of the sofa, regarding him.

Lady Mowbray half fainting from excitement, was seated at the opposite end of the room, facing Martin. Occasionally her glance encountered that of Henry Ashton, and her widowed heart beat with newly-awakened emotions.

"Should it be!" she whispered to the duchess; "should it be so?"

Her sympathising friend pressed her hand in silence.

The death struggle, preceded by the rattle in the throat, relieved them at length from their long agony of suspense. Colonel Mowbray expired: the last words upon his lips, a curse—his last look, one of mingled defiance and hatred.

"Dead!" said the surgeon; "gone to his account at last!"

At the words, Martin pressed the hand of our hero yet more firmly.

"I knew I should outlive the rascal—I felt I should!" he said; "all will now be bright and clear at last!"

(To be continued in our next.)

LET US LOVE ONE ANOTHER.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

LET us love one another,—not long may we stay;
In this bleak world of mourning some droop while 'tis day,
Others fade in their noon, and few linger till eve:
Oh! there breaks not a heart but leaves some one to grieve;
And the fondest, the purest, the truest that met,
Have still found the need to forgive and forget!
Then, ah! though the hopes that we nourished decay,
Let us love one another as long as we stay.

There are hearts, like the Ivy, though all be decayed
That it seemed to clasp fondly in sunlight and shade;
No leaves droop in sadness, still gaily they spread,
Undim'd midst the blighted, the lonely and dead:
But the mistletoe clings to the oak, not in part,
But with leaves closely round it—the root in its heart;
Exists but to twine it,—imbibe the same dew,—
Or to fall with its lov'd oak, and perish there too.

Thus, let's love one another 'midst sorrows the worst,
Unaltered and fond, as we lov'd at the first;
Though the false wing of pleasure may change and forsake,
And the bright urn of wealth into particles break,
There are some sweet affections that wealth cannot buy,
That cling but still closer when sorrow draws nigh,
And remain with us yet, though all else pass away;
Thus, let's love one another as long as we stay.

A STRANGE STORY.

M. de M——, who has lately died, was one of three brothers—two of whom were partners in the firm, the other living a quiet, pious life on his estate, some little distance from Paris, on the road to Orleans. The latter had often been pressed by his brothers to take a share in the business, but had always declined leaving his solitude for the anxieties and cares under which, in the midst of the greatest prosperity, rich capitalists were always suffering. His philosophy would seem to have been the true one, for he obtained the hand of Mdlle. H., a relation of the Duchess De Fleury, and at that time the richest heiress in all France: so that in a moment he found himself richer by far than the brothers who had been struggling for so many years to amass all the wealth they so much prized. This advance in his position was not beheld without envy by his elders. More than ever did he become the object of attack to induce him to join his capital with theirs—but still without success. Peace, and the quiet of domestic life, had more charms for him than power or high rank, and he still remained at his chateau on the road to Orleans. Meanwhile the revolution of July broke out in that part of the country, as we all remember, with a revolutionary character—for M. Philippe de M. became somehow the object of the most insane and unaccountable persecution amongst the peasantry; and the threatnings of vengeance became at last so formidable that the family resolved to remove to some other province till the storm had blown over.

The very night before they carried this plan into operation, the chateau was attacked by a band of brigands, who set fire to the building, and, without any apparent desire for pillage, completely devastated the whole domain, murdering with the most savage fury all who attempted resistance, and destroying without mercy whatever fell beneath their hands. M. Philippe de M—— and his wife both fell in the affray—the one shot through the heart in defending the entrance to the chateau; the other perished in the flames, while attempting, in vain, to escape from the burning pile. The eldest child, a boy six years of age, fell by her side, and was seen no more, and none of the family remained to tell the tale but one little girl of three years old, who remained thus sole heiress to one of the finest properties in the kingdom.

The trial, which took place when quiet was restored, made a great noise at the time, on account of the high position of the brothers of the victim in Paris; but no fact was elicited which could throw a light upon the real culprits. Two men were frequently mentioned during the examination of witnesses as being the foremost in the attack—both of high stature, and both wearing black leather masks, in imitation of the black band of '93. These individuals were never discovered, and the whole inquiry terminated, as usual, in the condemnation of one or two idiots who had been taken on the spot, and could give no account of why they were there, and the public eulogium pronounced by the Advocate-General upon the conduct of the nurse, who had at once made off to the fields with her little charge, and thus saved the only scion of this wealthy family. It was natural enough that such a circumstance should make impression on the two brothers M——, and that both should seek to have the guardianship of the child so miraculously saved. She was confided to the elder of the two, who soon adopted her with as much fondness as though she had been his own.

A few years ago rumour spoke of the intended marriage of the rich heiress with her cousin, the son of Adrien M——, but was soon hushed by the formal refusal of the guardian to consent to the union. Soon after this, in the beginning of 1850, the city was shaken by the news of the tragical end of Adrien M——, who was found hanging to the staple which had just been fixed in the wall of his bed-room, to receive the superb Rubens for which he had given two hundred thousand francs the day before. His son died some little while since, and the heiress remained unmarried, in order to soothe the old age of her dear, good uncle. We thought we had done with the M—— family, when lo! it comes a new event which completes the drama in all its parts. The good old uncle died lately, in the arms of his dear adopted child, leaving a sealed confession for her perusal. By this statement he avows himself the murderer of her father, declaring the two men in masks, beheld at the attack of the chateau, to have been himself and his brother Adrien; that the attack was planned by the latter in order to inherit the property, and that their disappointment had been great indeed, when the discovery of the escape of the nurse had been made public. Remorse had prevented him from pursuing his plan of extermination further. He had suffered the child to live, and owned that he had been blessed in her affection and gratitude. He could not consent to the marriage with his nephew for his soul's sake, and was sorry that his refusal should have caused his brother Adrien to commit suicide. The confession concludes by begging the prayers of his adopted child, and advises her retirement to a convent, that she may take example from him how little avail riches and honour when compared to the soul's peace; and calls upon her to remember how often he would sit sad and sorrowful amidst every blessing which this world could give. The conclusion is more admirable, and strictly in accordance with the character of the man. It is thought that the family will lean upon these few last lines of the confession to put in a plea of insanity, and thus invoke disbelief; but the Abbé De C——, who attended the miserable sinner in his last moments, will not give testimony to that effect. The truth of this story is beyond a doubt.

WALMSLEY'S STEAM JACQUARD LOOM.]

SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION
IN DUBLIN.

THE JACQUARD LOOM.

THE pecuniary success of this brilliant undertaking has been confirmed beyond all doubt; Mr. Dargan has been honoured by his countrymen as a national benefactor, and royalty has shed its inspiring influence over the beautiful City of Dublin.

All this is extremely gratifying—it belongs to the poetical department of the success of the affair; but those who take a higher interest in such large displays of industry and art, will look for more substantial results. They will naturally anticipate the mind to have been purified by the exhibition of gems in painting and art; but that will not be sufficient—it will not be a satisfactory return for such a large outlay of time, money, and expectation. The sentiment evoked by a feast of beauty is not the most substantial of food. The Great Dublin Exhibition must lead to something else, or it will have failed in the performance of its practical mission and purpose. Nothing short of its having awakened hope in the heart of Ireland will satisfy its best supporters.

Individually we have every reason to believe that it will be the means of conferring upon the Irish people a permanent good; but we are afraid that their vivid imaginations will lead them captive; they will adore the beautiful and overlook the useful. Absorbed in admiration of a fine painting, a rare gem, an exquisitely tinted vase, they will fail in their appreciation of the more humble-looking but really more valuable articles by their side.

The Machinery Hall teaches more eloquent lessons than the Fine Arts Repository, although some of the presentations are hallowed by the generosity of the noblest and most intellectual in the United Kingdom. It teaches solemn lessons in the language of genius. Its ensemble is a fine exposition of the aims and purposes of profitable, civilising industry. As Coleridge would have expressed himself, in dumb significance it asks—and then, in the words of another poet, we should have had the memorable reply—

Who's born for sloth?

To some we find
The ploughshare's annual toil assigned;
Some at the sounding anvil glow;
Some, the swift sliding shuttle throw;
Some, studious of the wind and tide,
From pole to pole our commerce guide;
While some of genius more refined,
With head and tongue assist mankind.
Each aiming at one common end,
Proves to the whole a needful friend.
In every rank, or great or small,
'Tis industry supports us all.

Unless the Exhibition fixes this belief in the mind of the hard-working Irish people, it will not have accomplished anything very great. It is the proper division of labour that makes a country wealthy. And the greater diversity there is in labour, the greater the national wealth and prosperity. Glance round this Machinery Hall inquiringly, and the substantial glories of labour are revealed in astonishing profusion. The iron used gave employment to thousands; a portion of it came from Germany and Sweden; the copper, lead, and tin were equally beneficial in its raising; the quicksilver came from the mines of Hungary and Spain; the wood from Canada, South America, the East Indies, and even remote Siam, where the teak-tree grows to such magnificent proportions. But then the amount of labour expended on the bare material is extraordinary, and the good effected by the distribution and circulation of the money which that labour had earned is still more wonderful. The application, however, of these mechanical agents thus collected together and manipulated into endless varieties of form, and adapted to the most gigantic, as well as the most minute purposes, constitutes the especial glory of this part of the Exhibition. Here we behold what the metals, fashioned by the hands and heads of genius, and supplied with motive power by steam, the product of the joint contributions of coal and water, can accomplish for the advancement and salvation of mankind.

Look at that improved Jacquard loom, originally the invention of the Frenchman whose name it bears. The operator has before him a mass of cords, like the curtain of a pianoforte. He is engaged in "reading in from the draught"—which is the pattern of the article he is producing, drawn and painted on dried paper. The cords he skilfully ties into a pattern, supported by a slip of wood. He then, with nimble fingers, separates the cords by threes, by sevens, by twelves, according to the patterns, and threads them through the string which is to tie them apart. The skill with which he feels out his cords is very remarkable; but it is not so complicated a process as may be imagined. The reader has only to deal with one chapter or series of movements at a time. The Jacquard cords are tied together to begin again, and there is a revolution of the cords, and a repetition of the pattern, until the piece of silk, ribbon, carpet, or whatever he may be engaged upon, is finished.

In silk mills where many of these looms are at work, the scene is almost grand. Floor above floor, with a long room in each, is occupied, and the looms in each are set as close as they can work—leaving only a narrow passage between. Looking down upon the details, there is plenty of beauty. The transverse cords of the looms, and their shafts and beams, are so uniform as to produce the impression which symmetry, on a large scale, always gives. The gorgeous silk, depending like a veil from the backs of the looms, shows its glossy colours in the softened light; while, to make the scene more life-like, the shuttles fly to and fro, and the pattern grows, as it were, and is transferred to a barrel, which, winding slowly round, receives the fabric as it is finished. And then the silk employed gives rise to endless thought. The supply seems a miracle. China, India, Turkey, Italy, France, all attend to the cultivation of the mulberry-tree, and the breeding of the insect that produces the delicate material.

In Lombardy the peasantry, during the whole month of May, gather the leaves of the mulberry-tree, and if the houses in the villages are visited then, the worms will be found busy at work spinning—spinning—ever spinning. But it is so tiny an insect, that if we were in imagination to travel from country to country, traverse the broad belt round the globe where the little worm is forming its cocoons, we should be at a loss to know how sufficient silk is produced to supply the wants of the world. But within the wide realm of potent industry there are many such marvels. That loom, working so steadily, and producing so abundantly, is in itself a marvel. There is magic in its action—for it and its kindred have woven a colossal magnificence for England in less than half a century; and in this and other countries is doing more for the good and glory of mankind than all the warriors, politicians, and philosophers that ever fought and brawled their way across the platform of life. It is the type of unceasing labour, of intellect, of mental glory, sanctified by influences God-like in their origin, purpose, and end. And if Ireland would but exchange the pen of the polemist for the loom of the weaver, and the senseless clamours of agitators for the buzzing and whirling of a factory in full work, she would soon take her allotted place in the march of civilisation, and no longer offer to the empire the scandal of feeding other lands with the best portion of her population, while her own soil is being strangely neglected, and those other industrial resources which she could command in rich profusion, suffered to remain in cold abeyance, or consigned to the dark desuetude of an awful indifference.

THE LAST THROW OF THE DICE.

Two or three years ago, the Marquis Angelo Foscari was induced, by ill-health and longing for change of scene, to visit Dieppe. He was a noble of Genoa, where his name had long been honoured, ere that proud City had fallen from her high and palmy state. He was accompanied by the Signora Teresa, the only surviving offspring of three marriages.

This young lady possessed beauty—exquisite, brilliant, dazzling. Her complexion was that clear olive, through which the blush of maiden purity suffuses itself in a bloom delicate and soft as that of the Provence rose. Her eyes were dark, full, flashing, yet often relieved by a subduing softness. Her dark hair well accorded with her complexion, clime, and youth: its silken tresses fell upon a neck of exquisite roundness, and were worn so as to show the pale, high brow. Delicately pencilled was the arched outline of her eye-brows. From her profile, you would think that you beheld the classic contour of some Athenian beauty—the true model of the graceful forms with which the Grecian sculptors delighted that period as they bewilder this. Then her lips, so beautifully distinct rather than separate, just as if they were about to breathe forth those impulse-words which the lover delights to hear. And when she did speak, how sweetly fell the music of her voice! like the far-off melody, distant but distinct, which floats upon the waters, while the air is hushed to silence, only broken by the amorous Echo, which faintly repeats them, loth to think such silvery sounds should die. In the rudest crowd, in the noisiest din, Teresa's gentle accents came refreshingly upon the senses, and immediately commanded that hushed attention which is the best tribute of respect that Woman can conceive. But, beyond this—beyond the perfect form and the graceful beauty, which made, as it were, a visible atmosphere around her—her mind, naturally intelligent, had been cultivated with no common care. She had numerous accomplishments. She had read much; she had enjoyed the familiar conversation of many men of letters and science in different countries; she had experienced the advantages of far-extended travel: in short, she was charming, alike in mind and person.

The marquis, her father, was very proud of her beauty and accomplishments; yet to him she long had been the cause of bitter vexation. He prided himself on his high descent, and constantly cherished deep and unavailing regrets, because, from want of a surviving male heir, a title would expire in his own person, which, originally won by the sword in a hard-fought field of fame, had been lineally transmitted through many centuries, without a stain once resting on its ermine. He would have given all his fortune—he would have fed upon water and a crust—he would have laid down his own life, or even sacrificed that of his daughter, great as was his wayward and fitful love for her—to have a son, by whom the proud name and honours of Foscari might be saved from extinction. To perpetuate them was with him a passion: the failure of that engrossing desire almost drove him to despair, and at times appeared almost to peril the sanity of his mind.

The Marquis Angelo Foscari had been born to extensive possessions, and had much augmented them by advantageous marriages. Before he had attained the age of fifty, he was the widower of two noble Roman dames, and had also followed to the grave a lady closely allied to the Imperial house of Austria. Of all his children, only one had survived, and he cursed his fate, and gnashed his teeth, in his splendid solitude, as he thought that this sole survivor was only a daughter. Years rolled on. The excitements of public life lost their power. The snow of age blanched his hair. The track of time traced wrinkles on his brow. The freshness of his heart was in the tomb of his buried youth. He felt that, with swift and noiseless advances, death was pressing forward. He had a fever-dread of the mere thought of the final hour, which was to hurry him from time to eternity. So, to diminish care—to employ his weary hours—to banish ennui—to create a new excitement for his palled spirit—to dissipate the ever-present dread of death—the last of the Foscarini plunged headlong into the vortex of society, as wildly as if the world was only just opening for his enjoyment: and thus he strove to conquer care by revelry.

In this, after all, no harm. To some minds Society may be safer and better than Solitude. But the marquis did not care for mere pleasure—he craved excitement. He found it in play. He grew accustomed to stake wealth on the cast of the die, and thus spent long nights. At first he played merely to divert his thoughts, and used to amuse himself by watching the anxious faces around him, and the varying passions developed, as the game went on. Soon, however, he came to have an interest in success or failure. Fortune turned against him, and he then he almost blushed to find himself doubling the stakes and calculating the chances, and eagerly anticipating the result of each cast. Still he went on, and still, though he sometimes won, his losses were frequent and heavy. Then he resolved to play boldly—as he heard that timid gamblers rarely win—and he would be content with getting back his losses. If, at times, the thought of his daughter came into his mind, he would still the intruding recollection with a "Tush! she is but a woman—a girl! There will be enough for her. What could a child of eighteen do with all my palaces—my jewels—my pictures—my gold? I hoarded wealth, long ago, for my heir; now, I have none: let it go as it may! Come on—come on—it is in vain to think of it! Perhaps I may die to-morrow. There will be enough left for the girl."

Teresa was aware of her father's reckless way of living. He had not taken any pains to conceal it from her. Wholly regardless of how he wounded her sensitive feelings, he incessantly complained, in her presence as in her absence, of his bitter disappointment at not having a surviving son, and cursed himself for his ill fortune. Teresa was all gentleness and love—for she had warm affections, and never forgot that he was her father—but her love made slight impression on a heart which hourly appeared to become more ossified. But gentleness and love cannot always be repulsed. They have a power which, at times, can pierce even a heart of adamant. Never yet have they been exercised without some good result. When the marquis saw his fair daughter weeping bitterly, her hands clasped in most unfeigned sorrow, her cheek pale with emotion—when he heard her beseech him to bestow kind words upon her, and implore pardon for the involuntary crime of being a woman—he would cease his reproaches and complainings, and, looking with tenderness and admiration on the graceful form thus bowed in humble entreaty before him, would press a father's kiss upon her head, and abruptly leave the room, as if afraid that his awakened love might pour forth its strong emotions in words.

In fact, though he very often treated her harshly, the marquis did love Teresa. Not, indeed, with pure paternal love—for the better part of the father was buried with the son who, long since, had died in youth; but he loved her because she was a being of whose beauty, grace, and accomplishments he felt very proud. On that account he obliged her to accompany him in his travels—on that account he had refused the richest offers for her hand which the admiring nobles of Italy and Germany had made. With him Pride was the first and the last. That passion made him delight to exhibit in society the daughter who would, otherwise, have remained in her convent, or, under the care of a duenna, in one of their lonely country villas. While she was with him, the object of universal admiration, the attention she excited gratified his pride. She was his, and the admiration bestowed upon her was reflected upon him. "Remain with me yet a little longer," he would sometimes say; "it will be time enough for you to wed when the old man dies."

At Dieppe he plunged into revelry yet deeper than Teresa remembered him to have yet yielded to, and indulged in excesses alike unsuited to his advancing years and his failing health. To the fatal temptations of the gaming table he now devoted the greater part of every night; and, though naturally of the most temperate habits, like other children of "the warm South," he had now learned to indulge in the free use of wine. It was his custom to bathe in the sea every morning, and thus recruit his strength for the exhausting pleasures of the night. It chanced, one morning, when the sea was more boisterous and his frame more enervated than usual, that, being overpowered by a monstrous wave, he was dashed against the beach, breathless and fainting. The next retreating rush of the waters would have borne him out into the midst of the eddying current, without the power of resistance, if a young man, who happened to be bathing near the spot, had not dashed forward and rescued him. Foscarini, on his recovery, recognised his preserver as a young officer whom he had met at Vienna, and whose attentions to Teresa had been so well received by her as to cause him some uneasiness. Yet to this gentleman he now owed his life. So, when the German asked permission to wait upon him at his hotel, to inquire after his health, common courtesy dictated an assent, however constrained and cold.

The young German officer was more than ever in love with Teresa: but two years had passed since he last had seen her, and he was too expert in the ways of the world to betray that love, as he once before had done. He met and accosted Teresa without any apparent emotion, and the marquis, narrowly watching both of them, was happy to perceive that she received him without much embarrassment. He paid the usual compliments of society with easy politeness, and Teresa returned them in the same manner. From all this, Foscarini did not hesitate to believe that though the young man might once have entertained a passion for Teresa, it had long since died away, from absence and hopelessness. He did not know that, from the time she quitted Vienna, Teresa had contrived to correspond with Stephen Utercliv; and that his presence in Dieppe was caused by her desire that he should join her in a little plot against her father—for his good.

Convinced that nothing was now to be apprehended, the marquis speedily abandoned the reserve with which at first he had received Stephen Utercliv. In a short time they became great friends. By degrees, the marquis even formed an attachment for this young man, made him the confidant of his secret cares, told him how he had plunged into the excitement of gaming in order to dissipate bitter thoughts, and laid bare before him all the wretchedness of heart which he endeavoured to hide from the world beneath the mask of gaiety. And thus Stephen soon thoroughly knew the past and present life of the marquis; his baffled hopes, his secret griefs, his perpetual regrets, his remorse for time and talents wasted.

Teresa had also revealed to him all that she knew,—much which he could use as the key to the old man's heart. Long since she had given her young affection to Stephen Utercliv. Her chief desire now was to draw her father from the debasing pursuits which injured the health of mind and body, and threatened the total ruin of his fortunes.

Stephen had now become so necessary to the marquis, that he spent every evening in his company. Humouring his eagerness for play, he joined him at the gaming-table, and speedily became as adventurous a gambler as any in Dieppe. In a short time they ceased to play at the public table, and made use of a private room, in which, instead of adventurous playing against the bank, they might play against each other, allowing the bank a percentage on the stakes. In this manner the marquis and Stephen Utercliv now played, one against the other, and, in a month, Utercliv had drawn the full amount of his letters of credit, having lost all to the marquis. He told this to Teresa, mentioning that he could readily arrange to receive further remittances from Vienna; but she was afraid that, in the interval, her father might return to the public table, and then again become the prey of sharpers. She therefore insisted on supplying Stephen with money—which, however, he lost. The more he lost, the better pleased was Foscarini—for he could now find happiness in winning that gold which had once been the slave of his will, but now was the ruler of her heart. Meanwhile, however, he abandoned his indulgence in wine, and was by no means as much disposed to play as when he had formerly lost largely. Success had moderated his excitement.

There is a German game called brelau, of which the marquis was very fond. He apprised Stephen of his predilection, and the German lost no time in discovering that it was one of the most interesting games in the world. Up to this time he had lost above ten thousand Napoleons, when, one evening, he came to Foscarini with a mind determined on its course of action. He brought fifty Napoleons with him—all that he could then procure. This was the last money that Teresa could give him. The marquis had always made her a very splendid allowance, and she had never spent the whole of it. The lovers' plot had been to keep the marquis at play with Utercliv alone. They expected that the smiles of fortune would have been somewhat equally distributed, at least. But their hope had been too sanguine. Instead of alternate good fortune, which, while it amused the marquis, would really not diminish his wealth, there had been a constant run of ill luck against Stephen Utercliv. When he had taken the last fifty Napoleons from Teresa, his words were, "Fortune opposes our good intentions. One trial—one more trial. If I lose this, I play no more. I shall explain all to your father, demand you in marriage, and if he should refuse me, you see no more of me until his death leaves you free." Teresa allowed him to embrace her, and shed many tears at his departure, for she dreaded that her father would reject the suit of her lover, and she knew him well enough to dread that he would keep his resolution of not seeing her until she had the freedom of action of which he spoke.

When Stephen Utercliv went to the salon, a little later than usual, he found that the marquis, tired of waiting for him, had gone to play at the public table. Thither he went, and found every one in a state of high excitement. Fortune had at length come round to the marquis, and he won, whatever colour he backed. Encouraged by this success, he continued to play, with largely increased stakes. At last, when he remained the only player, he challenged the bank. After some deliberation, his defiance was accepted. He backed one colour, and an uninterrupted series of successes, doubling the stakes each time in arithmetical progression, left him at last largely the conqueror. He had broken the bank, and had thus, by one coup, regained all his former losses at Dieppe, and swept away the greater part of the gamblers' capital.

Flushed with this success, the marquis quitted the salon, inviting Stephen Utercliv to accompany him to supper at his hotel, also extending his hospitality to four players who, in the early part of the evening, had played with him at the public table. He had no difficulty in obtaining their company. They consisted of two planters from the Havannah, the captain of an English merchantman, and a Parisian banker. After supper, cards were introduced. The marquis and Stephen Utercliv were opponents, as usual. Stephen commenced with ten Napoleons: that stake soon disappeared, as did three others of the same amount. He had only ten pieces left. He was full of agitation. Foscarini, never dreaming how nearly his young friend approached to extremity, rallied him upon the lowness of his stakes. With a trembling hand, the young man placed the remnant of his money on the table. Fortune favoured him with a pair-royal of kings, and he won a hundred Napoleons from the Parisian banker. Luck continued, and, by five o'clock the next morning, Stephen Utercliv had gained 200,000 francs, the banker had won 80,000, the Englishman 20,000, and each of the planters, 5000. This made nearly £13,000 in our money. Foscarini had lost it all. He pulled hard upon his gains in the previous part of the evening. The party took coffee and separated, agreeing to resume the play at night.

Night came, and the morning's play was child's sport in comparison with what now came on. The other guests, after losing a great portion of their previous winnings, remained simply as spectators, the marquis and Stephen Utercliv alone continuing to play. It would be tiresome to trace the gradual and heavy losses of the marquis. First went all his ready money, then followed his ancestral palace at Genoa, his Florentine casino, his Roman villa, his estates in Austria, his pictures, his hereditary jewels. All—all were staked and lost. Yet he played on until the day dawned, and awoke him to a sense of the utter ruin he had made. The pale light of the morning struck into the room, and played upon the wall in striking contrast to the dim glare of the expiring tapers. The marquis looked more like a statue than a human, living being. The gold was piled up in heaps, bonds, and contracts, and parchments, lay beside them.

Fearfully appalling was the expression of the old man's countenance. He found himself stripped of everything. Fixing his bloodshot eyes upon Stephen Utercliv, he said, in a tone which sounded like the menacing mutterings of a thunder-storm:

"Sir, all that I have lost is yours! I trust that I shall find you a most gentle creditor. The other players, who had the prudence to withdraw early, have won a very trifle; but you—houses, lands, jewels, pictures, gold—all, even to the very watch which tells me the hour, are passed away. At this moment you may say—perhaps you will say: 'Old man, that you can break your fast to-day will be wholly owing to my bounty, for you have nothing of your own.'"

"But allow me—"

"Allow me, sir, to speak. I have lost my wealth—all; but perhaps my years and these grey hairs may entitle me to be heard. Perhaps you would command my absence? Perhaps you are anxious to count the sum of your new wealth? You may—"

"Indeed, sir—"

"Again, I say, let me speak! I think we met at Vienna! I think, young man, that then I gave you to understand that your attentions to my daughter were not acceptable to me?"

"My dear sir—"

"You loved my daughter, then? Deny it not! I heard you swear, on bended knees, to love her always! I had the power to say then, and I did say, 'Love her not!' But you did love her! Did you not?"

"Yes!"

"I thought so! Do you still love her? Speak with your lips what the changing hues of your face have already told me! Young man, do you still love my daughter?"

"As I love my life!"

"It is well! I am not wholly beggared! I had forgotten one jewel—and the richest! I have one stake left! I WILL PLAY FOR MY DAUGHTER!"

At this strange proposal, made with all the measured calmness of despair, all the rest of the party started on their feet in utter astonishment; and it was evident, from their looks, that they did not wish Stephen to accept it. The young man's face lighted up with a most joyous expression. He could have thrown himself into the arms of the marquis; but nothing could surpass the hauteur with which he was repulsed. Still, not perceiving that his late opponent had become a bitter enemy, Stephen Utercliv drew himself up to his full height, and said, in a grave and dignified manner:

"Sir, if you will have me for a son-in-law, here, at this moment, I humbly say, in the presence of these gentlemen, take back all that Chance has robbed you of! I fear, from your looks, that I do entreat in vain?"

"Indeed you do!" exclaimed the marquis, passionately. There was silence for some minutes.

"Well, then," said Stephen, "I accept your proposal! I will stake whatever you may think fit to name!"

The bystanders uttered a murmur of horror. Foscarini glanced at them with stern contempt. He turned to Stephen, and said:

"Whatever sum you please!"

"I will stake against your daughter all that I have here won from you—all that I possess in the world besides, even to the reversion of the heritage which will descend to me from my father!"

"It is well!" said the marquis.

They sat down.

"I am tired of the cards!" said the marquis. "Permit me to propose that we try our fortunes, this time, with the dice?"

"As you please!" answered Utercliv.

"And to give variety, suppose that the winner shall be he whose single cast has the lowest number?"

"As you wish!" answered Utercliv.

"Then," said the marquis, apparently as unconcerned as if he was about to play for a five-franc piece, "as I am the challenger, I think I should have the first throw! It is rather a disadvantage!"

He took up the dice-box, gaily rattled the dice, and then made the cast.

"By Jove," said the English captain, "that's a good throw! The marquis has thrown aces! The marquis wins Fifty to one on the marquis!"

"The real odds are not quite so much!" said the marquis. "Besides, M. Utercliv may throw aces also; and then, as there would be a tie, we must throw again, and the chances would be even!"

"No great chance," said the captain, "that he will throw aces! Now, if the marquis had thrown seven, it would be a different thing! There are more chances that seven will turn up, on two dice of sixes, than any other number. Seize-ace make seven; so do cinq-deuce; so do quatre-trois! To make a cinq, you can only have quatre-ace and trois-deuce; and for a quatre we have only deuces, or trav-ace!"

"You are quite learned in these matters!" said Utercliv, taking the box.

"Why," answered the captain, "as we sometimes play hazard in England—to say nothing of backgammon—Hoyle stands next to hand with us, like the "Post Office Directory," and the "Red Book," on the desk or library-table!"

As Stephen's acquaintance with English literature did not extend to these valuable hand-books, he merely bowed to the captain and rattled the dice.

He threw them.

The dice had accidentally fallen in an odd position. One of them had lodged on the top of the other. It was an ace. Thus only one actually appeared as Stephen Utercliv's cast. The marquis gently raised the topmost die. The second die, strangely enough, was an ace also.

"You must throw again," said the captain, "that cast is no cast, as both dice did not show."

"No," lisped the Parisian banker, who had some experience at Frescati's, "I think that as the marquis has raised the die, and shown the second die to be also an ace, it must be considered that aces have been shown, and it must be taken as a tie. Both gentlemen must throw again."

"Certainly not," said the captain. "I have played five thousand hits of backgammon in England, to say nothing of hazard; and when the die lodges, the caster throws the dice over again, but the other throw stands."

"Sir," said the marquis, addressing Stephen Utercliv, "neither of these gentlemen have spoken correctly. You have won the throw. The agreement was clear—that the thrower of the lowest number should win. I threw aces. You, more fortunate, have thrown a single ace. The game is yours."

Fearful that some dreadful scene might follow, the bystanders prepared to depart. The marquis was calm. They did not see that it was the calmness of despair. They paid their parting respects to him, which he acknowledged with his usual stately-courtesy. But they paused, as they were at the door, for they saw that the father who had just lost his child on the cast of a die, was subdued to tears.

Stephen drew near to him, and said, in the most conciliatory manner:

"My dear marquis, consider all that has passed between us as but a dream. You are not a loser, nor am I a winner."

"I not a loser? Ask these gentlemen whether I have lost nothing. Look at your own rich spoils on that table, and say that you have won nothing! Think that I have lost my honour—that I have lost my own self-esteem—that I have put up my child as a gambler's last desperate stake, and say that I have lost nothing! Not a word! Think not I mean to excite your compassion. Thank God, a Foscarini need not stoop so low as that! No, if my manner—if my tears say so, then my manner and my tears do belie me."

He advanced to the door. Before he could reach it he had fallen down. Strong agitation had overcome him. The old man was insensible—a paralytic stroke had made him incapable of motion, mind and body.

Immediate assistance was afforded. In a few weeks the marquis was pronounced out of danger. In little more than a month from the attack he was once more convalescent, though much shaken, and received no visitors. His daughter, who was unwearied in her attendance on him, noticed, with sorrow, that, since his illness, his whole manner had changed. He had no idea that she was aware of what had occurred on the last occasion when he had played with Stephen Utercliv. He felt now that something remained for him to do, and he nerved himself to do it.

Utercliv had gone to a soirée, and on returning to the hotel in which he resided, the porter informed him that two persons were in his apartments, and—it now being midnight—had there been waiting for some time. On entering the room, he saw the marquis and his daughter.

"No doubt my presence here at this late hour is a surprise to you," said Foscarini, deliberately. "However, this interview would have taken place before, if it had not pleased heaven, as you know, to afflict me with sudden and severe illness. My first visit was due to you, sir; gambling debts," he added, with a bitter smile, "must be paid. I come to discharge mine. Sir, you have won my daughter. She is here. I bring her to you. I have used no force to conduct her hither. She accompanied me of her own free will. Did you not, Teresa?"

He spoke with a cold sneer upon his lips. His daughter could not answer for her tears.

After a brief delay, in which he appeared to reflect on what he should say, he resumed:

"She is yours. I have no longer a daughter. But you, mark me—you have not yet a wife. I will never acknowledge you as a son-in-law. Whoever weds my daughter, must be of noble lineage—you, Sir, are nobody."

"Let me assure you that you are mistaken," said Stephen Utercliv. "I have not hitherto spoken of my family, but I am sure that it is in every respect entitled to rank with your own."

"Not until my death," continued the marquis, not heeding Utercliv's observation, "can Teresa be your wife. Not before, because she would not do anything contrary to my wish. However, you won the stake, and here she is." And as he said this, he took Teresa by the hand, and presented her to Utercliv.

Immediately he went to the door, turned the key in the lock, and fixed the bolt. He rushed back into the middle of the room.

"Now for revenge!" he shouted, in a terrible voice, and with the fiery glance and infuriated gesture of a maniac. He produced a pair of pistols. "Mark me!—both of these weapons are unloaded. I will load one of them. You see that I have put in the powder. Let me now drive the ball firmly down. It is done. We will confound these weapons together, so that neither can know which is loaded. There. I do not know which holds the deadly charge. One of us will know at once. We will each take a pistol, present it at the breast, and pull the trigger at the same moment. If I slay you, I dare say that my daughter will return home with me—for it is scarcely possible that you can have disposed of her by testament. If you kill me, Teresa may wed her father's slayer—if she will!"

While the marquis had been busied with the pistols, and while he had been speaking, Stephen Utercliv had steadily kept his eyes upon him, confident that his mind was affected, and undecided what to do or say. He knew that a maniac is best controlled by quiet firmness. He therefore listened with calmness to what the marquis said, in the hope, too, that his passion might exhaust itself in vehement language. Now, when the marquis ceased to speak, Stephen again made an effort to reason with him.

"Your daughter," said he, "belongs not to you nor to me. In a moment of excitement you risked her upon the hazard of the dice. I do not claim her because the cast was in my favour. I would hope that, when you examine my pretensions, you will find that, in family and in fortune, I am not inferior to yourself. I love your daughter, and would be content to leave to her the decision on which depends my future happiness. As for the losses which you sustained, I have not taken advantage of them. Your money, your papers, your securities, are in yonder desk, at your command whenever you please to receive them. I played with you not for gain, but in the hope of weaning you from play, or, if that unhappy passion continued, of letting you feel its evil effects. I fancied that if I could make you believe that you were ruined, the effect of the reverse would be beneficial, and then that, when your fortune was restored to you, I might hope to be repaid by your sanction for my attachment to Teresa."

"Name her not!" shouted the marquis. "Move one step—utter one word, and I fire into my daughter's heart. Sit down!"

With strength to which his fury now added vehement power, the marquis forced Utercliv into a chair. He seated himself in another, immediately opposite. There they sat—so close that Stephen felt his hot breath upon his face. He thrust one of the pistols into Stephen's hand. Teresa, moveless as a statue—paralysed by fear—remained standing within a few feet of her father and her lover. She was wholly incapable of action or speech, and looked on, like one astonished.

"Now," cried the marquis, "comes on the last scene of the melodrama! The devoted lover, the stony-hearted father, the beautiful daughter, all are on the stage, and one little click of the trigger will give the dénouement. Now, sir, you have your weapon! Thus I raise mine, and when I count three, I shall fire. You may do the same."

With an involuntary impulse, Stephen raised his hand—that which held the pistol.

"One—two—three."

Instantly the marquis pulled the trigger —

Stephen Utercliv and the marquis were seated opposite each other, pistol in hand, only one of the weapons being loaded, and neither of the combatants knowing which held it. The marquis pulled the trigger, and the pistol missed fire: thanks to his using flints instead of percussion caps. Overcome by excitement, the old man fell back in his seat: he had fainted. M. Utercliv unlocked the door, had the marquis conveyed to his chamber, to which a brain fever confined him for many weeks. On his recovery, Stephen Utercliv solicited and obtained an interview. He succeeded in convincing the marquis that he was neither an adventurer nor a fortune-hunter, but the only son of a Polish nobleman, whose family had settled at Vienna, on the first partition of Poland, in 1772, and was not inferior in blood or wealth to the Foscarini, even in the proudest days of Genoa. A great change had passed over the mind of the marquis during his recent sufferings. He looked back on the past with horror, believing that his previous conduct had exhibited insanity rather than any other motive: a belief shared by all who were cognisant of the circumstances. As a reparation, he not only consented to the marriage of M. Utercliv with Teresa, but hastened it by every means in his power. Within three months, therefore, of the events which we have related, the espousal took place; and, in another month—rather happily, we think for his son-in-law—the marquis shuffled off this mortal coil.

AN EVENING PARTY AT DAMASCUS.

DURING the summer evenings my relative, at whose house I was staying, gave frequent entertainments to his friends and acquaintances amongst the inhabitants of Damascus. On these occasions, the ladies of the different families honoured us with their presence, and occasionally some of the European consuls and merchants were invited.

A description of one evening party will describe the whole.

First, then, we will introduce the stranger into the house where the farah (feast) is to be held. Women are busily occupied in washing out and sweeping the courtyard; the flowers and other plants are fresh watered; the marble fountain is decorated with coloured lanterns and festoons of flowers; carpets are spread, and divan cushions ranged against the walls; the mistaba is tastefully lighted, and a highly inflammable torch, composed of the fat wood of fir, resin, and other ingredients, is planted in each of the four corners. In the smoking apartment of the mistaba, preparations are making on a grand scale. Large bags of ready-washed and prepared timbac are hung upon nails in the wall, to filter and to be fit for immediate use when the narghilies are called into requisition. Tobacco pouches are filled. Two additional mangals of charcoal fire and some additional coffee-pots are prepared. Decanters are filled with arrabi, wine, liqueurs, orange-flower, and rose-water; and the cut-glass saucers replenished with candied preserves; whilst two maid-servants and a boy, assisted and superintended by the mistress of the house, are busy grinding coffee, and decocting huge bowls of deliciously-iced lemonade. In addition to all this, a side-table is groaning under the weight of plates of sliced oranges and picked pomegranates, with numerous other fruits, and a great variety of pastry. By the time all these arrangements are completed, the night sets in. The whole yard is illuminated; the members of the household and the servants are busily engaged donning their best attire, and the company of hired musicians arrive. The music striking up is the signal for the nearest invited neighbours to make their appearance. They arrive—the men clad in long, loose, silken robes; the women enveloped in their white izars: but these latter are speedily thrown aside at the invitation of the lady of the house, who assists in helping the guests to disrobe, and then confides their izars to the trusty care of the handmaiden.

Now these veils are not all of the same make, and they have no initials or other distinguishing mark. Notwithstanding this, no confusion ensues on the breaking up of a party as to the identification: every lady is quick to recognise her own peculiar izar from the mass of white sheets that are folded and piled one above another upon the divan in the up-stairs dressing-room. Soon the whole party have arrived, and the amusements of the evening commence with vocal and instrumental music. After this, some of the gentlemen stand up and go through the graceful attitudes of the Syrian dance, then some others volunteer the sword dance, or the Bedouin dance; some of the married ladies then take courage, but it requires coaxing and threats to induce the timid damsel to display her skill. Persuasion being out of the question, some old gentleman gets up and pretends that he is going to dance instead of her, and he goes through a few steps till he comes close up to some girl that he has singled out from the circle. Seizing her arm with no very gentle force, he whirls into the centre of the yard, and meanwhile some one who has watched the manoeuvre, acts the same part by some other blushing maiden. These are confronted face to face, and there is now no escape, so they commence, at first timidly and bashfully, but getting gradually excited by the music, they lose all this pretended bashfulness, and do their best to outshine each other; and truly there is rarely a more graceful sight than two beautiful Damascene girls, elegantly dressed and bespangled with jewels, displaying their graceful figures to the best advantage, to the slow but becoming measures of the dance. All the other young ladies now follow their example, and as each couple retires at the termination of their efforts to please, they are hailed with shouts of applause, and liberally besprinkled with rose and orange-flower water. The old ladies evince their approbation by a peculiar vibrating scream, produced by the voice passing through the nearly closed lips, whilst the under-lip is kept in a continual tremulous state by the rapid application of the back of the fore-finger to that part of the feature. When dancing is over for the evening, games of forfeit are introduced, and promote much mirth, especially one game called "Tuthum, Tuthun—min Tuthun."

After these games, which are something like those that amuse the young folks here, some one sings a song or tells a story, and a specimen of an Arabic tale is given with oriental fun and illustration.

Refreshments have been served at intervals; and the smoking has been incessant, the married ladies, especially mothers of families, indulging in whiffs at the narghili. It is considered unbecoming in a young lady to smoke, and they never do so in public; but as they often serve the narghili to distinguished guests, they are compelled to take some whiffs, as it is customary to present it lighted; and as this process does not appear to make them feel unwell, we naturally imagine that on the sly these young ladies frequently indulge themselves with a pipe. This, kind reader, is a fair sample of the manner in which the Damascus Christians amuse themselves during the evening.—The Thistle and the Cedar of Lebanon.

SOME one says, that the first weeping willow in England was planted by Pope, the poet. He received a present of figs from Turkey; and, observing a twig in the basket ready to bud, he planted it in his garden, and it soon became a fine tree. From this stock all the weeping willows in England originated.

A HINT FOR TUTORS.—A parent would rush, in the greatest alarm, after a child that was indiscriminately eating wild fruits and berries, for fear it should lay hold of a poison. How much greater care ought to be exerted in preventing an indiscriminate use of books, lest the morals should imbibe a poison that will stamp the future character with irretrievable dishonour.

[THE ARTILLERY CAMP.]

THE CAMP AT CHOBHAM.

EUROPE this summer presents the spectacle of one vast military training ground. Independent of the savage displays of Russia, France and Austria have taken to the tented field: so that the thunder of mimic war mutters deeply all over the continent. The mighty masses which Russia can hurl on any given point of her formidable frontier, has made the statesmen of all other nations think seriously, and many an anxious eye has been turned in doubt and dismay to the banks of the Danube. But while Russia has been indulging in practical demonstrations, and wickedly endangering the peace of the world, at a time when peace had become a valued and acknowledged institution, the displays of France and England have been more of a preparatory character. Neither, we believe, wishes for war; for in the present state of the French finances, war would cripple her resources, and afford the enemies of Louis Napoleon the coveted opportunity of aiming a fatal blow at his power and authority. England is so indoctrinated with maxims of peace, her spirit so earnestly and gratefully accepts the benefits of peace, that she would rather anathematise than stimulate the warlike ardour which, perhaps happily for the firm developments of civilisation, still lingers in the public breast; but England has a duty to perform to the world and to herself—and that is, to do all in her power to keep the peace, and set an example of order, dignity, and firmness. That she can only do by being fully prepared for every exigency—hence the camp at Chobham, and an enormous increase in the Royal Navy. And here we find now, as of old, the essential differences between the two countries strikingly brought out.

France makes a magnificent display of troops—her two camps contain the flower of her army, perfectly disciplined, well officered, and eager for the fray. Her navy does not exhibit the same alacrity. It is not only deficient in esprit de corps, but its movements are sluggish and uncertain—looking exactly as if it liked to hug the land, a thing a true English sailor abhors. But this not taking naturally to the sea is inherent in the Celtic races of modern times; although the Celts of antiquity were the mariners and merchants of the ages in which they flourished. France has none of the hardy Scandinavian spirit about her. She may conquer, but she cannot retain; because she has no colonising tendencies. She does not cultivate commerce, by sending her ships to the remotest corners of the earth, to lay the foundations of kingdoms and empires. Her footing out of France is weak and precarious. But with a population of probably forty millions, burning for distinction, and imbued with the warlike traditions of the past, the government, as much from motives of prudence as anything else, provides vents for this martial enthusiasm in spectacles and pomp. Soldiering, therefore, is a passion with the French people, and a large encampment no novelty. With England the case is widely different. The deck is the Englishman's field of fame, and among all classes the feeling is pretty strong that

Britannia needs no bulwarks—
No towers along the steep;
Her march is o'er the mountain waves—
Her home is on the deep.

The army, therefore—out of the metropolis—has never been so popular as the navy; and if the Peace Society—ladies and gentlemen who nearly all belong to those sturdy north-west provinces upon which Cromwell so firmly relied for support—had their own way, the British army would be disbanded to-morrow. Happily, however, for the best interests of the nation, it is not ruled by mere sentiment, however good-natured may be its tone; and as at this present juncture circumstances have arisen to call for every effective means of strength being ready to be called into active requisition at almost a moment's notice, the movements of our army are invested with more than an ordinary interest. In fact, we are beginning to be proud of our soldiers, and it may be accepted as a fact, that the camp at Chobham is the grand feature of the season.

Every day its popularity increases, and the efficiency of British troops is in every respect triumphantly established.

The military demonstrations that have been made were of the most varied character; and in continuing our illustrations of this remarkable military fête, we must mention, that pitched battles and sieges have been very frequent. The General, Lord Seaton, is an ardent admirer of the tactics of his late commander, the great Duke of Wellington; and, as a specimen of his mode of handling troops in the face of an enemy, we will briefly describe another mock engagement, which we had the good fortune to see in all its exciting details.

At ten o'clock in the morning, the troops were marched in columns of sections, left in front, to Flutter's Hill, a commanding position on the borders of the common, on the Chertsey side, where the division formed in a line of contiguous columns, with the cavalry and horse artillery on the right. The enemy was indicated by a handful of men, and was supposed to occupy, in great strength, the opposite side of the valley.

Lord Seaton, with his staff, having reconnoitred the enemy's position from the high ground, the division was ordered to advance, which it did in echelon of battalions from the left, covered by the Rifles, who threw out their skirmishers to the front, and opened fire. The Guards having deployed into line on the left, General Fane's and Sir De Lacy Evans's brigades took ground to the right, and prolonged it, while the Rifles were withdrawn, and the cavalry and artillery were drawn up in the rear. The whole infantry force was thus seen in one long line, extending more than a mile, and reaching right across the valley. A hot fire was at once opened from the left of this line upon the enemy, who were supposed to be in great force opposite. The cavalry, moving from the right, took ground to the left, and, forming a column of squadrons, advanced, throwing out skirmishers to the front. They were compelled, however, by the stout resistance they met, to retire through the line, which, resuming its fire, drove the enemy back, and formed into double column of companies in rear of the two centre companies of battalions. Having re-formed their line on the two centre companies of battalions, firing was resumed, while the batteries thundered from the heights in the rear. The movement into double column of companies was then repeated, and the cavalry advanced to the front, to follow up the effect of the fire. Notwithstanding these efforts, however, the enemy compelled the whole division to retire, which it did, covered by the two centre companies of each battalion skirmishing. When it fronted again, the cavalry and skirmishers were withdrawn, and the brigades advancing, deployed into line on the right company of each battalion—a deployment not easily made from a double column of companies, and which, from its difficulty, illustrated the high discipline of the troops. While these movements were taking place, the Guards occupied a position on the left, rather in advance of the line, the front of which their fire flanked. The enemy being now supposed to threaten the right, the whole line charged, the left being thrown forward on the right of battalions and the division being in echelon of battalions in line. The Rifles advanced once more to the front to skirmish, and under cover of their fire the division retired in open column of companies from the left of battalions, in rear of the right. Then the two leading battalions of each brigade deployed into line, one regiment being in reserve in column, and no more beautiful sight occurred during the day than that of these double lines retreating and firing alternately, supported by their reserves. The lines were next broken up into quarter-distance columns—in rear of the right and left—and the whole division formed battalion squares in echelon, to receive cavalry. This was another splendid point in the evolutions—the solid masses opening a fire of musketry, which was not unnaturally supposed to have checked the enemy's pursuit. As they retreated, the Duke of Cambridge and his brigade of cavalry swept down upon them, the artillery was brought to bear, and the Highlanders and the Coldstreams, deploying into line and advancing with levelled bayonets, charged them home. What foe could withstand such a demonstration of military force? The imagined enemy, that for four hours had contended so bravely, was at length dissipated into thin air, and the triumphant troops returned to their quarters, well appetised for dinner.

These manoeuvres might almost have been taken as a representation of one of the "Duke's" battles in the Peninsula. Lord Seaton carries out to their furthest development the tactics of the deceased hero under whom he served, and to whom in character he bears some resemblance. He executes all his movements in open column, acting on Wellington's principle of being always ready to show the largest possible front. In the French army, movements are generally executed in columns at quarter distance—its line is three deep, instead of two deep, like ours. Napoleon advanced to the attack in columns, while our plan is to advance in line. We expose our men as little as possible, and trust to their firmness and discipline. These were effectually tested at Waterloo, when the following testimony was extorted from an enemy—General Foy: "Neither the cannon-balls of the Imperial Guard, discharged point blank, nor the victorious cavalry of France, could make the least impression on the immovable British infantry. One might have been almost tempted to fancy that it had rooted itself in the ground, but for the majestic movement its battalions commenced some minutes after sunset."

It may here be observed, that Napoleon's plan of attack was not an original invention of his own: he had borrowed it from the Romans, who always began battle with the light troops, thrown out as skirmishers; and when the engagement had waxed desperate, retired, and the army was formed into a compact mass, and made an impetuous and last attack—for, if the assault failed, the day was lost. Wellington disliked, even ridiculed this mode of attack, and attributed most of Napoleon's reverses to his obstinate adherence to it. But among continental authorities, their system is considered to have some advantage over ours, because ours tends to give our battalions a less dense and more straggling appearance. But, to counterbalance this, the sacrifice of life is not so great with us, and our men are more entirely available for attack or defence. Influenced by these considerations—which largely determined our victories in the last war—Lord Seaton shows a great predilection for movements in open column. Had he raw recruits, or half-disciplined militia to deal with, he could not hope to make them, over the rough ground of the common, preserve their distance and covering. But he shows that he has the pick and flower of the British army to handle, and he treats them as "men who can go anywhere and do anything."

But the troops are not restricted to manoeuvres within a narrow compass—they have long advances and struggles across bridges in the face of an enemy. They also cross rivers on pontoons—in fact, are exercised in every description of attack, every feint practised to draw an enemy from a formidable position, and, in addition, are instructed in the most difficult and dangerous branch of military tactics—the art of retreating. So that it will be perceived they are hard worked, and Canvas Town presents a scene of as great industry as any place in the kingdom.

We rejoice in being able again to announce that the physique of the division continues unimpaired—it is really magnificent, and the conduct of the men excellent. A riend, however, draws our attention to the absence of amusements in the camp. After the fatigues of the day, the men are left to their own resources—which are talking, smoking, or reading, with an occasional game at cards.

In this respect, the arrangements are defective, and in another lamentably so, compared with the French army—we allude to educational requisites. In the French army, many camp hours are devoted to useful studies. A soldier or non-commissioned officer is called out to write a sentence on a board, dictated by the schoolmasters, and to construe it—another a problem in algebra—another to sketch on the board a fortification, explaining aloud the peculiar uses of each work. The general then puts questions to the officers under the rank of captain and to the non-commissioned officers, and the man must indeed be master of his profession to put such questions. Now we have nothing of this kind in the British army—and that we think an omission which amounts to a grave fault. The soldier is quite as much entitled to a sound practical education as a civilian, and we have yet to learn that a little more learning would make a British soldier less brave than he is. Were such to be the case, the British army would produce few Wellingtons, or Moores, or Napiers, or Abercrombies. The real explanation is, that while nobody is indifferent to the education of the army, there is nobody to take the active part in its promotion. The laissez faire principle is too much patronised in this country—there is too great a proneness to let everything work out its own purposes, and adjust itself unaided.

We are not partial to excessive government interference with any class or interests, but as the army is essentially the very protégé—the very staff of the government—we can consistently contend that it ought to receive a larger increase of justice in respect to its educational necessities. As the art of war is becoming more and more independent of the mere valour of the men actually engaged, so must the intelligence of the human material approximate to the immense progress made in the management of the system itself. Improved cannon and rifles will be the actual combatants in less than a quarter of a century, and to wield those formidable instruments of warfare will require more intelligence and tact than courage. Brown Bess and the bayonet have seen their best days; even those least conversant with the nature of military movements, in viewing the operations at Chobham, must have observed that, with the artillery and Rifle Brigade in active requisition, these weapons were more effective for defence than attack. But the whole system of war all over the continent is being reduced to mathematical precision; and as we may have in time to encounter either the embattled hosts of Russia, or the legions of France, it is indispensable for the honour and glory of the British soldier, that his mental status should be at least equal to that of the enemy.

THE HEIR APPARENT TO THE BRITISH THRONE UNDER INSTRUCTION.

THE London correspondent of a North German paper relates a story with regard to the way in which Prince Albert disciplines his children:

The young prince stood one day in his room in the palace at Windsor, at the window, whose panes reached to the floor. He had a lesson to learn by heart, but instead, was amusing himself by looking out into the garden and playing with his fingers on the window. His governess, Miss Hillyard, an earnest and pious person, observed this, and kindly asked him to think of getting his lesson. The young prince said:

"I don't want to."

"Then," said Miss Hillyard, "I must put you in the corner."

"I won't learn!" answered the little fellow, resolutely; "and won't stand in the corner—for I am the Prince of Wales!"

And as he said this, he knocked out one of the panes with his foot. At this Miss Hillyard rose from her seat, and said:

"Sir, you must learn, or I must put you in the corner!"

"I won't!" said he, knocking out a second pane.

The governess then rang, and told the servant who entered to say to Prince Albert that she requested the presence of his royal highness immediately on a pressing matter connected with his son. The devoted father came at once, and heard the statement of the whole matter, after which he turned to his little son, and said, pointing to an ottoman:

"Sit down there, and wait till I return." Then Prince Albert went to his room and brought a Bible. "Listen now," he said to the Prince of Wales, "to what the holy Apostle Paul says to you and other children in your position." Hereupon he read Galat. iv. 1 and 2: "Now I say that the heir, so long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father." "It is true," continued Prince Albert, "that you are the Prince of Wales, and if you conduct yourself properly, you may become a man of high station, and even, after the death of your mother, may become King of England. But now you are a little boy, who must obey his tutors and governors. Besides, I must impress upon you another saying of the wise Solomon, in Proverbs xiii. 24—'He that spareth his rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes.' " Hereupon the father took out a rod, and gave the heir to the throne of the weightiest empire in Christendom a very palpable switching, and then stood him up in the corner, saying, "You will stand here and study your lesson till Miss Hillyard gives you leave to come out. And never forget again that you are now under tutors and governors, and that hereafter you will be under a law given by God."

"This," adds the correspondent, "is an excellent Christian mode of education, which every citizen and peasant who has a child may well take to his heart as a model."

MARRIAGE CUSTOMS OF THE INHABITANTS OF MOUNT LEBANON.

THE same rules hold good amongst them as amongst the nobility, with regard to the choice of brides. No young man can marry out of the immediate range of his relations, so long as there are any single girls in the family; and a deviation from this rule is so fiercely resented, that it is scarcely ever heard of. On the other hand, should a young girl dare to fix her affections on any young man not her cousin, the whole of her male relations rise up in arms, and, after having made for her what they consider a fit and appropriate choice from amongst themselves, if argument and persuasion fail in bringing her to a sense of her impropriety, bring her to the altar by force. Such an occurrence, to be sure, is rare; but the exception proves the rule.

The consequence of this custom is, that there are families of one name in the Lebanon so numerous as to amount to clans, and who boast of from one hundred to one hundred-and-fifty, and even two hundred men, bearing arms, which is a source of immense pride and gratification, and confers influence and importance.

A few days before the marriage takes place, the peasant takes a propitiatory present of fowls, coffee, or sugar, to his landlord or feudal chief, and asks permission to perform the ceremony. A week is spent in rejoicings at his own home by the bridegroom, who all this time wears a pelisse of honour, sent him by his landlord; by the bride, in preparations for her nuptials. On the day fixed—usually on a Sunday—the bridegroom's relations come for the bride, when all her connections make presents, varying from one to five shillings each, which are collected in a purse, and given to the bride before she leaves the paternal roof. She takes her farewell by kissing the hands of all the male members of her family in succession.

The procession is now formed, and moves on at the slowest pace possible; the bride walking or riding, according to circumstances, closely veiled. A halt is made every five minutes, when the party sing songs, accompanied by music, while some perform the sword-dance. An hour is sometimes taken up in traversing a hundred yards. This uncommonly tedious rate of advancing is intended to indicate that the bride is in no extraordinary haste to reach her future husband, and is a part of that characteristic reserve and modesty, whether real or fictitious, which distinguishes the sex on all such occasions in the East.

If the party have to go through a village on their route, the bride keeps her hand to her head, which is bashfully held down all the time occupied in passing through: thus respectfully saluting the inhabitants, who on their parts sprinkle her with corn and raisins. On reaching her future home, the bride flings a pomegranate amongst the party; which is greedily snatched up and partitioned by the young men, and is supposed to give the marriage infection. As she crosses the threshold, she takes out of her bosom a piece of yeast, which she has brought from her father's house, and sticks it firmly on the door-post,—signifying thereby her resolution to cleave closely to her husband; the latter, at the same moment, standing on the roof, exactly above the door, with a drawn sword over her head,—emblematical of the absolute sway which he is to hold over her throughout life.—Colonel Churchill's Mount Lebanon.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF
"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XLII.

Alas! that such a stain should fall
From woman's love, more sad than all
MOORE'S LOVES OF THE ANGELS.

EARLY in the month of February, 1567, occurred one of those horrible and mysterious events which sully the page of history. Henry Darnley, the Boy-King of Scotland, as he has been contemptuously called, was foully murdered the house in which he resided, a short distance from Holyrood, being blown up by gunpowder, a few hours after Mary had paid him an amicable visit. Suspicion not unnaturally pointed to the queen, whom he had fearfully outraged by assisting at the assassination of her favourite secretary, which atrocity was perpetrated in her presence.

Public rumour openly designated the Earl of Bothwell as the actual murderer of the weak-minded husband of his sovereign. His name had long been coupled in a scandalous manner, by the people, with the queen's.

To do Elizabeth justice, in the first impulse of the moment, on hearing of the deed, she wrote, in a manner worthy of her sex and rank, to her unfortunate cousin. Had she always acted towards her with the same noble, generous frankness which pervades this remarkable letter, how different might have been the fate of the unhappy Mary!

"For the love of God, madam," she says, "use such sincerity and prudence in this case, which touches you so nearly, that all the world may have reason to judge you innocent of so enormous a crime—a thing which, unless you do, you will be worthily blotted out from the rank of princesses, and rendered, not undeservedly, the opprobrium of the vulgar; rather than which fate should befall you, I should wish you an honourable sepulchre, instead of a stained life."

It is painful to contrast sentiments which honoured the heiress of the royal line of Plantagenet with her previous crooked policy touching the marriage of her cousin, or the inveterate malice with which she afterwards persecuted, and ultimately brought her to the block.

Elizabeth for more than two years had detained her own cousin, the Countess of Lennox, mother of the murdered prince, a close prisoner in the Tower, as well as her youngest son, the Lord Charles—the sole ground of their detention being the marriage of her subject, Henry Darnley, without her permission, with the Queen of Scots.

Deeply as she undoubtedly felt the degradation of her cousin Mary, Elizabeth was of too crafty a spirit not to perceive the advantage it gave her over her long-hated rival, and too ungenerous not to use it.

"We must release our prisoners, Cecil!" she said, in a private council with her secretary. "The Lennox brood will clamour loudly, and make their griefs heard in every court of Europe, for the boy Henry's death. His offence against our crown and dignity be buried with him!"

"You are right, your majesty!" replied the wily statesman, bowing low; "a deep sympathy is excited throughout the kingdom for the unfortunate countess and her family. Were parliament assembled, nothing, I feel assured, would restrain the Commons from addressing the throne for their release."

A frown, almost amounting to a scowl, rested for an instant on the brow of Elizabeth, who, throughout her long reign, fiercely resented the interference of the legislature in any matter touching either her marriage, the succession, or the policy which she thought proper to adopt towards those who stood in a direct line to the crown.

"If I thought that, she should lie and rot where she is!" exclaimed the royal virago; "we are not to be schooled either by the peers or citizens! God's death! have they forgotten that I am the daughter of Henry VIII., who once threatened to strike off the head of the speaker of the Commons, when that insolent body refused to pass his bill? I have been too patient with these knaves!"

"Madam," observed the prudent Cecil, "your royal father's title to the throne was not a doubtful one!"

"Doubtful!" repeated Elizabeth, her eyes flashing fire.

"Disputed, I should have said!" added the secretary, correcting himself; "since he united in his own person the inheritance of York and Lancaster. The sovereign authority had not been weakened, as in the reign of your brother Edward, by unwise concession. Parliament, after all," he added, "has proved your majesty's most constant friend. Its prompt recognition ended all dispute upon your sister's death."

His royal mistress was too deeply sensible of this important truth to feel offended at the boldness with which it was uttered.

"Enough for the praters and meddlers at present!" she said, resuming her former good humour; "doubtless, in due time, we shall find the means to bring both Houses to reason! But of our cousin, the Lady Lennox: we persist in our good intentions towards her, and this very day will send one of our ladies of honour—one of our own blood—the Lady Howard—to break the sad intelligence, and console her!"

"To be followed, I trust, madam, by her release and restoration to your royal favour!" said the minister. "In the hands of your majesty, she may be made useful! The imprudence of the Queen of Scotland will not end with the death of her husband!"

"What mean you?" demanded Elizabeth, fixing her eyes searchingly upon him.

"She will marry his assassin."

The countenance of the queen became radiant with smiles at the mere possibility of such an imprudent step, which she was astute enough to perceive would place the conduct of Mary in a still more odious light. At this period her desire was to humble and crush her imprudent cousin—render her dependent upon herself for countenance and support against the indignation of her subjects. The block and axe had not yet risen to her view, in the hideous horizon of the future.

"Has the pension of the Lord Murray," she demanded, "been regularly paid?"

Elizabeth knew that it had not, but she was hypocritical even with her confidant, Cecil—who answered that it was in arrears.

"Then let them be paid up—and instantly: the gold may stand him in good service now. We must not act the niggard to our friends. I am grieved, Cecil—much grieved—lest he should deem I have broken faith with him!"

The secretary could scarcely restrain a smile at the transparent duplicity of the speaker—who, to his certain knowledge, had received letter upon letter from the Lord Murray, and others of the Scottish confederates, soliciting the arrears of their pensions, which Elizabeth—not having any immediate necessity for their services—with her customary parsimony, refused to pay. It is doubtful, in fact, if she had ever condescended to notice one of them.

That very night, trusty agents were dispatched to Scotland, charged with the means, as well as secret instructions, to assist the malcontents in every way which the craft or gold of the English sovereign could serve them in.

"Married to Bothwell!" repeated Elizabeth; "married to Darnley's murderer! Should she take that step, she is lost—crown and fame! Thank heaven, with all my weakness, I am still less a woman than a queen! Married to Bothwell!" she again murmured, with a sinister smile. "Her throne will crumble into ashes! I shall see her a fugitive—perhaps a suppliant at my feet! I should like to see that day!" she added, proudly. "The proverb is not an idle one—'Gare those who touch the crown of the Plantagenets and Tudors!'"

It was late in the evening of the same day before Lady Howard, who had waited for the tide to take water from Westminster, arrived at the Tower, bearing an order from Elizabeth to admit her to the captive Countess of Lennox. She found the illustrious prisoner—who was still in the prime of life—seated near the window of a lofty and not uncomfortably-furnished apartment in the White Tower. Her youngest son, Charles—a mere youth—was kneeling by her side, and consoling her.

"From her majesty the queen!" exclaimed the Lieutenant of the Tower, who, out of deference to the birth of the countess and her visitor, had ushered Lady Howard to the presence of his charge.

The two ladies, who had not met for more than a year, embraced, and the officer left the room.

"Ah, Howard!" exclaimed the Countess of Lennox, "this is kind indeed! How few like you inquire the wretched out, to comfort them in misery! But how is this?" she added, glancing at the same time at the costume of her visitor, who wore a kirtle and gown of black taffeta, with black and white passemensures. "In weeds! Has fortune been unkind to you, and robbed you of your life's stay?"

"Not to me!" answered the messenger of Elizabeth. "although I share the grief of those whose pangs will speak their love when they shall learn their loss!"

"When they shall learn their loss!" repeated the prisoner, her countenance turning pale with the instinctive apprehension of a mother's fears; "Howard, tell me, I implore you, what has happened! My tyrant cousin has not assailed the life or liberty of my husband or my son?"

"No," replied the visitor; "my Lord of Lennox is well—quite well—and likely to be restored to favour. I heard her majesty speak of him this very day with great pity and commendation."

"Pity!" exclaimed Lord Charles, indignantly; "tell your haughty mistress, madam, it is justice, and not pity, that we require at her hands!"

"Peace, Charles!" said his mother, in an affectionate and subdued tone; "we are captives now, and must submit!" Turning to Lady Howard, she added: "Let me know the worst! From girlhood I could ever endure misfortune better than suspense. The news you bring touches the welfare of my son, the King of Scotland?"

"Of Lord Henry Darnley," said Lady Howard, who was far too prudent, and too much of a courtier, to give, even in private, a title to the late husband of the Queen of Scots which her royal mistress had not only refused to acknowledge, but commanded never to be pronounced in her presence.

"I say of the King of Scots!" exclaimed Charles Lennox, passionately. "King he is, and king he will remain, despite the red-haired daughter of Anne Boleyn!"

"My boy—my boy!" exclaimed the countess passionately, her mother's heart at that moment taking but little heed of earthly titles and distinctions; "Henry is ill? For God's sake, Howard, say that he is only ill, and I will bless you!"

Instead of trying to disengage herself from the grasp of the speaker, the messenger of sorrow pressed her yet closer in her arms, and whispered in her ear:

"Alas! there is a son in heaven who prays for his mother in captivity! Mary of Scotland is a widow!"

"Dead! my brother dead!" said the youthful prisoner; "then he has been murdered!"

Lady Howard remained silent.

"Right, boy!" exclaimed his mother, sternly, at the same time dashing aside her tears; "he has been murdered! We will weep for him when we have avenged him: till then it would be mockery! Tell me," she added, turning towards the Lady Howard, "who is a mother's lips to curse for this? Who has robbed her of her elder born—the pride of her fond heart? But why do I ask? The daughter of Anne Boleyn reigns in England! May every—"

"Hold!" gravely pronounced the confidant of Elizabeth, interrupting her; "charge not your soul with such injustice! Her majesty has not only expressed the utmost indignation at the atrocious deed, but instructed her ambassador to demand the punishment of the perpetrators. The courtesan," she continued, with a hesitating glance, "is, I fear, too highly placed for human justice yet to reach her!"

"Name her—name her?" exclaimed both the prisoners.

"Mary Stuart, Queen Regnant of Scotland," was the reply—which from that moment became indelibly impressed upon the heart of the Countess of Lennox, who never could be induced to believe her innocent, but demanded vengeance on her at the hands of Elizabeth to the last.

The impression which the messenger of the queen was intended to convey was clearly made. That same evening Elizabeth sent her own physician, and a divine from her own chapel, to visit her captive cousin, whom a few days afterwards she restored to liberty, and apparently to favour.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Gone to be married—false blood to false blood
JOHN D.

SHAKESPEARE.

THE crowning act of weakness and folly—but we still believe not of guilt—of the unfortunate Mary Stuart's life, was her marriage with the Earl of Bothwell, who, in the eyes of her own subjects, as well as the opinion of Europe, was the murderer of Henry Darnley.

This ill-assorted union was followed by violent commotions in Scotland. Murray and the rebel lords, taking advantage of the queen's unpopularity, at once appealed to arms. The partisans of Mary were few and dispirited—consequently, the contest was neither long nor doubtful the royal forces were defeated; and, after being exposed to the insults of her rebellious people, Mary Stuart was sent a prisoner to the Castle of Lochleven, where an act of abdication was forced from her by the unmanly violence of Lord Ruthven, who absolutely seized her by the wrist to compel her to write her name.

The resentment of Elizabeth towards her hapless cousin was amply gratified: her throne was shattered, the crown rent from her brow, and transferred to an infant's, and the government of the country in the hands of Murray and his confederates, who had long been in the pay of England.

But if the hatred of the woman was satisfied, the prudence of the sovereign was alarmed. The example of deposing an independent sovereign, whose title to the possession of her crown had never been disputed, was too near her own doors to be pleasant; and she directed her ambassadors not only to console the captive queen, but offer, in her name, stern remonstrances to her rebellious subjects.

Throgmorton, who then represented the maiden queen in Scotland, appears to have fulfilled his instructions with zeal and ability.

At the same time, Elizabeth wrote the following letter to the Queen Mother and Regent of France, Catherine de Medicis. It was copied from the royal archives of St. Petersburg, by permission of the present Emperor of Russia, and first published by Miss Agnes Strickland, whose researches and writing reflect an honour both upon her sex and country, especially when the tact and delicacy with which she has treated certain portions of history are considered.

We are proud to offer this tribute of admiration to her labours.

"Oct. 16, 1567.

"Having learned by your letter, madame, of which Monsieur Pasquier is the bearer, your honourable intention, and that of the king, my brother, on the part of my desolate cousin, the Queen of Scots, I rejoice very much to see that one prince takes to heart the wrongs done to another, having a hatred to that metamorphosis, where the head is removed to the foot, and the heels hold the highest place. I promise you, madame, that even if my consanguinity did not constrain me to wish her all honour, her example would seem too terrible for neighbours to behold, and for all princes to hear. These evils often resemble the noxious influence of some baleful planet, which, commencing in one place, without the good power, might well fall in another, not that (God be thanked!) I have any doubts on my part, wishing that neither the king my brother, nor any other prince had more cause to chastise their bad subjects, than I have to avenge myself on mine, which are always as faithful to me as I could desire; notwithstanding which I never fail to condole with those princes who have cause to be angry. Even those troubles that formerly began with the king have vexed me before now.

"Monsieur Pasquier (as I believe) thinks I have no French, by the passions of laughter into which he throws me, by the formal precision with which he speaks and expresses himself.

"Beseeching you, madame, if I can at this time do you any pleasure, you will let me know, that I may acquit myself as a good friend on your part. In the meantime, I cannot cease to pray the Creator to guard the king and yourself from your bad subjects, and to have you always in his holy care.

"In haste, at Hampton Court, this 16th of October (1567).

"Your good sister and cousin,

"ELIZABETH."

How the infamous Catherine, whose crimes have rendered her notorious, must have sneered as she read the epistle—knowing, as she did, the hatred which the writer entertained towards the unhappy Queen of Scots!

The subject of Elizabeth's marriage with the archduke was again renewed. Sussex, who was ambassador to the imperial court, wrote his mistress several amusing letters touching the prince's person and character. The match, however, was ultimately broken off on account of the difference of religion: his imperial highness refusing to abandon the religion of his ancestors, even for the crown matrimonial of England; and Elizabeth was far too politic to weaken the hold she possessed upon the affections of her subjects.

It would be digressing from our present labours were we to enter more into the details of the life of Mary. We must content ourselves, therefore, with touching upon such points as bring her into immediate contact with Elizabeth.

The Queen of Scots, assisted by George Douglas and others of her friends, contrived to escape from the Castle of Lochleven, where she was a prisoner, and rally round her standard the devoted adherents which remained to her.

Unhappily the forces of the rebels vanquished her troops at the Battle of Langside. She would have retired to Dumbarton, but her retreat was cut off.

In this dilemma she wrote to Elizabeth, entreating her hospitality and protection. The resolution was a fatal one—fatal alike to the honour of the princess to whom she appealed, and to her own happiness.

As a further means of touching the heart of her royal kinswoman, Mary sent back to her a token, in the shape of a diamond heart, which her cousin had formerly sent to her.

Mary crossed the Frith of Solway, attended only by Lord Herries and a few domestics; and on the 16th of May landed on the coast of Cumberland. Being honourably welcomed by the gentry of the north, she proceeded at once to Carlisle, from which place she dispatched letters to Elizabeth, whose joy at hearing of the step her imprudent rival had taken, could only be equalled by the mortification she endured from the honourable reception she had met with from the gentry of Cumberland, and the sympathy which her misfortunes appeared to excite amongst the high nobility of the kingdom.

At a council held immediately upon the receipt of the important intelligence of Mary being in England, it was resolved to send Lord Scroop and Sir Francis Knollys to congratulate her in the name of Elizabeth. The messengers were to be accompanied by a strong body of troops. Knollys, who was related to Elizabeth, and entirely trusted by her, attended, at her command, previous to starting, to receive her last instructions.

He found her in the cabinet of Westminster, in the most feverish excitement: triumph, anger, cunning, and pride, by turns reigned paramount in her heart. The voice of pity or honour was not heard—the ears of the royal virgin were deaf to their supplication.

"So Knollys," she exclaimed, as soon as her kinsman entered the room, "you are prepared to start?"

"At your highness's gracious pleasure!" replied the courtly knight.

"Can you rely upon your men?"

"On all, may it please your majesty?"

"Have you received the instructions of the council?"

"I have, gracious madam!" was the reply.

"Now, then, hear mine!" said Elizabeth, sinking her voice, as if she feared to trust even the echo of the old palace of Westminster with her secret thoughts. "I need not tell you to be faithful, for I have tried and proved you!"

Sir Francis bowed low at the commendation of his sovereign, who, during her long reign, was as chary of her praise as of the honours which she so rarely conferred.

"You will congratulate"—and the royal speaker laid a marked emphasis upon the word—"our dear cousin in our name, and tend her with all honour at Carlisle!"

"All honour, madam!" observed Sir Francis. "If it may please you, that is no precise instruction. Am I to treat the fugitive Mary as a queen or private personage?"

"As a queen!" answered Elizabeth; then added, with a sarcastic smile, "at least for the present."

"In that case, madam," resumed the knight, who shrewdly guessed why he had been selected for the office, "I am to consider her majesty as a FREE AGENT?"

"In appearance, Knollys—in appearance!"

"The charge you have honoured me with, gracious sovereign," said her kinsman, "is no easy one. Pardon me if I add, that, to execute it to your royal satisfaction, I must have explicit orders from your own lips."

"Speak!" said the queen.

"Should Mary attempt to return to Scotland, or retire to France?"

"Arrest her!" exclaimed Elizabeth, without a moment's hesitation, "and conduct her at once to the Tower!"

"To the Tower, madam!" repeated the astonished knight; "your own kinswoman—an anointed sovereign! I dare not, even on your word, be guilty of so bold an act!"

"How! sirrah!"

"Unless," added Sir Francis, "by an order under your royal hand. In that case, I would arrest the pope or emperor himself!"

The speaker, who perfectly knew the character of his august but politic mistress, was aware that, should it become necessary for her plans, she would not hesitate an instant to disavow and punish him for an act she had herself commanded, unless he were furnished with written proof that he had acted in strict obedience to her orders.

"Thou art a precise fellow!" resumed the queen; "but I understand thee! Shame, Francis, to doubt the faith of thy sovereign and cousin!"

Having written and sealed the order with her signet, Elizabeth placed it in his hands—accompanied by a caution that it was not to be used or produced except upon emergency.

That same night, accompanied by Lord Scroop, and attended by a troop of horse, Sir Francis started for Carlisle.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

SWALLOWS.—As a proof of the valuable services rendered by swallows, it is estimated that one of these birds will destroy, at a low calculation, 900 insects per day: and when it is considered that some insects produce as many as nine generations in a summer, the state of the air, but for these birds, may be readily conceived. One kind of insect alone might produce 560,970,489,000,000,000 of its race in a single year.

CRAYONS FOR WRITING ON GLASS.—Mr. Brannell prepares crayons for writing on glass, so as to enable the contents of glass vessels to be described immediately upon them in the following manner: Four parts of spermaceti (or stearine), three parts of tallow, and two parts of wax are fused in a cup; six parts of minium and one part of potash are then stirred into it, the mass kept warm for half an hour, and then poured into glass tubes of the thickness of a lead pencil. After rapid cooling, the mass may be screwed up and down in the tube, and cut to the finest point with a knife. A crayon is thus obtained which will readily write upon clean dry glass.

A HINT.—It is not generally known that the leaves of geraniums are an excellent application for cuts, where the skin is rubbed off, and other wounds of that kind. One or two leaves must be bruised and applied on linen to the part, and the wound will become cicatrised in a very short time.

TEST OF THE PURITY OF ULTRAMARINE.—Dr. Bernheim proposes the following test for the examination of commercial ultramarine: Two ounces of sulphuric acid are diluted with twenty ounces of water; the samples of ultramarine introduced into separate test tubes in quantities of fifty or one hundred grains, and the acid added until the blue colour is converted into a reddish one. The quantity of acid used indicates the relative value of the ultramarine as a colour. When smalt is present the colour is not entirely destroyed, and chalk is recognisable by the effervescence.

ON THE PURIFICATION OF SULPHURIC ACID FROM NITRIC ACID.—The fact that ammonia is capable, in virtue of the hydrogen which it contains, of decomposing the nitric acid and nitrous oxide present in sulphuric acid, may be taken advantage of for purifying sulphuric acid. These substances, frequently present in sulphuric acid, are very detrimental in some cases—for example, in dyeing. By the use of half a per cent. of sulphate of ammonia, the most impure acid may be rendered perfectly free from these substances, and, in the generality of instances, from one to two thousandths is quite sufficient. The salt should be introduced into the lead pans in which the sulphuric acid is concentrated. It is the opinion of some, that the injury suffered in the platinum vessels used for the concentration, is owing to the presence of nitrogen compounds; and besides this, it appears that sulphuric acid containing nitric acid is less suited to the purification of oils than pure acid.

THE STEREOSCOPE.—A very useful and clever application of this instrument has recently been made. It appears that large houses manufacturing solid objects of design in the fine arts, have hitherto furnished their travellers with specimens of their recent productions, which are carried from place to place by the travellers, and are commonly given away to large customers. Instead of doing so in future, the object will be sent to the photographer, who will prepare by the camera the two perspectives for the best view of it, and a number of copies will be returned with the object to the manufacturer, at a small cost. The traveller will take these with him, and a stereoscope, and with his samples thus reduced into small space, he will on any occasion be able to convey to the customer an adequate idea of the object represented. In a little time, probably, the stereoscope may be dispensed with by the traveller: for if the customers provide themselves with them, it will be only necessary to send the perspective by post, and they can realise the object for themselves.

AN APPARATUS FOR THE INTERIOR OF BONNETS, TO FIX THEM ON THE HEAD.—This apparatus consists of a light framing of thin steel or other springs, fitted to the interior of the bonnet. The framing is composed of an adjustable ring, which fits into the back part of the bonnet, and is connected by side pieces to a nached or bow-piece, which passes over the front part of the head, and the ends of which are sewn to the bonnet-lining. Two branches are also attached to the bow-piece, extending backwards, above, and nearly parallel to, the side pieces, and their ends are also sewn to the bonnet-lining. This arrangement prevents the bonnet falling off, and also serves to preserve its shape, when otherwise it would be crushed or bent out of form. The claim is for the combination of parts described, forming an apparatus for the interior of bonnets to fix them on the wearer's head.

CURE FOR YELLOW FEVER.—Senhora Orfila has discovered an infallible remedy for the cure of yellow fever and black vomit. With this medicine several persons have been cured, after having been given up by the medical men. The remedy is as follows: Take the juice of the green leaves of the verbena, obtained by pounding them with a pestle and mortar, and give it to the patient in small doses, three times a day, accompanied by injections of the same juice every two hours, till the bowels are cleansed. The verbena is a small shrub which grows in all countries, and principally in low, moist situations. There are two species, male and female: the latter sort is mostly used for this purpose. All our medical men have adopted this remedy.—Journal do Commercio.

EAST INDIA TEAS.—The East India directors have caused to be transmitted to Mr. Fleming, secretary to the Manchester Commercial Association, samples of some new teas grown in their territories in the neighbourhood of the Himalaya Mountains, of very superior quality. The samples include gunpowder, valued at 2s. 5d. in bond; young hyson, worth 1s. 11d. per lb.; and black tea, worth 1s. 9d. These teas are free from colouring matter, and would be likely to be very acceptable in this country; but as in the case of cotton grown in India, it is said the demand for them at home is such as to leave but little probability at present of a surplus for purposes of exportation.

BOUTIGNY'S PATENT DISTILLING APPARATUS.—The principle of the apparatus for which M. Charles Constant Boutigny, of Evreux, has taken out this patent, consists for the most part in the condensation of the vapours almost at the instant of their formation; so as to insure the conversion into a fluid state of the entire volume of volatile matter. Another feature in the invention is the caution observed in preventing any of the matters under distillation from boiling up and becoming mixed with the vapours. For this purpose the inventor places above them a grating sheet of wire gauze, perforated plate, or similar intercepting medium, in one or more layers, which, while intercepting the substances themselves, admits of the free passage of the vapours arising from them. For the distillation of wines and other spirituous liquids, the inventor combines in a series several arrangements, in such a manner that the product distilled from the first apparatus shall serve to feed the second, and so on in succession; the last apparatus in the series leading into a refrigerating coil, or other description of refrigerator. He thus obtains liquids of different densities in the several vessels, but of uniform density in each condenser separately. The liquid to be distilled forms the refrigerating liquid in passing from the condenser of the last apparatus: that is to say, from that in which the liquid is most rarified to that which is least, and so on in succession, until it reaches the first generator, which it supplies, and the condensed vapours of which feed alternately the others in the series. In distilling, however important it is to present a large evaporating surface to the fire, it is equally important to condense the vapours formed as rapidly as possible, bearing in mind that the vapour of water at 212 degrees Fahrenheit, and under the pressure of one atmosphere, fills a space about 1700 times greater than that produced from water at 32 degrees. In this apparatus, and in the process depending upon it, a large heating surface and rapid condensation are obtained. The evaporator may be heated by the direct action of fire, by steam, or by gas, at any required pressure, and under any temperature.

ROPE-MAKING BY MACHINERY.—Messrs. John and Edwin Wright have erected some machines for making ropes. These machines are driven by steam, and are calculated to run either upon the earth or upon a line of rails, and may be used in making any sized rope, from the smallest ratline to the heaviest and thickest cable. Some idea of the saving of time and labour may be formed from the fact, that a large cable, the construction of which by the ordinary method would occupy from twelve to fifteen men more than one day, may now be completed in about two hours, with the assistance of one man. The machines have been constructed by Mr. G. Fowler, of London, who some time ago, it may be remembered, was presented by the Emperor of Russia with a gold repeater, for his improvements in rope-making.

HYDROPHOBIA.—The poison which gives rise to hydrophobia seems to originate always with dogs, cats, foxes, and wolves—that is, with the canine and feline class of animals; but the disease is often communicated from the above to other classes of animals, and also to human beings. It appears that although the bite of other animals, such as the cow and the horse, will communicate the poison to human beings, that it cannot be communicated from one human being to another. This circumstance, if correct, inclines us to think that hydrophobia in the human species is not a disease of the specific morbid nature which is attached to its name, but merely a general nervous affection produced by the poison of mad or rabid animals. When a dog becomes affected with madness he looks dull and dejected, and shuns all society; he seldom barks, but makes a sort of discontented murmuring; he refuses food and drink, and altogether looks very listless and sleepy. At this stage of the disease he is not much inclined to bite; but he soon becomes more restless, and moves a little more about, with his head and tail drooping, and bites at almost every other creature or person except his master, whom he generally respects. After these symptoms have continued for a day or two, the dog looks more furious—he begins to froth at the mouth, and pant, with his tongue hanging out—his breathing is very quick, at other times very slow, but he generally goes straight forward. Under these symptoms he becomes very thin and weak—recognises no person, not even his master—gets at times into an irritable fury, and bites at everything in his way. In a few hours his eyes look red and suffused, great depression supervenes, and he dies in a most worn-out and dejected state.

SEWING BY MACHINERY.—A machine, of American invention, has been introduced into this country by Mr. Darling, of Glasgow (at whose manufactory numerous examples of it are now in operation), which carries the mechanical principle into a fresh department of human labour—namely, that of common hand-sewing. The patent sewing machine promises to produce a revolution in the business of the seamstress, as great as the power-loom effected in that of the weaver. This is, in truth, a moderate statement—for the capabilities of the machine have not yet been fully tested; and it is impossible to say how far its influence on the labour-market may yet extend. The machine is extremely simple in construction; but it is not very easy to give such an explanation of it as would be intelligible to the general reader, or even, indeed, to those familiar with the ordinary technical phrases of mechanics. To be understood, it must be seen; and even then, so clever is its working, that it requires a sharp eye to follow its evidently simple, yet amazingly expert movements. Its framework is cast metal; but it must not be imagined to be a huge, clumsy affair, like a hand-loom: on the contrary, it occupies little more space than two cubic feet, and might stand on the top of a lady's work-table. The right hand of the worker turns a small wheel, which puts in operation two needles—one an upright needle, the other a sort of semicircular one; and on a strong tabular surface, at the left-hand extremity of which these two needles work—the upright above, and the circular under—the cloth is laid with the left hand, and propelled between the needles as the machine proceeds with its stitching. This it does with amazing rapidity, running off, in something less than a minute, a line of stout sewing which an ordinary seamstress would scarcely overtake in the course of half an hour! Line after line it traces with unabating celerity and ease, till the two bobbins which supply the thread to the double needle machinery be wound off. Delicate in some respects as the machinery is, it is, we are told, little liable to entanglement or derangement of any kind; and any breakage of thread that may occasionally occur is rectified with very little loss of time. Again, the machine can be readily adapted to being driven by the foot of the worker, after the fashion of a turning-lathe, and in sewing other than simple straight lines—for the machine can stitch in circles, or zig-zag, or any other way that may be desired—this is a great advantage, as it leaves both hands of the worker free to manage the cloth. This mode of working also secures a much higher rate of speed. By the hand the machine may be driven at the rate of 500 stitches per minute—by the foot at nearly twice that rate. Nor must I be supposed that the work executed at this extraordinarily rapid rate is loose, irregular, “slop” sort of work. On the contrary, it is strong, close sewing, beautifully regular, and altogether such as it would require a very firm and well-practised hand to equal. Now, after all that has been said about American reaping machines, what will be said about this new American sewing machine, which seems likely to do still more towards facilitating indoor labour than the larger invention towards abridging the work of the field? We do not wish to exaggerate the probabilities of the case, but it must be remembered that the invention has so far passed the period of probation that it is in very extensive operation in America, that such trial as it has had in this country has been extremely successful, and that already its inventors are improving on it, and adapting it still more carefully and completely to its end. Looking at it when at work, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that it is destined completely to supersede all ordinary plain hand-sewing, and that such sewing, as an occupation for either men or women, tailors or seamstresses, is gone for ever.—Glasgow Chronicle.

PROFESSOR FARADAY ON TABLE-MOVING.

I HAVE been greatly startled by the revelation which this purely physical subject has made of the condition of the public mind. No doubt there are many persons who have formed a right judgment or used a cautious reserve—for I know several such, and public communications have shown it to be so; but their number is almost as nothing to the great body who have believed and borne testimony, as I think, in the cause of error. I do not here refer to the distinction of those who agree with me and those who differ. By the great body, I mean such as reject all consideration of the equality of cause and effect—who refer the results to electricity and magnetism, yet know nothing of the laws of these forces—or to attraction, yet show no phenomena of pure attractive power—or to the rotation of the earth, as if the earth revolved round the leg of a table—or to some unrecognised physical force, without inquiring whether the known forces are not sufficient—or who even refer them to diabolical or supernatural agency, rather than suspend their judgment, or acknowledge to themselves that they are not learned enough in these matters to decide on the nature of the action. I think the system of education that could leave the mental condition of the public body in the state in which this subject has found it, must have been greatly deficient in some very important principle.

EXPERIMENTAL INVESTIGATION OF TABLE-MOVING.

The object which I had in view in this inquiry was not to satisfy myself, for my conclusion had been formed already on the evidence of those who had turned tables—but that I might be enabled to give a strong opinion, founded on facts, to the many who applied to me for it. Yet the proof which I sought for, and the method followed in the inquiry, were precisely of the same nature as those which I should adopt in any other physical investigation. The parties with whom I have worked were very honourable, very clear in their intentions, successful table-movers, very desirous of succeeding in establishing the existence of a peculiar power, thoroughly candid, and very effectual. It is with me a clear point that the table moves when the parties, though they strongly wish it, do not intend, and do not believe that they move it by ordinary mechanical power. They say, the table draws their hands; that it moves first, and they have to follow it—that sometimes it even moves from under their hands. With some the table will move to the right or left, according as they wish or will it—with others the direction of the first motion is uncertain—but all agree that the table moves the hands and not the hands the table. Though I believe the parties do not intend to move the table, but obtain the result by a quasi involuntary action—still I had no doubt of the influence of expectation upon their minds, and, through that, upon the success or failure of their efforts. The first point, therefore, was to remove all objections due to expectation, having relation to the substances which I might desire to use: so, plates of the most different bodies, electrically speaking—namely, sand paper, millboard, glue, glass, moist clay, tinfoil, cardboard, gutta percha, vulcanised rubber, wood, &c.,—were made into a bundle, and placed on a table under the hands of a turner. The table turned. Other bundles of other plates were submitted to different persons at other times—and the tables turned. Henceforth, therefore, these substances may be used in the construction of apparatus. Neither during their use nor at other times could the slightest trace of electrical or magnetic effects be obtained. At the same trials it was readily ascertained that one person could produce the effect; and that the motion was not necessarily circular, but might be in a straight line. No form of experiment or mode of observation that I could devise gave me the slightest indication of any peculiar natural force. No attractions, or repulsions, or signs of tangential power, appeared—nor anything which could be referred to other than the mere mechanical pressure exerted inadvertently by the turner. I therefore proceeded to analyse this pressure, or that part of it exerted in a horizontal direction—doing so, in the first instance, unawares to the party. A soft cement, of wax and turpentine, or wax and pomatum, was prepared. Four or five pieces of smooth, slippery cardboard were attached one over the other by little pellets of the cement, and the lower of these to a piece of sand-paper resting on the table; the edges of these sheets overlapped slightly, and on the under surface a pencil line was drawn over the laps, so as to indicate position. The upper cardboard was larger than the rest, so as to cover the whole from sight. Then, the table-turner placed the hands upon the upper card—and we waited for the result. Now, the cement was strong enough to offer considerable resistance to mechanical motion, and also to retain the cards in any new position which they might acquire—and yet weak enough to give way slowly to a continued force. When at last the tables, cards, and hands all moved to the left together, and so a true result was obtained, I took up the pack. On examination, it was easy to see, by the displacement of the parts of the line, that the hand had moved further than the table, and that the latter had lagged behind; that the hand, in fact, had pushed the upper card to the left, and that the under cards and the table had followed and been dragged by it. In other similar cases when the table had not moved, still the upper card was found to have moved, showing that the hand had carried it in the expected direction. It was evident, therefore, that the table had not drawn the hand and person round, nor had it moved simultaneously with the hand. The hand had left all things under it behind, and the table evidently tended continually to keep the hand back.

The next step was to arrange an index, which should show whether the table moved first, or the hand moved before the table, or both moved or remained at rest together. At first this was done by placing an upright pin fixed on a leaden foot upon the table, and using that as the fulcrum of a light lever. The latter was made of a slip of foolscap paper, and the short arm, about a quarter of an inch in length, was attached to a pin proceeding from the edge of a slipping card placed on the table, and prepared to receive the hands of the table-turner. The other arm, of 11½ inches long, served for the index of motion. A coin laid on the table marked the normal position of the card and index. At first the slipping card was attached to the table by the soft cement, and the index was either screened from the turner, or the latter looked away; then, before the table moved, the index showed that the hand was giving a resultant pressure in the expected direction. The effect was never carried far enough to move the table, for the motion of the index corrected the judgment of the experimenter, who became aware that, inadvertently, a side force had been exerted. The card was now set free from the table—i. e., the cement was removed. This, of course, could not interfere with any of the results expected by the table-turner—for both the bundle of plates spoken of and single cards had been freely moved on the tables before; but now that the index was there, witnessing to the eye, and through it to the mind, of the table-turner, not the slightest tendency to motion either of the card or of the table occurred. Indeed, whether the card was left free or attached to the table, all motion or tendency to motion was gone. In one particular case there was relative motion between the table and the hands: I believe that the hands moved in one direction; the table-turner was persuaded that the table moved from under the hand in the other direction—a gauge, standing upon the floor, and pointing to the table, was therefore set up on that and some future occasions—and then neither motion of the hand nor of the table occurred.

A more perfect lever apparatus was then constructed in the following manner: Two thin boards, 9½ inches by 7 inches, were provided; a board, 9 by 5 inches, was glued to the middle of the under-side of one of these (to be called the table-board), so as to raise the edges free from the table; being placed on the table, near and parallel to its side, an upright pin was fixed close to the further edge of the board, at the middle, to serve as the fulcrum for the indicating lever. Then, four glass rods, 7 inches long and ¼ in diameter, were placed as rollers on different parts of this table-board, and the upper board placed on them; the rods permitted any required amount of pressure on the boards, with a free motion of the upper on the lower to the right and left. At the part corresponding to the pin in the lower board, a piece was cut out of the upper board, and a pin attached there, which, being bent downwards, entered the hole in the end of the short arm of the index lever: this part of the lever was of cardboard; the indicating prolongation was a straight hay-stalk fifteen inches long. In order to restrain the motion of the upper board on the lower, two vulcanised rubber rings were passed round both, at the parts not resting on the table: these, whilst they tied the boards together, acted also as springs; and whilst they allowed the first feeblest tendency to motion to be seen by the index, exerted, before the upper board had moved a quarter of an inch, sufficient power in pulling the upper board back from either side, to resist a strong lateral action of the hand. All being thus arranged, except that the lever was away, the two boards were tied together with string, running parallel to the vulcanised rubber springs, so as to be immovable in relation to each other. They were then placed on the table, and a table-turner sat down to them: the table very shortly moved in due order, showing that the apparatus offered no impediment to the action. A like apparatus, with metal rollers, produced the same result under the hands of another person. The index was now put into its place and the string loosened, so that the springs should come into play. It was soon seen, with the party that could will the motion in either direction

(from whom the index was purposely hidden), that the hands were gradually creeping up in the direction before agreed upon, though the party certainly thought they were pressing downwards only. When shown that it was so, they were truly surprised; but when they lifted up their hands and immediately saw the index return to its normal position, they were convinced. When they looked at the index and could see for themselves whether they were pressing truly downwards, or obliquely so as to produce a resultant in the right or left-handed direction, then such an effect never took place. Several tried, for a long while together, and with the best will in the world; but no motion, right or left, of the table or hand, or anything else, occurred.—[A passage from the letter in the Times is worth re-producing here, as illustrating in other words the value of this method of self-conviction: “The result,” says Professor Faraday, “was, that when the parties saw the index it remained very steady; when it was hidden from them, or they looked away from it, it wavered about, though they believed that they always pressed directly downwards; and when the table did not move, there was still a resultant of hand force in the direction in which it was wished the table should move—which, however, was exercised quite unwittingly by the party operating. This resultant it is which, in the course of the waiting time, while the fingers and hands become stiff, numb, and insensible by continued pressure, grows up to an amount sufficient to move the table or the substances pressed upon. But the most valuable effect of this test apparatus (which was made more perfect and independent of the table) is the corrective power it possesses over the mind of the table-turner. As soon as the index is placed before the most earnest, and they perceive—as in my presence they have always done—that it tells truly whether they are pressing downwards only or obliquely, then all effects of table-turning cease, even though the parties persevere, earnestly desiring motion, till they become weary and worn out. No prompting or checking of the hands is needed—the power is gone: and this only because the parties are made conscious of what they are really doing mechanically, and so are unable unwittingly to deceive themselves. I know that some may say that it is the cardboard next the fingers which moves first, and that it both drags the table and also the table-turner with it. All I have to reply is, that the cardboard may in practice be reduced to a thin sheet of paper weighing only a few grains, or to a piece of goldbeaters’ skin, or even the end of the lever, and (in principle) to the very cuticle of the fingers itself. Then the results that follow are too absurd to be admitted: the table becomes an incumbrance, and a person holding out the fingers in the air, either naked or tipped with goldbeaters’ skin or cardboard, ought to be drawn about the room, &c.; but I refrain from considering imaginary yet consequent results which have nothing philosophical or real in them.”]

Another form of index was applied thus: A circular hole was cut in the middle of the upper board, and a piece of cartridge-paper pasted under it on the lower surface of the board; a thin slice of cork was fixed on the upper surface of the lower board corresponding to the cartridge-paper; the interval between them might be a quarter of an inch, or less. A needle was fixed into the end of one of the index hay-stalks, and when all was in place the needle point was passed through the cartridge-paper and pressed slightly into the cork beneath, so as to stand upright: then any motion of the hand, or hand-board, was instantly rendered evident by the deflection of the perpendicular hay-stalk to the right or left.

I think the apparatus I have described may be useful to many who really wish to know the truth of nature, and would prefer that truth to a mistaken conclusion—desired, perhaps, only because it seems to be new or strange. Persons do not know how difficult it is to press directly downward, or in any given direction, against a fixed obstacle; or even to know only whether they are doing so or not; unless they have some indicator, which, by visible motion or otherwise, shall instruct them: and this is more especially the case when the muscles of the fingers and hand have been cramped and rendered either tingling, or insensible, or cold, by long continued pressure. If a finger be pressed constantly into the corner of a window frame for ten minutes or more, and then, continuing the pressure, the mind be directed to judge whether the force at a given moment is all horizontal, or all downward, or how much is in one direction and how much in the other, it will find great difficulty in deciding; and will at last become altogether uncertain—at least, such is my case. I know that a similar result occurs with others; for I have had two boards arranged, separated, not by rollers, but by plugs of vulcanised rubber, and with the vertical index. When a person with his hands on the upper board is requested to press only downwards, and the index is hidden from his sight, it moves to the right, to the left, to him and from him, and in all horizontal directions; so utterly unable is he strictly to fulfil his intention without a visible and correcting indicator.

Now, such is the use of the instrument with the horizontal index and rollers. The mind is instructed, and the involuntary, or quasi involuntary motion, is checked in the commencement—and therefore never rises up to the degree needful to move the table, or even permanently the index itself. No one can suppose, that looking at the index can in any way interfere with the transfer of electricity, or any other power from the hand to the board under it, or to the table. If the board tends to move—it may do so—the index does not confine it; and if the table tends to move, there is no reason why it should not. If both were influenced by any power, to move together, they may do so; as they did, indeed, when the apparatus was tied, and the mind and muscles left unwatched and unchecked.

I must bring this long description to a close. I am a little ashamed of it—for I think, in the present age, and in this part of the world, it ought not to have been required. Nevertheless, I hope it may be useful. There are many whom I do not expect to convince; but I may be allowed to say, that I cannot undertake to answer such objections as may be made. I state my own convictions as an experimental philosopher, and find it no more necessary to enter into controversy on this point than on any other in science, as the nature of matter, or inertia, or the magnetisation of light, on which I may differ from others. The world will decide, sooner or later, in all such cases, and I have no doubt very soon and correctly in the present instance. Those who may wish to see the particular construction of the test apparatus which I have employed, may have the opportunity at Mr. Newman's, 122, Regent Street. Further, I may say, I have sought earnestly for cases of lifting by attraction, and indications of attraction in any form, but have gained no traces of such effects.

HOPE.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

WHAT is Hope?—The beauteous sun,
Which colours all it shines upon;
The beacon of life's dreary sea,
The star of immortality!—
Fountain of feelings young and warm;
A day-beam bursting through the storm:
A tone of melody, whose birth
Is, oh!—too sweet—too pure for earth!—
A blossom of that radiant tree
Whose fruit the angels only see!—
A beauty and a charm, whose power
Is seen—enjoyed—confessed—each hour!—
A portion of that world to come,

When earth and ocean meet the last o'erwhelming doom.

ESSAYS.

NO. CXIV.—POPULAR LOVE-SONGS.

THE love-songs of a people must be considered as strongly illustrative of their character. They inform us of the real condition of the national sentiment—for not only do they show us that love is the guardian passion of all the aims of life, but that it is the first and last that agitates society; that it flourishes in all communities, from the most barbarous up to the most polished. The untutored Indian or African trills his love-lay as earnestly as a Spanish cavalier.

The study of love-songs, even at the first blush, is therefore prepossessing. And if we were to enter upon the investigation of them with diligence, we have not the slightest doubt that we should meet with materials for graver reflections than those aroused by passing criticism on the amatory exertions of different nations and races. The philosopher would be presented with the fact, in an interesting variety of aspects, that the love-songs of a people are exact indices to their true social and moral condition.

His historical discriminations would be wonderfully strengthened—for he would find the character of the age he was depicting described in its love-ballads. He would be enabled to perceive whether the political or moral—we might add, material circumstances of the time, inclined the people to gravity or gaiety; ascertain the prevailing tone of society to the slightest vibration, and form some tolerably correct estimate of its mental health and tendencies.

The first love-songs—and probably the sweetest, because the least artificial—were the pastoral. They represented the people in such a state of primitiveness that they regarded the passion in the simple and natural sense of the union of the sexes. Then came the classic form of love-song—the least pure of all, because dimmed and sullied by exotic exuberances of thought. After them we have the sad and mysterious class—wild fantasies played on the imagination in ages of religious frenzy or scholastic subtleties. Then we have the last, and perhaps more pretentious style of this kind of composition—the romances of the minstrels who skillfully adapt their productions to the morbid tendencies that pervade society when cultivated up to a certain point of development. We are surrounded by these songs in the present day; they are, indeed, the popular love-songs of the English in one of their most enlightened eras. An examination, therefore, of our popular love-songs will not be devoid of interest.

The genuine love-song—the thrilling, passionate address of one young heart to another—we are sorry to say we cannot find, except among the lays of Ireland and Scotland, some of which are of modern origin—at all events, not later than the time of Burns and Tom Moore in his glory. Modern song-writers have failed to interpret the language of love, glowing and ardent as the month of June. "Meet me by moonlight" is the nearest approach to that class of song; and the young of both sexes are obliged to be old-fashioned in their musical selections, or not sing at all, but make love in good, honest, plain-spoken prose—a task for which some men are unfitted; for, when the "pliant hour" arrives, they are tongue-tied—bashfulness—or, as a modern ballad-writer would phrase it, "the wild agony of that passion hour"—strikes them dumb. Now, a pretty little song, even if badly sung, would enable the poor fellow to easily overcome this difficulty—for we have observed that those who cannot talk well are generally good singers. Their diffidence vanishes under the inspiration of music.

Now, of the songs appropriate to the passion, in brightest as well as most unaffected form, there is scarcely one in the whole range of modern love-songs. "The moon is on the waters" approaches the nearest to the description of song we are alluding to, and the last two verses are really pretty.

Thou wert dear to me in childhood,
When the rosebud on its tree,
As it blossomed in the wild wood,
Was an emblem, love, of thee.
In thy youth thou wert still dearer—
With the dawn of reason came,
Thoughts that brought thee to me nearer,
Though they bore not yet love's name.
But thy womanhood unfolding,
Won the secret from my heart,
And my life was in thy holding,
For 'twas death from thee to part.
I have loved thee, gentle Mary,
I have loved thee through the past,
And loved thee fortune vary,
I will love thee to the last.

But why the moon on the waters? We always thought the lady planet was in the sky. But exaggeration and perversions of facts are common to all modern song-writers; and while pointing to the absence of real passionate expressions of love in the form of a ballad, it may be assumed that the fact is perhaps the less to be lamented, for this very reason. Purity and correctness of language are essential to success in every description of composition, and what are called "poet's licences" are no more than vulgar liberties taken with common sense and classic propriety. Having, therefore, before us convincing testimony that this kind of song-writing has wofully degenerated since the days when our great English singers flourished, let us endeavour to ascertain the true character of those that have been presented to us within the past ten or a dozen years.

First, there is the fairy song, originally introduced to the public by a young lady in almost ethereal costume. Here is a sample of one.

Child of earth, with the golden hair,
Thy soul's too pure, and thy face too fair,
To dwell with creatures of mortal mould,
Whose lips are warm as their hearts are cold.
Room, room to our fairy home,
Child of earth, with the golden hair.

Now this red-haired young gentleman is invited to dance with the fairy queen, through summer nights, on the moonlit green; and in another of these invitations to live on nothing.

Come, roam with me,
'Neath the greenwood tree,
Where the young spring flowers are bright and fair;
Where life does seem
As a summer dream,
For mirth and jay have their dwelling there.

Thy home shall be,
Where the young rose-tree
Is shedding its softest fragrance round;
And the pearls that lie,
In the violet's eye,
Shall smile like stars from the mossy ground.

This favourite of the forest nymphs is to sup on the low wails of nightingales, and breakfast on the matin lays of larks. He is to enjoy none of the solid advantages which the mad Assyrian king had during his pastoral abnegation. Nothing more substantial than the perfume the flow'ret's leaf sheds on the summer air is allowed him to recruit his strength, after a night of incessant jiggling on the greensward. A week of such banquetting, we opine, would bring his red locks in sorrowful grey to the grave. But these are fairy songs—semi-spiritualised scraps of poetry—intended to attune our souls to celestial symphonies, and wake in us a sympathy for the unseen, but believed in, of the pagan world. It is not intended that the gentleman in wiry red hair shall leave the earth. But stay—what is this?

Come to my fairy home,
Deep in the crystal wave,
Where the dolphin glides, through the glassy tides,
And the mermaid loves to lave,
Come, come, &c.

A diving-bell would be indispensable on such a visit, but as it could not be protracted beyond a couple of hours, there would only be sufficient time to snatch a kiss and quaff a bowl of sea-wine. And these are the fairy love-songs—the sweet, tripping things that etherealise the domestic atmosphere, and convert even staid matrons into buxom May-queens, perpetually asking somebody to "come and roam with them." It must be confessed that these are the flimsiest of the modern love-songs. As to their spirituality, we should probably be able to discern some of the commodity had we slept for a couple of nights among the young spring-flowers and never sneezed the whole time, or afterwards had an attack of acute rheumatism. But all these gossamer absurdities as compositions must eventually be classed as the trashiest of the trashy. They have neither sentiment nor meaning, and the music that they have been set to is a jingle—a mellifluous cheat—in short a

Roam, roam, to our fairy home,
Child of earth with the golden hair.

Either the poet or the composer must have had a natural fancy for that most indigestible of esculents—the carrot—or they would scarcely have been so violent in their predilection, especially when the rage among young ladies at present is for dark men. But as there is no accounting for the tastes of modern poets—the poor things must be allowed to indulge their emasculated pens in every licence—we will take a short ramble among their more material exertions. Let us venture into the region of earthly sentiment. Why, apprentices, lachrymously aspiring to the hands of their masters' daughters, and because the young ladies are not fascinated with their winning manners, they forthwith dissolve into verse, and declare they would not beguile them from their homes, or ask them to resign kindred and friends for poverty and grief. How generous! Then we have artists—not Royal Academicians, but gentlemen behind hair and assurance—bursting with agony, or going into fits, because haughty barons have sternly refused them their only children—extremely susceptible creatures, of course—in marriage. These dismal lovers twang their afflictions in this manner:

They told her to forget me,
To think of me no more;
They hinted they had known me
Win other hearts before.
They bade her never mention
My hated name again,
And should she ever meet me,
To pass me with disdain.

They told her, &c.

A baron rich and haughty
Stood smiling by her side,
Her father's word was given—
He led her forth a bride.
One smile she gave, which faded
Like the sun's last parting ray
Her sweet, sad spirit trembled—
And she was lifeless clay.

They told her, &c.

Sometimes they grow desperate—alarmingly so

I'll speak of thee—I'll love thee, too,
Fondly, and with affection too,
Pure as yon sky's celestial blue
My love shall be—my love shall be!
In sunshine, and though clouds shall lour,
In mirth and sorrow's sadd'ning hour,
While memory lives, and love has power,
I'll speak of thee—I'll speak of thee!

If he speaks well, neither the police nor an attorney will interfere with his utterances; but if he commits himself to an aspersion, we would not answer for his liberty—or, a choleric brother being in the way, the safety of his sensitive carcass. Talking of sensitiveness, here is a young gentleman snivelling away at a famous rate:

And wilt thou weep when I am low,
Sweet lady?—speak those words again;
Yet, if they grieve thee, say not so—
I would not give that bosom pain.
My heart is sad—my hopes are gone;
My blood runs coldly through my breast,
And when I perish, thou alone
Wilt weep above my place of rest.

When the affections of a lady of this class of sentimentalists have been blighted, as she terms it—although her parents have only interfered to prevent her making a fool of herself, by throwing herself away on some adventurer—she thus pours out her woes:

I'll never wed another—
He's treasure'd in my heart;
No force the flame can smother,
'Till life itself depart.
The sun seems dim and clouded,
And in a mantle drear
The vale appears enshrouded,
If he I love's not near.

I'll never, &c.

"I'll never wed another." So we once heard a young lady say, but luckily she did not keep her word. She had fallen in love, as she thought, with an interesting being in a pale face, raven locks, and slim figure. None of her friends knew him, and he did not seem to be known by anybody. But she liked mystery, and she loved him. Oh, her love was so hot that it was never to be quenched but in the grave! Vesuvius was nothing to it. Well, her father, prying old gentleman, must needs watch her movements, and lo! one evening, he discovered the interesting being on his knees at her feet, piling very high indeed. He was urging her to elope. The father, angry old gentleman, kicked him out of doors, and locked her up in her room. She vowed she would never marry another. The father—positive old gentleman—said: "We shall see!" The interesting being vanished, for he was never more seen in the neighbourhood. The father, persevering old gentleman, obtained the services of Mr. Langley, the detective, and the interesting being was traced to a garret in the vicinity of the Old Kent Road. He was an artist in hair—a barber out of employ—but who wished to dispose of his rather well-looking person to the best advantage. The young lady declared all her family had entered into a conspiracy against her happiness, and the interesting being was a martyr. She would never wed another—no, that she wouldn't! The father said: "We shall see!" At the end of three years this romantic girl was the mother of three children, two of whom were twins, and she had a fine-looking husband and a very nice home. She was happy and prosperous. One day—it was a little before her marriage, and she was humming that pathetic ballad, "Thou art gone from my gaze like a beautiful dream"—we say one day, her father, funny old gentleman, took her to a very narrow street, and pointed out to her a very little shop, at the door of which stood a young gentleman in pale face, raven locks, and slim figure; but his coat was off, and a snow-white apron was girded about his loins. It was the interesting being, in propria persona, trembling and looking pale and foolish, as the old gentleman good-humouredly shook his stick at him.

"Take me home!" whispered the daughter: and thus ended all her fondness for mystery, pale faces, and raven locks, without the accompaniments of either brains or cash.

But the fault all rests with these songs. They encourage girls to be silly, and induce them to think any rascal interesting—in fact, a hero—provided he can luxuriate in an abundance of black hair, some good looks and impudence. We are certain they contribute largely to bring about unequal and improvident marriages; for, by weakening woman's moral power—which unquestionably they do, by appealing to her weaker passions—her charity, forbearance, indulgence, and such like—they render her more subservient to those improper influences which always do pervade society, than is proper or beautiful, either for herself, in the present and future, or her family, good name, and, looking at the awful results which flow from a number of such cases, the welfare of the community at large. Even if no evil consequences to morals flowed from a circulation of such sentimental rubbish—which we emphatically deny—the very slightness of its texture, its flimsiness, is mischievous, because it is sure to provoke weakness. Feed an Englishman on slops, and see how soon he becomes miserable and attenuated. It is the same with the mental and moral diet. If either is vitiated, the constitution must be impaired. With girls and young women the damage is infinitely greater, because they are intended to be the wives and mothers of the next generation. Look at the vicious effect, on the mind of a young girl, of the song, "When I heard he was married." When the doleful tidings reached her, she was at a banquet, and, immediately fancying that her grief would be derided, she calls to her cheek a smile, which was an effort of pride. But the moment the feast was over,

I rush'd to my chamber, deserted, alone!
I tore the bright circlet of gems from my hair;
I wept not—I sank down in tearless despair!
Yet the ball and the banquet again I have sought,
I have tried to escape from the anguish of thought,
None knew for his welfare in prayer how I dwelt;
All thought me unfeeling—none knew what I felt—
When I heard he was married!
When I heard he was married!

Accompanying this precious morsel is "We met; 'twas in a crowd"—which refers to his eye being upon her, and a mother being the cause of all this anguish.

Now all this is worse than being ridiculous—it is offensive to good taste and propriety. It depicts a young lady in a most unmaidenly state of mind. She has no pride, no dignity, no scorn for a male jilt—the most detestable creature that creeps about the world. And she covets that jilt, although he is married. Monstrous! But, thank goodness! such girls are not very numerous. When once wronged and insulted by a heartless fellow, they may grieve a little at first; but they do not tear gems from their curls of jet. Young ladies like their jewellery too well for that nonsense. Nor do they go about nunlike and weeping. All such representations are fictions—the fictions of the modern ballad-monger. But if the one sex is in a miserable and equivocal light, the other is actually impaled on the horns of ridicule. He is depicted either as tearing his hair and blubbering like a schoolboy who has just tasted the rod, or howling, maniac-like, that he "sees her dancing in the hall," or he is exhorting all man and womankind to Love not, love not—the thing you love may die!

As if, because for the wise ends of Providence death comes some day to claim all of us, we are not to love one another—not to love our sweethearts, our wives, our children, our friends—not to endeavour to make our lot lighter and more hopeful—but to sit down in the chimney-corner, in surly despair. That is sheer atheism—but it is too wicked for lengthened criticism or censure.

The disconsolate gentleman sometimes is depicted as going in quest of the "beautiful maid of his soul."

I seek her on every shore,
I seek her, alas! but in vain:
In the cabin where oft we have met,
On the waves of the white-crested main.
I have sought her alone through the world,
My anguish I never control—
She is gone, she is lost, she is lost, she is dead!
The beautiful maid of my soul!

And then, when he finds further search is useless, he twaddles his grief in this fashion:

Thou art gone from my gaze, like a beautiful dream,
And I seek thee in vain by meadow and stream;
Oft I breathe thy dear name to the winds floating by,
But thy sweet voice is mute to my bosom's love-sigh.

If this is not regret and melancholy run to seed—reduced to snivelling and drivelling, like an idiot who cannot find the gilded toy he has hidden—in the name of patience what is it? But listen to a burst of song by a man, and from the lyre of a true poet:

Though I leave thee now in sorrow,
Smiles might light on love to-morrow,
Doomed to part, my faithful heart,
A gleam of joy from hope shall borrow;
Ah! ne'er forget when friends are near,
That heart is thine for ever:
Thou mayst find those will love thee, dear,
But not a love like mine, oh never!

Such a strain as this is refreshing—it is a draught of pure sentiment from the undefiled well of the heart. So is the following, which we recommend to the study of the gentleman who is one day seeing her dancing in the hall—another frantically raving, "She is gone, she is lost, she is dead." Gracious powers! what an explosion of gones and losts! Although two hundred and fifty years old, it is as fresh, manly, and English-like as ever.

Shall I, wasting in despair,
Dio because a woman's fair;
Shall my cheeks look pale with care,
If another's rosy are?
Be she fairer than the day,
Or the dewy meads in May,
If she think not well of me,
What care I how fair she be.

Shall a woman's goodness move
Me to perish for her love:
Or her worthy merits know,
Make me quite forget my own?
Be she kinder, meeker than
The lovely dove or pelican
If she be not so to me,
What care I how kind she be.

Be she kind, or meek, or fair,
I will ne'er the more despair;
If she love me, this believe,
I will die ere she shall grieve,
If she slight me when I woo,
I will scorn—and let her go.
If she be not made for me,
What care I, for whom she be.

We think by this time our selections are numerous enough to justify our censure and ridicule of the modern English love-songs. We denounce them as puerile, puling, affected, and false; and some of them as flavoured love disappointment with the gin-and-water grief which afflicts a sot after the fourth quartet. Their utterances are not sad when sorrow is intended, or joyful when bright hopes are expected to be realised. They have a marvellous tendency to jib, and get up a snivel in a corner, just for the sake of the thing. Besides, they are paucity and poor in character. The invention is execrable, and while they enervate and lower the tone of one sex, they exhibit the other like so many calves just frue their mummies. We never witness—as sometimes we are obliged out of courtesy to do—a great, strapping, grenadier-looking young man, with whiskers that Sampson or Hercules would have coveted, exhibiting himself as going about the earth and the seas in quest of the "beautiful maid of his soul," and then warbling plaintively a promise, that when he had found her he "would not beguile her from her home—oh, no, no, no!" but we fancy we see before us nothing more than an elongation of the chubby boy who cried because he could not eat any more pudding. "The child is father of the man." Of a verity, in these days such a lover is the annihilation of every idea of LOVE. J. P. H.

FACETIÆ.

A money-hunter being about to marry a fortune, a friend asked him how long the honeymoon would last. He replied: "Don't tell me of the honeymoon—it is the harvest-moon with me!"

Why is a belle like a locomotive? Because she sends off the sparks, transports the mails, says to the tender, pine knot, is often followed by a train, and passes over the plain.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS.—A child, upon whom it would seem the examples made amongst the animal productions had not been lost, upon being taken to visit an aunt, recently confined with twins, raised the artless inquiry of "Which does dear aunty mean to keep?"

"Do you believe in second love, Mither Macquade?" "Do I believe in second love! Humph, if a man buys a pound of sugar, isn't it sweet? and when it's gone, don't he want another pound? and isn't that pound sweet, too? Troth, I believe in second love!"

"WHO! SAAVIN."—"This world's a wilderness of woe," as the omnibus horse said when the driver stopped him at every corner.

AN urchin being sent for a pennyworth of Macaboy snuff, forgot the name of the article, and asked the man for a pennyworth of make-a-boy-sneeze.

Why is an oyster the greatest paradox in the world? Because it has a mouth, but no teeth—a beard, but no chin, and is taken out of bed to be tucked in.

A witty lawyer once jocosely asked a boarding-house keeper the following question: "Mr. —, if a man gives you £500 to keep for him, and dies, what do you do? Do you pray for him?" "No, sir," replied Mr. —, "I pray for another like him."

"THERE'S a plaguy sight of truth in them ere old proverbs. They are distilled facts steamed down to an essence. They are like portable soup, an amazin' deal o' matter in a small compass. They are as true as a plumb-line, and as short and sweet as sugar-candy."

A lazy fellow being asked what was the height of his ambition? replied, "To marry a rich widow that's got a cough!"

A celebrated wit was asked why he did not marry a young lady to whom he was much attached. "I know not," he replied, "except the great regard we have for each other."

MRS. FARRINGTON advises her friends to take no stock in caloric ships at present, as she is satisfied that the period is not far distant when steamboats and locomotives will be propelled by the force of moral suasion.

A pickpocket was captured in Leeds, by a most ingenious device. He had stolen some money from a female, who, afraid of charging him with the theft on the spot, quietly stuck a pin in his smock frock, and informed the police, who, from her description, soon arrested the culprit, with the tell-tale pin exactly where the quick-witted woman had placed it.

LIQUOR LAW IN SWEDEN.—In Sweden, whoever is drunk is fined for the first offence, 3 dollars; for the second, 6 dollars; for the third or fourth, imprisonment is added to the fine, and deprivation of the right of voting at the elections, or holding office, and exposure in the church on Sunday. If the same individual is found committing the same offence a fifth time, he is imprisoned six months, and condemned to hard labour.

A NEW TEST.—A young lady, a fervent believer in sympathy, magnetism, moving tables, &c., &c., after hesitating for some time between two aspirants for her favour, discovering that when one of her admirers joined her in the experiment, the table was moved ten minutes sooner than with the other, decided on accepting the hand of the former: this proving to her, satisfactorily, that there was more sympathy between them than between her and his less fortunate rival.

To cure palpitation of the heart, procure a young woman—alive! and, having ascertained the region of the heart, press the organ closely against your own, until the pain ceases. For regimen, use cooling drinks and moonlight—about half-and-half.

THEY tell a good story of an old-fashioned, wealthy codger. He was never known to have anything in the line of new apparel but once: then he was going on a journey, and had to purchase a new pair of boots. The stage left before day, and so he got ready, and went to the hotel to stop for the night. Among a whole row of boots, in the morning, he could not find the old familiar pair. He had forgotten the new ones; he hunted and hunted in vain. The stage was ready, and so he looked carefully round to see that he was not observed, put on a nice pair that fitted him, called the waiter, and told him the circumstance, giving him 10s. for the owner of the boots, when he should call for them. The owner never called! The old gent had bought his own boots!

A lady who has paid some attention to small matters, says she always watches with much interest the ingress and egress of husbands and wives to and from the dining and drawing-rooms of fashionable hotels. "If," said she, "the wives enter and depart a little in advance of their husbands, be sure, they wear the 'Oh-no-we-never-mention-ems.' If, on the contrary, the husbands take the lead, you may rest assured they take the lead in everything else." This idea to us is perfectly original, and we shall be somewhat particular hereafter, in satisfying ourselves of the truth of such significant signs. And we shall take care to lead off, too!

PERPETUAL MOTION.—About a dozen times a year, or once a month regularly, an announcement is made in all the papers that Mr. Somebody, a "very ingenious mechanic," has discovered perpetual motion. The statement creates quite a sensation for the time being, and we hear no more of it till Mr. Somebody else makes a similar discovery. The absurdity of the thing is so egregious that it is astonishing people can continue to be humbugged by it. When a man can create a living animal, or get into a tub and lift himself up with it by the handles, we shall believe in the possibility of perpetual motion.

DR. JOHNSON'S wigs were in general very shabby, and their fore-parts were burned away by the near approach of the candle, which his short-sightedness rendered necessary in reading. At Streatham, Mr. Thrale's butler always had a wig ready; and as Johnson passed from the drawing-room, when dinner was announced, the servant would remove the ordinary wig, and replace it with the newer one; and this ludicrous ceremony was performed every day.

A CLOSE CALCULATION.—That wonderful plant called the aloe, which blooms only once in a hundred years, will be exhibited in full flower at the opening of the Crystal Palace. The exhibitor bases his calculation upon the fact of its having bloomed the year before last, and he reckons, if the directors do not relax their efforts, that it will be about the aloe's time to flower again when the palace is ready.

THE BARRISTER MATCHED.—At a late Quarter Sessions, a man was brought up by a farmer, and accused of stealing some ducks. The farmer said he should know them anywhere, and went on to describe their peculiarity. "Why," said the counsel for the prisoner, "they can't be such a rare breed—I have some like them in my yard." "That's very likely, sir," said the farmer; "they are not the only ducks I have had stolen lately."

THE "State of Matrimony" has at last been bounded and described by some Western student, who says: It is bounded by hugging and kissing on one side, and cradles and babies on the other side. Its chief productions are population, broom-sticks, and staying out late o' nights. It was discovered by Adam and Eve, while trying to find a north-west passage out of Paradise. The climate is sultry till you pass the tropics of house-keeping, when squally weather sets in with such power as to keep all hands cool as cucumbers. For the principal roads leading to this interesting state, consult the first pair of blue eyes you meet.

SOME years ago, two aged men near Marshaltown, traded, or, according to the Virginia parlance, "swapped horses" on this condition: That on that day week the one who thought he had the best of the bargain, should pay to the other two bushels of wheat. The day came, and as it happened, they met about half-way between their respective homes. "Where art thou going?" said one. "To thy house with the wheat," answered the other. "And whither art thou riding?" "Truly," replied the first, "I was taking the wheat to thy house." Each pleased with his bargain, had thought the wheat justly due to his neighbour, and was going to pay it.

DONALD'S MISTAKE.—A Highlander, after receiving his week's wages one Saturday night, treated himself to a glass, and hurried to the railway station to go off to join his family at some distance, he being yet strange in town. A crowd was pushing to the theatre at the time, and he unconsciously joined in the midst, paid his shilling with the others, and took his seat in the pit of the theatre. Donald was dazzled at the sight, and for a time sat staring around him, till he at length ventured to ask a person when the train would start? This brought on an explanation, which sent Donald to demand his "fare" back—which, however, was resisted, till he applied to the police, when the money was returned, and Donald put on his right road home.

FASHIONABLE ASSEMBLIES AT NEW YORK.—These balls take place in a large saloon; at the entrance, where on pay half a dollar, you are requested to leave your implements, by which are meant your bowie knives and revolvers; and you leave them as you would your overcoat on going into the opera, and get a ticket with their number, and on your going away they are returned to you. You hear the pistol and bowie-knife-keeper in the arms-room call out, "No. 45—a six-barrelled repeater." "No. 100—one eight-barrelled revolver and bowie knife, with a death's head and cross-bones cut on the handle." "No. 93—a brace of double-barrels." All this is done as naturally as possible, and you see fellows fasten on their knives and pistols as coolly as if they were tying on a comforter, or putting on a coat.

AN ECHO.—A recently married man, who espoused a lady a few years older than himself, on entering her dressing-room unexpectedly, found her bereaved, which she explained, by stating that a violent fever had deprived her of her hair some years ago.

TEST OF GOOD HUMOUR.—Wake a man up in the middle of the night, and ask him to lend you five shillings.—Punch.

FAST LADIES.—Her Majesty's Drawing-room was remarkable for the carriage of every lady who attended it; and it may be observed, that each one came in a special train.—Ibid.

THE AUTHOR OF SCOTCH BEER.—We lately read an advertisement of a book, entitled, "The Scottish Ale Brewer." The author's name is Roberts; but it ought to have been Mac Entire.—Ibid.

SENTIMENT FOR THE PEACE SOCIETY.—The thunder of war turns the milk of human kindness sour. Moreover, it may be said to spoil the beer of brotherly love.—Ibid.

ONE VIEW OF THE TURKISH QUESTION.—The Sublime Porte and the Emperor of Russia, regarded in an æsthetical point of view, present examples of the sublime and the ridiculous.—Ibid.

A QUESTION FOR A DEBATING SOCIETY.—Whether, in the event of Mr. Sands being subject, like Amina, to fits of somnambulism, it would be likely that he would walk in his sleep head downwards, with his feet on the ceiling?—Ibid.

A NEW TURN IN THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.—A real genuine out-and-out teetotaler says he likes this table-turning vastly; for, though it keeps folks to the table, still it keeps them from the bottle. "The table may go round," he says, "but the wine does not circulate." There may be more in this teetotaler's chuckle than wine-bibbers imagine. We ourselves have heard an instance of a wealthy City man, who is nearly as mean as the Marquis of Northminster, who spares his port regularly, by proposing to his company, as soon as the cloth is removed, that "they should try a little of this table-moving that is so much talked about." The decanters are removed, and he keeps his company with their fingers fixed upon the mahogany, until coffee is announced. We warn all persons who are in the habit of dining out, against lending their hands to this favourite trick.—Ibid.

A LIST OF INDEXES.

The following Indexes have been compiled by a gentleman who is rather strong in that useful, but much-sneered and little-read, department of literature. They are intended to keep in countenance the well-known "face," which is said to be "the Index of the Mind."

Cold Soup is the Index of a Bad Dinner.
A Bang of the door is the Index of a Storm.
A "Button off" is the sure Index of a Bachelor.
An Irish Debate is the Index of a Row.
A Popular Singer is the Index of a Cold.
A bright Poker is the Index of a Cold Hearth.
A Servant standing at the door is the Index of a Wasteful House.
The Painted Plate is the Index of the Hired Fly.
Duck, or Goose, is the Index of "a Small Glass of Brandy."
A Baby is the Index of a Kiss.
A Toast (after dinner) is the Index of Butter.
Cold Meat is, frequently, the Index of a Pudding.
A Governess is the Index of suffering, uncomplaining Poverty.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ENCHANTED MOUNTAIN IN TEXAS.—They have strange things in Texas, as well as wicked doings. The following account of a great natural curiosity in that country is from the Texas Telegraph: This singular mountain, or hill, is situated on the head waters of the Sallico—a small tributary of the Colorado, about eighty miles from Bastrop, in a north-westerly direction. It is about three hundred feet high, and appears to be an enormous oval rock, partially imbedded in the earth. When the sun shines, the light is reflected from its polished surface as from an immense mirror, and the whole mountain glows with such a dazzling radiance that the beholder who views it, even from a distance of four or five miles, is unable to gaze upon it without experiencing a painful sensation, similar to that which is felt when looking upon the rising sun. The ascent of the hill is so very gradual, that persons can easily walk up to the top; but the rock is so smooth and slippery that those who make the attempt are compelled to wear the moccasins or stockings instead of shoes. This act, together with the name of the place, Holy Mountain, reminds the visitor very forcibly of the command made to Moses at Mount Horeb, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet." The Cananians regard this hill with religious veneration, and Indian pilgrims frequently assemble from the remotest borders of the tribe to perform their Payuin rites upon its summit.

"EVERYWHERE, but in novels," says a recent writer, "the marriage of convenience has proved an excellent institution; while what are generally called 'love-matches' have been, are, and ever will be, prolific of misery. They spring from passion, and terminate in early satiety. The romance disappears—the sentiment subsides—the woman remains!"

CURIOUS RELATIONSHIP.—We had the pleasure of meeting lately a gentleman of this city, aged ninety-three years, and who was married, for the fifth time, not very long ago. If his eldest daughter were alive, she would have attained the age of seventy-one; while his youngest daughter, by his last wife, is only seven months of age. The eldest child referred to was married; and her daughter, if living, would have been a matron of fifty years of age; so that the infant of seven months would now have held the curious relationship of aunt to a niece of fifty.—Edinburgh Guardian.

It is a sign of wisdom never to be cast down by trifles. If a spider should break his thread twenty times, just twenty times will he not mend it again? Make up your mind to do a thing in compass, and you will assuredly accomplish it. Fear not, if trouble come upon you. Keep up your spirits, though the day be a dark one. Uniformity of temperament is a great blessing:

"Troubles never stop for ever,
The darkest day will pass away."

MOUNT ÆTNA IN WINTER.—I saw Mount Ætna in its winter character at the beginning of March, 1830. Three-fourths of the mountain—namely, the whole of the naked, and almost the whole of the wooded zones, lay beneath an unbroken covering of snow; while, at the base, all the fields were clothed in the brightest green of spring. Peas, beans, and flax were already in full blossom; the flowers of the almond had fallen, and given place to the leaves; and the fig-leaves were beginning to unfold. The meadows were decorated with hyacinths, narcissus, crocuses, anemones, and countless other flowers. Ætna stood there as an enormous cone of snow, with its base encircled by a gigantic wreath of flowers.—Schouw's Earth, Plants, and Man.

A SWEET REPOSE.

SHE sleeps amongst the pillows soft
(A dove, now wearied by her flight),
And all around and all aloft,
Hang flutes and folds of virgin white.
Her hair out-darkens the dark night,
Her glance outshines the starry sky;
But now her locks are hidden quite,
And closed is her fringed eye!

She sleepeth: wherefore does she start?
She sigheth: doth she feel no pain?
None, none! the Dream is near her heart!
The spirit of sleep is in her brain.
He cometh down like golden rain,
Without a wish, without a sound;
He cheers the sleeper (ne'er in vain)
Like May, when earth is winter-bound.

All day within some cave he lies,
Dethroned from his nightly sway,—
Far fading when the dawning skies
Our souls with wakening thoughts array.
Two Spirits of might doth man obey;
By each he's taught, from each he learns
The one is Lord of life by day;
Th' other when starry Night returns.

A MATERNAL TURKEY.—At Lochside, in the parish of Boyndie, there may be seen strutting about every day a fine turkey-cock, with a brood of fifteen young chickens and poults, which he tends with the utmost assiduity, searching out for them food, and defending them against all attacks. Such an exhibition of paternal fondness is not a little remarkable on the part of the turkey. What is still more remarkable, however, is that the whole of the young birds—chickens as well as poults—were hatched and reared by this same animal. His owner had observed him "sitting" on the "nest egg," and, by way of a freak, placed within the nest a number of eggs, both of turkeys and hens. The animal continued to sit, and scarcely left the objects of his solicitude until the whole were hatched! It is curious that the turkey-hen belonging to the same owner, though having access to the nest, never once presumed to molest or assist her mate in his self-imposed incubation. Nor does she now interfere with his management of the young family. On the contrary, animated either by a "Bloomer" spirit, or perhaps filled with a thorough contempt for so hen-hearted a spouse—she treats him and his family with the utmost apparent indifference, as if the one as well as the other were beneath her notice.—Banffshire Journal.

JUDGE NOT.—Not far removed from calumny, and often leading up to it, is injurious comment on people's conduct, which when addressed or repeated to them, or imagined by them, is apt to vex them sorely. But really if it were considered how utterly incompetent men are to talk of the conduct of others as they do, the talkers would often be silenced at once, and the sufferers as readily consoled. In the first place, how imperfect is our knowledge of our neighbours' circumstances. You suppose a man rich, and he is poor; or rich, but with perils, claims, and responsibilities of which you know nothing; you suppose him healthy, and he is tortured by some internal disease; you suppose him unhappy in his domestic relations, and he is most felicitous; or, on the other hand, you suppose him lapped in the loving regards of his family, and all the while he has a wretched contentious home; you suppose him a man of leisure, and he is cumbered with cares, duties, labours, and endeavours, of which you have not the slightest conception—what is your comment on this man's conduct worth?

INTEGRITY OF THE DOG.—The Almighty, who gave the dog to be the companion of our pleasure and our toil, hath invested him with a nature noble and incapable of deceit. He forgets neither friend nor foe—rememberers, and with accuracy, both benefit and injury. He hath a share of man's intelligence, but no share of man's falsehood. You may bribe a soldier to slay a man with his sword, or a witness to take life by false accusation; but you cannot make a hound tear his benefactor.

The editor of the Albany Evening Journal tells the following story, and draws a moral from it which young men should remember. A little fellow who put on a pair of skates for the first time, paid the usual penalty. Having hurt himself somewhat by the fall which he received, his brother advised him to "give it up." "No, I shan't give it up," was the reply; "I can learn to skate, and I will learn." And at it he went, with an energy and determination which bade defiance to apparent impossibilities. In twenty years from this time, that little fellow, if he lives, will have made his mark somewhere. A boy who will not "give up" a difficult job, but who will do it because he feels conscious that he can do it, has the ring of the true metal of manhood in his composition.

THE ELOQUENCE OF FLOWERS.—Amongst all the pleasant things of life—and the all-bountiful hand of Providence has scattered the path of our days with innumerable pleasant things, if man would but enjoy them—amongst all the pleasant things of life, there are few more pleasant than a walk in the flower-garden before breakfast on a sunny morning. To see those mute and still, though not motionless creatures—we mean the blossoms, opening their painted bosoms to the beneficent rays which give them their colour and their loveliness, welcoming the calm blessing of the light, as if with gratitude, and seeking, in their tranquil state of being, for nothing but the good gifts of God—might well afford a monitory lesson. Everything in nature has its homily, to the eager hunters after fictitious enjoyment. How calm do the blossoms stand in their loveliness! how placid in their limited fruition of the elements that nourish them! How, in their splendid raiment, do they sparkle in the sun; how do they drink up the cup of dew, and gratefully give back honey and perfume in return! Avoid that man, or that woman, who can see nothing beautiful in buds, blossoms, flowers, and children.

MARVELS OF THE CREATION.

The mariner who first crossed the central Atlantic in search of a new world, was astonished when, on the 19th of September, 1492, he found himself in the midst of that great bank of sea-weed—the sea-weed meadow of Oviedo—the Sargasso Sea, which, with a varying breadth of 100 to 300 miles, stretches over twenty-five degrees of latitude, covering 260,000 square miles of surface, like a huge floating garden, in which countless myriads of minute animals find food and shelter. Now, it is the eddy of the numerous sea rivers which collect in one spot; and the cold water of the Northern Atlantic mixing with the warm streams of the western and southern currents, which produce the temperature most fitted to promote this amazing development of vegetable and animal life. What becomes of the dead remains of this vast marine growth? Do they decompose as fast as they are produced? or do they accumulate into deposits of particular coal, destined to reward the researches of future geologists and engineers, when the Atlantic of our day has become the habitable land of an after-time?

In the chart of the Pacific Ocean, we are presented with another remarkable instance of the influence of sea rivers on vegetation. From the shores of South Victoria, on the Antarctic continent, a stream of cold water, 60 degrees in width (our readers will recollect that in high latitudes the degrees of longitude are very narrow), drifts slowly along in a north-east and easterly direction across the Southern Pacific, till it impinges upon the South American coast to the south of Valparaiso. There it divides into two arms: one of which stretches south and east, doubles Cape Horn, and penetrates into the south-western Atlantic; the other flows first north-east and then north-west, along the shores of Chili and Peru, carrying colder waters into the warm sea, and producing a colder air along the low plains which stretch from the shores of the Pacific to the base of the Andes. This current, discovered by Humboldt, and called after his name, lowers the temperature of the air about twelve degrees; while that of the water itself is sometimes as much as twenty-four degrees colder than that of the still waters of the ocean through which it runs.

The cold air seriously affects the vegetation along the whole of this coast; at the same time that the cold stream raises fogs and mists, which not only conceal the shores and perplex the navigator, but extend inland also, and materially modify the climate. The beautiful and beneficent character of this modifying influence becomes not only apparent, but most impressive, when we consider, as the rain map of the world shows us, that on the coast of Peru no rain ever falls; and that, like the desert of Sahara, it ought therefore to be condemned to perpetual barrenness. But in consequence of the cold stream thus running along its borders, the atmosphere loses its transparency, and the sun is obscured for months together.

The vapours at Lima are often so thick, that the sun seen through them with the naked eye assumes the appearance of the moon's disc. They commence in the morning and extend over the plains in the form of refreshing fogs, which disappear soon after mid-day, and are followed by heavy dews, which are precipitated during the night. The morning mists and the evening dews thus supply the place of the absent rains; and the verdure which covers the plains is the offspring of a sea-river.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. S.—All letters and communications intended for the Editor of the LONDON JOURNAL must be addressed to him at the office, 334, Strand.

MESEMERIC.—Our opinion of Mesmerism has already been published. There is no mystery in it, and when its revelations are more complete, we shall have ample evidence to explain away many an old superstition.

SETHON.—The education of officers in the army is under very stringent regulations. The examination includes French, Latin, and the mathematics. You had better be guided by your parents.

ALBERT.—Dumas's novel of "Monte Christo" was quite completed. The dénouement is remarkably perfect. The fate of the hero is left to the imagination, and very properly so—for it was more skillful to leave such an extraordinary character in mystery, than to have chronicled his last experiences, dying speech and all.

HENRY ASHTON.—Apprentices may be assigned. A master of his own authority cannot compel his apprentices to attend a place of worship on the Sabbath Day, but under the Lord's Day Act, a magistrate has power to inflict a penalty, and in default of payment, to commit to prison for non-attendance.

SARAH B.—An invitation given by the bride to one of her bridesmaids on the wedding morn, should not be accepted until after the honeymoon has elapsed. Visits of congratulation are not made until then.

L. B. C.—When a lady and gentleman meet in a public thoroughfare, and they speak and walk together, the etiquette is for the gentleman to offer her his arm, but only in the event of their being sufficiently known to each other to warrant the familiarity.

J. EVANS.—The difference between king and emperor consists in the former being the head of one nation, the latter of many. The Emperor of France is not de facto an emperor—the Emperor of Austria is, because he is the sovereign authority over several states.

FRANK MILMAY.—Generally when the wife is five years older than the husband, she is at least ten years his senior in knowledge of the world, tact, and discrimination; so that she is the head—not he—which is a complete reversal of the order of matrimony. You must consult your own judgment, but must expect her to turn grey before you are forty.

R.—Q. If man's inhumanity to man makes countless ages mourn, what is the effect of man's inhumanity to woman? A. Mr. Fitzroy's "Aggravated Assaults" Act, and six months' incarceration, on a bread and water-gruel diet, with some brisk salutary exercises on the treadmill, diversified by oakum picking and breaking stones. So, beware, all ye large-handed, bad-headed men—for the magistrates of England are resolved to put down ruffianism towards helpless women.

THE DOCTOR.—It may be well to guard against an abuse of the "Cure for drunkenness," by means of a tartar emetic. It is not quite harmless. If not carried too far it has the desired effect, but it acts as a sedative of the circulation, diminishing the heart's action. It likewise often acts upon the bowels by causing inflammation of the mucous coats. The old-fashioned way is the best, after all.

M'GREGOR PETER begs to inform "A Lady," that he believes the following to be the armorial bearings borne by the celebrated Colonel Gardiner (Gardiner or Gardiner, Scotland): Argent, a fret, gules—in each interstice a man's heart, point to the centre—all between four roses of the second, barbed, vert. Crest: a demi-leopard rampant, proper. Motto: "Virtute et labore." (By virtue and labour.)

T. WITHERS sends us the following Rebus: I am three words of sixteen letters. My 6 11 13 12 is a point of the compass; 1 3 9 1 is a temporary habitation; 16 15 9 3 is a narrow street; 10 15 9 3 is a lady's name; 16 11 13 7 is a title; 3 15 13 is one of the organs; 8 14 3 is a number; 12 5 13 9 is a prickly substance; my 10 5 2 9 is a man's name: my whole is the greatest favourite in Europe.

JAMES JOHNSON.—At the urgent request of several correspondents, we have gone a little out of our way in giving the following a place in our columns a second time. To obtain skeletons of small animals: Put any subject, such as a mouse, or frog—if a bird, strip it of its feathers—into a box perforated with a number of holes; let it be properly distended to prevent it collapsing, or being crushed together by the pressure of the earth. Then place the box, with its contents, in an ant-hole, and in a few days it will have become an exquisitely beautiful and perfect skeleton: the ants will have consumed every part of it, except the bones and ligaments. The tadpole acts the same part with fish, that ants do with birds; and, through the agency of this little reptile, perfect skeletons, even of the smallest fishes, may be obtained. To produce this, it is but necessary to suspend the fish, by threads attached to the head and tail, in a horizontal position, in a jar of water, such as is found in a pond, and change it often till the tadpoles have finished their work. Two or three tadpoles perfectly dissect a fish in twenty-four hours.

J. RIGNY.—Capital has a recognised locus standi peculiar to itself, but it is artificial, and except when made an article of barter, is entirely dependent for its prosperity on the manifold operations of society. It is the productive capability which determines the character of the wealth of a people, and when this power is in any degree fettered, capital, its visible sign or agent, suffers a corresponding deterioration. Capital seeks advantageous investment, labour adequate remuneration—and therefore both require the utmost freedom of action. Injure one, and you must injure the other—for they are co-partners. Therefore the association, in its entire organisation, should be maintained in the healthiest condition attainable. Labour is unquestionably the basis of capital; but labour, by allowing accumulations to fall into the hands of the few, cannot refuse to recognise the laws by which those accumulations are governed. So that the present constitution of society demands that the institution which itself has created should receive from it every reasonable protection. And capital is so sensitive that it flies at the approach of disturbances which would interfere with its liberty—it refuses to be controlled by any other regulations than those of its own creation; and therefore all the protection it requires, is to be left entirely to its own laws and the influences which arise out of its manifold operations.

A POOR WOMAN.—Muffins are baked on a hot iron plate, and not in an oven. To a quarter of a peck of flour add three-quarters of a pint of yeast, four ounces of salt, and so much water, or milk, slightly warmed, as is sufficient to form a dough of rather a soft consistence. Small portions of the dough are then put into holes, previously made in a layer of flour, about two inches thick, placed on a board, and the whole is covered up with a blanket, and suffered to stand near a fire, to cause the dough to rise. When this is effected, they each will exhibit a semi-globular shape. They are then carefully placed on a heated iron plate, and baked. When the bottoms of the muffins begin to acquire a brownish colour, they are turned, and baked on the opposite side. Crumpets are made of a batter composed of flour, water (or milk), and a small quantity of yeast. To one pound of the best wheaten flour you may add three table-spoonsful of yeast. A portion of the liquid paste, not too thin, after being suffered to rise, is poured on the heated iron-plate, and baked, like pancakes, in a pan.

J. J. N.—Macclesfield returns two members to Parliament. Being a borough, it is governed by a mayor and corporation.

ECCESTRIC.—The Society of Civil Engineers is held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London.

W. A. M.—The English, Germans, Swedes, and Danes, are the fairest and lightest complexioned people in the world. The climate of Australia darkens the complexion of northern Europeans, particularly the English. The progeny of the first colonists are darker than their parents.

M'GREGOR PETER states that the name of the very ancient family of "Alrethes," Allardies, or Allardyce, is territorial, and was originally assumed from the barony of "Alrethes" Castle, on the east bank of the Bervie, Mearns. Their first charter is the confirmation of William the Lion, to the then Laird of the lands of "Alrethes," to be held by the same tenure as that of "his father," who is denominated "Le Scot," to wit, by the service of "Two Hobblers"—i. e., mounted archers. The last male representative was James Allardie of that ilk, heir of line of the Earls of Airth and Menteith (Nisbet, Vol. II., p. 45), and father of Sarah Ann Allardie, mother of the celebrated Captain Barclay Allardie, of Ury and Allardie.

L. F. R.—The government have refused to repeal the tax on paper: now this is really too bad, for the imposition is an admirable mode of raising revenue. It taxes industry, thought, civilisation. The amount is three-half-pence per pound, and it is collected with promptitude—for every pound of paper, before leaving the mill, is weighed under the inspection of an Excise officer. Now this at first sight is a tax on capital and labour, then it attacks industry at the root, and places legitimate enterprise under a supervision which is a hindrance to production, both as to amount and quality. With as much reason or justice, woollen or cotton goods, or even hardware, might be taxed by the weight. Indeed, the producer of any manufactured article might be compelled to pay for the privilege of making profit from his labour, skill, and capital. The tax being unquestionably wrong in economical principle, if we come to examine it in its moral influence, we shall find it exceedingly worse. It fixes a limit to the supply of an article that should be inexhaustible, and so injures every class—for everybody, more or less, consumes paper. It is as much a necessity as the cotton or linen of which our garments are made. To the press and literature the tax is a dead weight; but it is not a press question: manufacturers, merchants, tradesmen, mechanics, everybody, are equally interested with the press in procuring its abolition; and we think every Chancellor of the Exchequer who retains it, by doing so, paves the way for the downfall of himself and the ministry to which he belongs; for the press, being a corporation, never forgives a wrong inflicted on itself; and, knowing which is the blind side of every man, and of every company of men, it does not scruple to take up a most harassing position. Its rifle brigade can inflict quite as much injury as its heavy artillery—perhaps more; for great guns fired too frequently get heated, and burst.

HARRY C. PENNELL.—We approve of your lines on "Woman," not so much on account of their merit—for they limp a little—but for their healthy sentiment, and because they echo the doctrine we have supported in this part of our Journal since its establishment. Marriage is a religious duty, and a national duty. We subjoin your lines, with some emendations.

When Adam first thro' Eden stray'd,
The lord of all that he survey'd;
Lonely he pac'd each shady grove,
And yearned for something he might love.
What heard he in the glad bird's song,
Warbling blithe the boughs among?
What in the wild breeze' fitful moan?
"Man was not made to be alone!"

Tho' bowers of orange blossom fair,
With odours sweet, perfumed the air;
Tho' nature all her charms had strewn,
Man cannot live and love alone!
Every sound his ear that meets,
Still that prophet voice repeats!
And whispers still with gentle tone,
"Man was not made to be alone!"

And still, tho' years have rolled away,
That hallow'd spell maintains its sway;
Tho' Eden's bowers no longer bloom,
Nor angels' footsteps thro' them roam,
The charm which Adam sought, remains,
The sharer of man's joys and pains,
Cheers still the cottage and the throne:
"Man was not made to be alone!"

DE BURGH.—The Dublin Exhibition will do Ireland good, by showing Ireland what industry can accomplish without the aid of government. The great curse of Ireland has been a want of faith in herself. The majority have only had faith in a church which has degenerated and become useless to the advancing interests of mankind; and the result has been beggary, and degrading mental and moral slavery to dim and dark traditions of a not over-good past. Ireland has been false to herself, and we Britons are somewhat to blame in the matter of her distresses—wrong she has none, save those self-inflicted. Infatuated with the idea of our own superior merit, when we have not been afraid of Ireland we have neglected her, and resorted to every expedient and argument but the right ones to account for the depression under which she laboured. Irishmen in this respect have been as great sinners. In addition to their servility to custom and tradition, they have indulged in intemperate declamation on the subject of their country's woes, instead of advocating industrial application as the only means to remedy them. So that what is styled the thinking portions of the community on both sides of the channel, Ireland has been placed in the sad predicament of having been under-rated on the one side, and over-rated on the other. In addition, the brawls between the two churches have been a terrible stop-gap in the way of her regeneration. Let us hope for the speedy dawning of her bright day. But as a preliminary to its advent, the emigration mania must be checked.

E. W. T.—Her Majesty the Queen could have married one of her subjects—she was not obliged to marry a foreigner. Of all the members of the Royal Family, it is only the sovereign who has any freedom of choice in this important matter.

GORDON D.—The Clan Davidson derive from David don (black), fifth son of Murdoch, Person of Kingussie, who, on the demise of his brother Diarmid, Issue, succeeded to the chieftainship of Clan Chattan, anno 1163—and in 1173 obtained a dispensation from the Pope, and married a daughter of the Thane of Calder, by whom he left five sons. (See "Baronage," p. 354.) [It is asserted by some that the thirty men of Clan Day, or Clay, who fought "with claymores and targe" before king and court, on the North Inch of Perth, in 1396, were Davidsons, headed by their chief, Davidson of Invernahaven. See "New Gazetteer."] Tartan: 4 black, 11 green, 2 white, 11 green, 8 black, 11 blue, 2 red, 11 blue, 4 black. Arms of Davidson of Inchmaris: Azure on a fesse argent, between three pheons, or, a buck lodged, gules. Crest: A demi-young man wreathed (others, a demi-Highlander in costume), holding a man's heart in his dexter hand, proper. Motto: "Sapienter si sincere." (Wisely if sincerely.) [Peter's Heraldry of Angus and Mearns," MS. 4to, p. 92.]

M'GREGOR PETER.

J. P.—The empire of Turkey is called the Sublime Porte, from the principal entrance of the seraglio being a huge pavilion with eight openings over the gate or porte. This gate, from which the Ottoman empire took its name, is very high, and is guarded by fifty capidjis, or porters.

S. H.—At fifty-two, the value of an annuity of £100 per annum would be £1084 18s.; but it might be purchased for considerably less from an insurance company. Consult your solicitor as to the office.

T. A. P.—The suffrage question is the question, par excellence, to be settled sooner or later. Its solution, we firmly anticipate, will be peaceful. But those classes whom the settlement more particularly affects should study the history of their country comprehensively and liberally. We do not mean the history which has been written—for that is a mere register of births, deaths, marriages, battles, intrigues, and falsehoods—but that history patent to common sense, which is inseparably associated with the traditions that accompany the abuses of which the people complain. They should at the same time discard as authorities the scribbles of the political fraternity, the roaring oratory of the platform, and the sophistries of the economists. Let them search out themselves and for themselves, and, having obtained it, trust to their own judgments, and that natural sagacity which is unerring either in the pursuit of a right or the redress of a wrong. Let them, in short, shake off their indifference, and show themselves to be large-brained, energetic Englishmen, and they would speedily have before them accurate estimates of all the institutions by which they are surrounded. A sound, sober study of the English form of government, in relation to the suffrage question, would soon open their moral as well as mental eyes to the one-sided arguments, sophistries, perversions, and tenacious clinging to old forms, indulged both in and out of Parliament.

SCOTARCHUS sends us a purely Scottish view of the Crystal Palace—and as we wish to collect as many opinions as we can, we publish the substance of his communication. He contends that to open the palace on Sunday would be a violation of a day constituted in wisdom and care for man by his Creator, and from its sacredness and importance, when viewed aright, every earthly consideration should be sacrificed to devoting it according to God's intention: and therefore it is a sin to make the Sabbath bend to the enjoyment of a worldly pleasure. Far better would it be to put forth the same energy and perseverance in agitating and demanding a half-holiday on Saturday for recreation, and leave the Sabbath for rest, meditation, and Divine worship. "I am persuaded," he says, "that if man would take some thought in nourishing his soul from Sabbath to Sabbath, his whole weary days would be turned into pleasantness, and he would be providing a rest in eternity, instead of wandering heedlessly in irreligious life until death meets him unprepared. No doubt it is very trying and hard for people who have severe work all the week (as I know myself from experience), and who think that they must necessarily in such circumstances spend the Sabbath in recreation and a little enjoyment, and who say they worship God amid the beauties of nature; but do they really do so without using some unallowed means which must make their worship odious to Him; or do they gain impressions which turn the heart to Him in adoring gratitude, and become effectual in thorough religious life. I wonder that it should be recommended to open the Palace on the Sabbath, because there are other places more questionable open on that day. We should rather try and remove evils than build up another, which, from being a precedent, would engender others. The next conviction would be similar to that for relieving the Post Office officials from Sunday labour—for from the greater crowds that would resort to the Palace on that day, the greater staff of superintendents, &c., of departments would be required constantly all the week. Depend upon it, a sure blessing in this life to the working classes, and a mightier one in eternity, shall compensate us for any sacrifice we make for our soul's welfare on earth."

CHAPTER CXXX.

Hear me for my cause! and be silent, that
You may hear me. SHAKESPEARE.

No sooner had the death-rattle ceased in the throat of the guilty Colonel Mowbray, and the surgeons pronounced him dead, than the eyes of Martin, who had been gradually sinking, re-kindled, as though he had received from some pitying angel, who had listened to the long prayer of his existence, a fresh lease of life. Raising himself, without the assistance of Joe Beans, who for the last hour had been watching him in his chair, he exclaimed, in a distinct tone:

"Philip Ashton, in the name of God speak out! The persecutor is no more, and the hour has come!"

All eyes were turned towards the Khan, whose countenance was calm and impassive as ever, with intense expectation and anxiety. Every one present felt they were about to listen to a strange tale, and a still stranger dénouement.

"Perhaps," observed the Duchess of Devonshire, who saw how painfully Lady Mowbray was agitated, "the explanation had better be deferred! This fearful excitement will destroy her!"

"No—no!" murmured the old groom. "I am dying! Now—now let me fulfil my trust! Then, when I meet my noble master in a better world, he may smile upon me, and say, the confidence he reposed in the man who ate his bread has not been broken. Now—now!"

"Right!" said the long-suffering widow, whose heart anticipated that its dearest wish would at last be gratified. "Fear not, dear friend! Joy will not kill me; and I am proof against fresh sorrow!"

"Philip," added his brother, who, with his weeping dame, foreboded the blow which was about to be inflicted on the long-cherished hopes and feelings of years, "if thee knowest anything about that bad man, or the poor lady's child, speak at once, for the credit of thee name, and thee dead father's memory!"

Thus adjured on all sides, the renegade commenced his explanation. Every word which fell from his lips was received with greedy ears by the party in the library, who, in their various groupings, would have formed no bad study for a painter: Lady Mowbray, supported on either side by the duchess and Ellen; Martin, his withered hand grasping that of our hero, dying in the chair of his loved master; the body of the colonel, whose countenance, even in death, bore traces of the evil passions which destroyed him, stretched upon a sofa directly under the window, through which the morning sun was brightly streaming; Dr. Orme and the magistrates surrounding the Khan, and the old domestics of the family peering anxiously in at the door of the apartment, from whose panelled walls the portraits of the Mowbrays, for many generations, seemed to preside over the fortunes of their race.

"My justification," commenced the Khan, in his usual calm, unbroken tone, "must accompany my explanation! The old gravestones in the churchyard of Carrow would reproach me, if I permitted a stain to rest upon the name of Ashton through any act of mine. I address myself to those," he added—"to those who can both understand and sympathise with the yeoman's honest pride and fidelity to the lords of the land whose soil we have tilled for centuries!"

"This delay is agony!" murmured Lady Mowbray, whose eyes, during the last few minutes, had never wandered from the manly features of Henry, whose countenance was alternately agitated by doubt and hope.

"It is known that, unsuited for the peaceful toil of my forefathers," resumed Philip Ashton, "at the early age of sixteen I became a soldier, and enlisted in the regiment commanded by that bold, bad man whose death we have just witnessed. For years I served my country with courage, both in the burning clime of India and in other lands. Our regiment suffered severely at Assaye, where I distinguished myself in saving the life of my superior officer. Soon afterwards we were ordered home to England. Our quarters were near to London. Little is known, beyond military circles, of the sufferings of the soldier," he added; "for a slight breach of discipline, I was condemned to the lash—to be tied up, like a hound, in the gaze of my fellow-men, and flogged! It was not the pain of the lash I feared; it was the disgrace! One man alone could save me from the agony of such a shame! That man was Colonel Mowbray! He sought me in my prison; and as the price of his mercy, proposed that I should exile myself to India, taking with me a child, which was to bear my name, and pass for mine."

All eyes became rivetted upon Lady Mowbray and our hero, whose agitation became fearful.

"I consented," resumed the narrator—"gladly consented—for in India, my old schoolfellow and companion, Musgrave, the father of Meeran Hafaz, had married a begum, or native princess, and was in a position to protect me and advance my fortunes."

"The child! my child!" exclaimed Lady Mowbray.

"Your heart, madam, I perceive, has already divined my secret! A few moments more, and your hopes will be confirmed! The fiend to whom I pledged myself, by an oath too terrible to repeat—bound me never to disclose the transaction whilst he lived! Two days before the vessel was to sail, I encountered the man who had brought the infant from Italy to England. From him I learnt that it was the colonel's own nephew—his brother's son—the heir of Carrow! What was I to do? My lips fettered by an oath I dared not break, and still within the power of the colonel, who, instead of procuring my pardon—which he could easily have done—connived at my escape! Still I resolved the child should not be exposed to the perils of the voyage—the hazards of a wandering life like mine! I bore him to Carrow, to my brother's farm; told him a tale of a pretended marriage, and the loss of my wife! He believed me, received the boy, and saved him a —"

A shriek, such as escapes from the heart when relieved from the agony of years, broke from the lips of Lady Mowbray, whose arms involuntarily stretched towards our hero.

"Mother!" he exclaimed.

"My boy! my boy! Here, to this broken heart!"

The next instant they were folded in the fond embrace of filial and maternal love. Oh, the gushing tenderness of that embrace! The long-suffering woman gazed upon him with unutterable pride and fondness, parted the clustering curls from his flushed brow, and imprinted there a mother's holiest kiss—the seal of nature's right—then, overcome with the intensity of happiness, sank fainting in the arms of those around her.

Sir William Mowbray—for so, for the future, we must call our hero—could have knelt and worshipped her. For years his heart had yearned for the blessing of a mother's love—and the wish was gratified at last. The discovery which gave him a name and fortune, was far less precious than the recovery of a parent whom he could honour as well as love.

"Mother!" he exclaimed, and it was the second time his lips had pronounced the endearing name; "angel of innocence—martyr! Look up and bless your son—bless but with a look, and he is happy!"

The word—the piercing accents of his voice—awoke the long-slumbering echoes of her heart. Lady Mowbray half unclosed her quivering eye-lids, and pronounced the name of William—his father's name: how proud and happy he felt. The happiness of a whole life was concentrated in that moment.

Old Martin, whose greedy ears drank in every word, murmured a few indistinct words of thanksgiving: he felt that he should accomplish his task, and fulfil the sacred trust his master had reposed in him. Scarcely an eye in the room but was dimmed with tears. The rector was on his knees in silent prayer, and poor Joe Beans was endeavouring to choke the sobs of joy which would rise in his throat, at the discovery which placed a yet greater distance between himself and the friend of his youthful days; whilst Dame Ashton and her husband sat gazing in silent but not selfish sorrow: they felt that they had lost a son.

"Could my dear uncle but have known this," thought Ellen, "how would his noble heart have rejoiced! Perhaps from his sphere of bliss he sees and blesses him!"

The Duchess of Devonshire was the first to recover her self-possession. She saw that further excitement might prove fatal to the exhausted frame of Lady Mowbray, and firmly but gently insisted on her being removed at once to her apartment. Henry—pshaw! the fellow has so wormed himself into our heart, we can scarcely bring ourselves to call him by his proper name—Sir William, we mean, would permit no other arms than his to assist his now-found parent: raising her tenderly as a mother would her sleeping child, he carried her from the library to her chamber. Not even the entreaties of Ellen and the duchess could prevail on him to leave the room till he felt in her once more open her tear-gemmed eyes, and heard her lips pronounce the name of "son."

"Ellen—dear Ellen!" he whispered to his cousin, as the fair girl gently led him from the room; "next to the joy I feel at the discovery of such a parent, my greatest happiness is that you will not have to blush in the eyes of the world for the choice you have made! Worthy of you," he added, at the same time imprinting a kiss upon her brow, "I can never prove—but this event lessens the measure of my undeservings!"

"To me," replied the blushing girl, "Sir William Mowbray will be no dearer than Henry Ashton!"

No sooner had our hero and the ladies withdrawn from the library, than all joined in commending the prudence of the Khan—who further explained to them that, since his return to England, he had succeeded in discovering the party who brought the infant heir of Carrow from Italy, and delivered him to Colonel Mowbray.

"That will lessen the difficulty of establishing our young friend's rights," observed Colonel Butler; "but, unfortunately, the law will require something more where such large possessions are at stake—some further proof!"

"Which I and Mrs. Page can furnish!" said the aged housekeeper.

"You?" repeated the rector, with surprise.

"Yes!" continued the faithful domestic; "I and Mrs. Page, who was lady's-maid in the family, were present when my master's son was born. Dr. Martineau, who attended my lady, pointed out to us a singular mark upon the left breast of the infant!"

"A mark?"

"Was it something like a strawberry-leaf?" eagerly demanded Dame Ashton.

"As like as if it had been painted!" replied Mrs. Jarmy, with surprise.

"There will be no difficulty, then," said the farmer's wife, merrily; "for Harry—I forgot, I mustn't call him Harry," she added, correcting herself, and at the same time bursting into a flood of tears, "has the mark—I have seen it when he was a child a thousand times!"

"What beast thee crying for, dame?" said the honest farmer, drawing his hand across his eyes to efface the traces of a weakness of which he felt ashamed. "Thee ought to be glad—glad, I tell thee!"

"Glad when we have lost a son?" answered his wife, reproachfully. "What be the use of all thee toil and saving now? Har—Sir William I mean, he won't want it—he'll forget us now—let us go home!"

"That be true, Missus," blubbered Joe Beans; "and thee know't it beant! Master Harry—I can't call him anything else yet—wouldn't forget a dog he had once been fond of: why he won't pass even me without a kind word or smile, tho' he has come to be lord of the manor, and great, and rich—much less those who have reared and loved him!"

"Could he," said the rector, laying his hand upon the shoulder of the speaker, "I should despise as much as I have loved him!"

There is nothing so sensitive as affection, jealous of its rights; Dame Ashton would not be convinced, simply because that word was not spoken by the lips of our hero: she insisted upon returning to the farm; and, accompanied by her husband, had just reached the great hall as Sir William crossed it, on his return from the chamber of Lady Mowbray.

"Matthew—doff thee hat!" she said, in a loud whisper; "here be—be—"

She could not say Sir William—the words stuck in her throat; the pride of the affectionate creature gave way, and she sobbed audibly.

None knew her nature, temper, strength, and weakness, better than the child she had reared. Our hero read in an instant the struggle passing in her mind. Throwing himself forward, with the familiarity of his boyish years, he kissed her wrinkled cheeks.

"Dame—dame," he said, "you would not render your poor boy miserable, by letting him see that this discovery makes you unhappy! Mowbray or Ashton, what does it signify? I shall not love you and farmer less. After my own dear angel mother," he added, "you will always hold the first place in my heart!"

If the speaker did not include Ellen in the reservation, it was, perhaps, that his love for the fair girl surpassed all other love.

"I told thee, dame," exclaimed the farmer, grasping him by the hand, "that thee wor unjust! tho' he be rich and great, he won't forget us!"

"Never!"

"Or love us less?"

"More I cannot," replied our hero, returning the pressure of the old man's hand. "I repeat it—I must ever consider you and your wife as my second parents, and respect and honour you as such!"

"My dear boy," said the rector, entering the hall hastily from the library, "old Martin is most impatient to see you! the surgeons say that he has not an hour to live! He has a solemn trust to discharge before he dies!"

"A trust?" repeated Sir William.

"Yes!" added the rector, solemnly; "from your dead father!"

"I follow you instantly—instantly! You hear," he added, turning to the farmer and his wife, "I am summoned in a name it would be sacrilege to disregard!"

So saying, he followed the rector to the library.

"He be our own boy in heart, though not in blood!" exclaimed the dame, looking after him with a glance of gratified affection. "How prettily he did speak! didn't he, Matthew?"

"That he did!" replied her husband. "I knew all the time that his heart wor in the right place! He is worthy of his good fortune!"

"But he won't owe it to us!" observed his wife, regretfully.

"No matter who he owes it to," answered the honest farmer; "he deserves it! Come along!" he added; "if our fire-side be at times a bit lonely, we shall know that he is happy—and that will be enough!"

"Didn't I tell thee so!" said Joe Beans, who had overheard the last observation of his former master.

"Thee didst, lad—thee didst!"

"Why he shook me by the hand as he passed me just now in the library, afore all the gentry. His heart be all gold! there beant a bit of pride in it! But I mun be off!"

The aged couple demanded where Joe was compelled to be off to. The praise of our hero was so grateful to them, they would willingly have detained him to listen to it.

"I must go and see poor Ralph," replied the young man, "who be frightened out of his wits, I dare say. Police have got him!"

"Got him! What for?"

"Doesn't 'ee know, mun? Why for shooting the colonel! I wish he had shot him afore he had hit poor Martin!" added the rustic. "Poor old man! he be a sinking fast!"

The farmer and his wife both expressed the utmost indignation that Red Ralph should be in custody, even for a moment, for shooting such a villain; and the farmer declared that he would bail the boy for a thousand pounds, if necessary.

"For two thousand, Matthew!" said the dame; "for two! Tell him so, Joel! tell him so from me! Pretty justice, indeed!"

Joe promised that he would, and left them, to console the prisoner, whom he found down-hearted enough—terrified at what he had done—in the butler's room, in charge of the village constable and one of the city officers.

"Eh, Mister Beans!" said Ralph, his countenance brightening as soon as he saw him. "Thee beest come at last! This be more nor I bargained for, I reckon!"

He held up his wrists, and showed the handcuffs which the officers had placed upon him.

"No matter!" replied his patron; "it won't be for long!"

"That's what Will Sidelar said," observed the boy, ruefully, "when they took him at Cromwell House; 'but they hung un, for all that!'"

"Don't thee be afeard! They won't hang thee!"

"I don't know that!" answered the boy, dolefully. "This be a mortal queer world! But I don't care!" he added; "he killed 'old man, and wor it to do agin, I'd do it! If I hadn't ha' done it, he might ha' killed thee!"

Joe was touched by the simple expression of Ralph's gratitude and attachment to him; and Susan, who was present, felt so grateful, that she absolutely threw her arms round his neck, and kissed the red-haired little monster, as she used to call him.

"Can't ye take those things off his hands?" said Joe, addressing the officer of justice. "I'll be his bail he won't run away! Will thee, Ralph?"

"Not if thee tell I to stop!" answered the boy.

This was a request which neither the constable nor his colleague thought proper to accede to, till Colonel Butler and the rector entered the room, and instantly directed that they should be taken off. Being magistrates, there was no further difficulty.

"Don't be alarmed, my little man," said the former, patting him on the head; "instead of being punished for what you have done, you shall be rewarded! You have nothing to fear!"

"I told 'ee so, Ralph!" whispered Joe; "I told 'ee so!"

"The case," added Colonel Butler, "is clearly one of justifiable homicide. The next you will have to endure is a day or two's detention till the inquest is over; and even that may be avoided if you can procure bail."

"What be that?" demanded the prisoner, gradually getting more and more at his ease. "I ain't got any, that I know on!"

His rustic friend remembered the offer of Farmer Ashton, who had not yet left the abbey: he not only readily became security for Ralph's appearance before the coroner—which, after all, was a mere form—but induced a friend—a substantial yeoman on the estate—to join him.

The bail bond signed, Red Ralph was restored to liberty.

CHAPTER CXXXI.

DIRECTLY our hero entered the library, after the summons of the rector, he advanced towards the chair in which Martin sat, or rather reclined, propped by pillows. The countenance of the old man was pale, as death had already passed his icy hand over its lineaments, and his eyes were nearly closed, but they opened again and flashed with intelligence at the sound of his young master's voice, whilst a smile of satisfaction played faintly as an expiring flame upon his quivering lips, to which he made several attempts to raise the hand extended to him.

"Forgive me!" he said; "forgive me that I summoned you from the presence of those you love; but it was your father's voice—not mine—not mine! I dared not disobey his commands!"

"Had it been otherwise," replied Sir William, "your slightest wish would have been law to me. Deep as my regret is at losing you, my true and faithful friend, it is doubled by the feeling that my debt of gratitude is still unpaid!"

"Gratitude!" repeated the aged groom, somewhat feebly; "no—no! You owe no gratitude to me! For many a long year I ate your father's bread in idleness—but he was good, and would not have suffered a worn-out hound to starve that had served him faithfully; you owe me no gratitude!"

"You must be brief!" whispered the surgeon to the baronet; "his recollection is failing him."

"No it ain't!" exclaimed the old man, sharply; "it can't fail me, till I can no longer serve Sir William's son. Let me look on him," he added; "pray let me see him the room grows very dark, or else my eyes are dim!" He closed them for a few moments, as if to collect both memory and strength, then fixed them upon our hero with an expression of intense fidelity and love.

"It is my master's son!" he exclaimed; "but you have neither the title-deeds of his estates, the plate, nor precious heir-looms of your house!"

"They are lost!" observed Lawyer Elworthy, who was standing near the chair.

"So people think," said the dying man, with a chuckle; "but they are mistaken; Martin has them: parchments—diamonds—gold—all safe—all safe! Sir William did not confide them to the lawyer, or the parson—no—no! he knew better; he trusted them to the fidelity of—the old—house-dog—Martin—Martin—the groom! They are safe!" he added, grasping the hand of the heir; "not one missing—all for you—all for you!"

So exhausted was the speaker by the effort he had made, that for several moments all present thought him dead—for he had fallen back upon his pillow in a state of insensibility, from which, probably, he would not have recovered, but for the skill of the Khan, whose studies, both in the East and with Dr. Guyot, had made him master of many curious secrets, both in medicine and surgery.

Calling hastily for a glass of water, he poured into it the contents of a small phial, which tinged the pure element with a bright opal colour, and held it to the lips of the groom: the very odour seemed to revive him. No sooner had the liquid passed his lips, than Martin became suddenly invigorated.

"I am strong now!" he said, in a firm tone; "strong—strong! How long will it last?"

"For an hour, perhaps," replied the renegade; "and then—"

"I understand," interrupted the old man, unmoved at the announcement; "that is as it should be! Why should the watch-dog live after his watch is ended? Let all but Sir William Mowbray," he added, in a loud voice, "quit the room!"

It is needless to add that a command, even from a groom, under such circumstances, was instantly obeyed. "Lock the door!" he whispered to our hero, as soon as they were alone.

The baronet did as he was directed.

Drawing the key or instrument which raised the entrance to the secret recess or chamber from his bosom, Martin instructed his young master how to use it.

"Descend!" he said; "you will find them all there—not a seal broken! The deeds—without which your wretched uncle could not have sold or mortgaged a single acre of the broad lands of Carrow—the diamonds, plate, all—all!"

"But I cannot leave you, Martin, at such a moment!" observed Sir William, fearful that the momentary strength of the faithful domestic might fail him.

"The deeds—the parchments!" repeated the dying man; "let me see them before I die! See them in your hands—for to your hands alone I promised to give them! do not deny old Martin's last request!"

Thus adjured, it was impossible to resist: with a trembling hand, Sir William applied the key to the artfully contrived opening—it refused to turn.

"To the left—the left!" said Martin, who continued intently watching him.

It turned, disclosing the entrance.

"The packet directed to his son, to be read only by him," continued the speaker, "lies on the lid of the coffer containing the papers: secure that—let me see that!"

Our hero hastily descended, and in a few moments returned with it in his hands: impatient as he felt to open it—to read the last lines traced by the pen of the parent whom he had loved and honoured as his benefactor and friend—he restrained the impulse, and hastened to the side of its faithful guardian, in whom, brief as had been his absence, he perceived a change.

The potion of the Khan was beginning to lose its virtue: life was fast fleeing from him.

"Martin," said our hero, pressing his hand, "is there nothing I can do for you, to mark my gratitude? Have you no wish—no request?"

"Yes! one—one!"

"Name it?"

"Bury me," faltered the old groom, "in sight of the Mowbray vault, near to my dear—dear master! I once thought," he added, "that I should like to have been earthed in the stable; but it was a wrong wish, perhaps, and might only frighten the grooms and helpers—not that old Martin would do them any harm!"

"You shall be buried in the vault of the Mowbrays!" replied the baronet; "in the midst of the race you have so long and faithfully served!"

"No—no!" exclaimed the dying man, with a faint smile; "near to the vault! The house-dog should lie at the door—the door! You are sure," he added, looking earnestly into the eyes of the young heir, "that the coffer is safe?"

"Quite safe, Martin!"

"And you will not forget the way to the secret chamber? Remember the—key—turns to the—left—the left!"

The difficulty with which he pronounced the last few words indicated that his end was fast approaching. Sir William Mowbray rose from his knees by the side of the chair, and, unlocking the door of the library, beckoned to the rector to enter, that he might perform the office of his ministry.

Dr. Orme commenced, with the fervour of true piety, the service for the dying. The aged groom listened with evident pleasure to his words, but from time to time opened his half-closed eyes to take one more look at the son of his old master. At the end of the prayer, he attempted to raise himself from the pillow, but was too feeble.

The rector and our hero both assisted him.

"He is trying to speak!" whispered the former.

Sir William inclined his head, to catch the last words of the old man.

"Take care of the cheval saddle and the horse-cloth!" he said, alluding to the trappings of the famous steed, the traditional pride of the Mowbray stables.

"They shall be cared for, for your sake, Martin!"

"God bless you! you will not forget me?" said the grey-haired servitor.

"Never—never!"

"What," added the old man, with a faint smile, "did you say was the name of the plant—you know—the unsightly, prickly plant, which blooms but once in a hundred years—we spoke of it—together?"

"The aloe, Martin—the aloe!" replied Sir William, with difficulty repressing his tears.

"Ah!" nodded the groom, "I—remember! I told you it would bloom at last—it has! Old Martin has paid his debt of gratitude, and can meet his master with a smile—a smile!"

These were the last words his tongue could falter. With a gentle sigh, he fell back upon the pillows and expired, his fading eyes fixed to the last upon the heir of the race he had so long and faithfully served.

The baronet laid his hand upon the eyelids of the dead, and gently closed them: he felt he could do no less for such a friend and servitor. The last duty paid, he followed the rector from the library.

In the solitude of his own chamber, our hero broke the seal of the packet which contained the last writing of his father: of that father whom he had loved and honoured as a benefactor and friend—whose virtues he had venerated—whose memory was so dear to him.

It contained the outpourings of a noble, bruised heart, addressed to the son he had so long and deeply mourned; filled with advice drawn from the noblest principles, such as experience might give to age; and recommended his unknown heir to emulate the virtues of Henry Ashton, whose friendship he particularly wished him to cultivate.

"Remember my pupil and friend," it continued, "in honour, integrity, and truth, and you will be all a father's heart could wish—all his instructions would have trained you to!"

With deep emotion Sir William perused the lines so grateful to his feelings—so precious to his heart: they were the seal upon his happiness, and consoled him even for the loss of such a parent.

"Heaven grant," he murmured, "that I prove worthy of the name bequeathed by so good a man! To add to his lustre is impossible—my care must be not to disgrace it!"

At a very early hour the following day, an inquest was held at the abbey, upon the bodies of Colonel Mowbray and the faithful Martin. There was no hesitation in returning the verdict—the evidence was so clear. In the case of the colonel, it was, as every one anticipated, justifiable homicide. In that of the latter, wilful murder: so that even if the uncle of our hero had escaped the shot of Red Ralph, he would have had to answer at the tribunal of his country for the death of the aged groom.

Ralph's joy on being informed by Joe Beans of the result of the inquest, manifested itself in the usual series of leaps and gyrations: he wanted to shake hands with every one, danced and sang in his uncouth way, and cut a thousand antics.

From a feeling of propriety, he was removed from the abbey to the Home Farm, with an intimation from the baronet that he would be provided for. Under the roof of Farmer Ashton he was in his element: the hero of his own tale, which he was compelled to repeat at the arrival of every fresh visitor—the tenants of the estate and the neighbouring yeomen crowding to the farm, to learn the real history of what had passed at the abbey. Matthew Ashton said little, but his loquacious dame amply satisfied them.

The body of Colonel Mowbray was interred at midnight, in a retired corner of the churchyard; no stone ever marked the spot: both our hero and the rector felt that it would be sacrilege to lay him by his brother, whose happiness he had so cruelly blighted—whose untimely death they more than suspected he had been privy to. The space he should have occupied in the family vault of his ancestors was destined for the faithful Martin, whom the baronet persisted in his intention of burying by the side of his master.

"That is as it should be, my dear boy!" said Dr. Orme, with an approving smile, when he heard the decision of his pupil; "his sufferings and fidelity deserve even so great an honour; not a tenant on the estate but will follow him, I feel convinced."

"I shall follow him myself!" added Sir William; "it will be the last token of respect and gratitude I can pay to poor old Martin!"

Never had the church of Carrow been so crowded as on the day of the old man's funeral: the farmers for miles round made a point of being present, to honour his memory. Sir William Mowbray followed as chief mourner—Joe Beans and Matthew Ashton next. The procession was headed by the rector in full canonicals, who walked at the head of the corpse. Every head was uncovered as it passed.

Instead of taking his seat, as every one expected, in the Mowbray gallery, over which the escutcheon of the late baronet was suspended, his son entered the pew of Farmer Ashton, in the centre of the aisle—knelt and prayed in the same place he had been accustomed to kneel and pray in when a child: which simple circumstance pleased the people more than even his following one of their own class to the grave.

The sublime words of the funeral service were ended, and the coffin deposited in its last resting-place, by the side of the murdered baronet. Instead of retiring with the mourners, Sir William remained till the church was closed, and then descended alone to the vault, to pray by the ashes of his father.

At the expiration of an hour he left the sacred edifice, and found, on his appearance in the churchyard, the tenantry drawn up in lines for him to pass through. Raising his hat to thank them, he passed quickly on, accompanied by Dr. Orme, till he reached the little gate communicating with the park, where he saw Farmer Ashton and his dame waiting to see him pass, and Joe Beans with Red Ralph standing in the background—the latter grinning and nodding with delight.

Casting a friendly smile towards Joe, the baronet drew the arm of the gratified dame within his, just as he used to do when a boy, and walked with her and the farmer towards the abbey.

"God bless him!" exclaimed Joe, emphatically; "he ain't a bit of pride about him—he be more kind than ever!"

"That he is!" said old Chettleborough, who was standing near; "if poor old Martin could only know how he has been honoured—in the baronet's own vault—well, he deserved it! Honesty, after all, Joe, be the best policy, both for this world and the next!"

"So it be," said the young man, heartily; "and I only wish I may live to serve him as faithfully as poor old Martin served his father!"

Red Ralph said nothing, but the lesson was not thrown away upon him. After the first excitement had worn away, the boy was observed at times to be sad and thoughtful—the seeds of good were sown. True, the soil was rugged, and had been little cultivated, but they only required time and a genial sun to germinate.

Although Lady Mowbray had suffered deeply from the wrongs and arrows of the world, the recovery of her son seemed to infuse fresh life into her sinking frame. As she gazed upon our hero, a gleam something like the sunshine of her youth returned.

It is needless to say that Ellen and her cousin were happy in the prospect before them, which dawned at last, bright and unclouded as their own pure, youthful hearts.

Although there was no collateral branch to dispute the claims of Sir William, yet it was deemed most prudent by his advisers to prove his right to the title and estates of his father by a solemn form of law—for which purpose a friendly suit was commenced against the executors, to compel them to resign their trust. During its progress, it became necessary for the party once more to return to London.

"It is our last trial!" whispered our hero to Ellen, as he handed her into the carriage, in the dickey of which Joe Beans and Susan were already seated; "when next we revisit Carrow, it will be for the completion of our happiness—the realisation of those fond wishes which once appeared so dark and hopeless!"

The orphan replied only by a blush: she knew that he alluded to their marriage.

In order to avoid any manifestation which might be painful to his mother, Sir William had given orders that the hour of his departure should be kept secret; but somehow it transpired, and as the carriages dashed through the park gates, a hearty cheer broke from a group assembled on the common—Red Ralph was at the head of them.

"Hang that boy!" exclaimed Joe Beans, with an air of vexation; "he is always in some mischief or another!"

"Not always, Joe!" observed Susan, in a gentle tone, which recalled her lover to himself; "besides, he is very grateful!"

"Good bye, Mister Beans!" shouted the boy; "if thee goes to Morlake, gi' my respects to the rats at Cromwell House!"

It was impossible to be angry. Joe waved his hand in sign of adieu, as the carriage disappeared over the common.

CHAPTER CXXXII.

Thus even-handed justice
Returns the ingredients of the poisoned chalice
To our own lips. SHAKESPEARE.

It is no pleasing task to quit the contemplation of such characters as our hero, Ellen, and his mother, to return to the earthly, selfish beings who possess nothing in common with them but their humanity; yet we feel that our tale would be imperfect, did we not untwine every fold of the tangled web—trace vice to its fitting punishment, as well as paint the reward of virtue.

We feel assured that the patience of our readers, whose sympathy and approbation have cheered us in the progress of our task, will not fail us at the end.

The law's delay has been proverbial since the days of Shakspeare, whose philosophic prince complains of it; but where a golden spur can be applied, the cumbrous machine moves readily enough. At least it was so in the case pending between Captain Herbert and his ill-used wife, who had fallen into an artful snare, tempted by the vain hope of recovering the affections of a man who never loved anything with constancy except himself—an egotist in heart as well as mind.

"Well, George," said his uncle, with a good-humoured smile, as the ex-Guardsman made his usual morning call, to report progress; "how goes on the affair at Doctors' Commons? What say the proctors?"

"That I am certain of success—the case is so very clear!"

"Is it?" said the general, drily. "Here," he added, passing his nephew the morning paper, "is something which may facilitate it. Isabel's mother will have enough to do to look after her own interests. The colonel is dead!"

"Dead!" repeated Captain Herbert, in a tone of perfect indifference. "How very apropos!"

"Very!" repeated his uncle.

"Did he die suddenly?"

"Shot in some ridiculous affair at Carrow, by some wretched little ploughboy! Took him for a scarecrow, I suppose; for I perceive the fool had been masquerading. The paragraph is rather obscure, but the main point is certain. There have been some curious discoveries, it appears," he added, "touching the lost son of the late baronet, who turns out to be no other than the rival of Meeran Hafaz—another blockhead, whose passions got the better of his reason; yet he had one of the coolest heads, for one so young, I remember to have encountered."

"Ah, indeed!" said his visitor, with an abstracted air; for, in looking over the military intelligence, he had discovered a piece of news which had rather alarmed him. This was nothing less than the arrival from India of Captain Mottram, the brother of his victim—a distinguished officer, and a man of unblemished reputation.

"What are you thinking of?" demanded his uncle.

"I—ah!—nothing—nothing!"

"Then pray attend to me; for the time is approaching when this infernal marriage must be settled one way or the other. Sir Jasper Pepper begins to grow impatient. When does Lushington say it will be decided?"

"In less than a month," was the reply.

"Good!" continued the old roué; "and the bill in the Lords, with our interest, will take about two more. I have already spoken with the Chancellor on the subject. Let me see—that will be three; then about as long again for appearance sake. Yes," he added, with an air of satisfaction, "I think I may venture to write to Sir Jasper, that in six months we shall be in a position to conclude the affair."

"I should think you may!" replied his nephew, with a slight degree of hesitation.

"George!" exclaimed the old gentleman, petulantly, "what is the matter with you? If I thought it possible you were weak enough to entertain any lingering affection for a woman who has made you ridiculous in the eyes of the world, if not in your own, I should discard you!"

Captain Herbert eagerly assured his wealthy relative that he might make himself perfectly easy on that account.

"As for your commission, it shall soon be restored to you. I have already given orders to Cox and Greenwood to purchase the first vacancy. Young Hawks must soon sell out—the astonishment has been, how he was ever permitted to buy in: a fellow with only a paltry fifteen hundred a-year!"

"Ridiculous!"

"Contemptible!"

The husband of Isabel took his leave in much better spirits. The thought of again resuming his military rank, and continuing the life of dissipation and folly which he had hitherto led, stifled in his breast any faint whisperings of conscience which had disturbed his repose.

"Captain Mottram!" he repeated once or twice to himself, as he drove to the club; "I wonder what sort of man he is? But what can it signify to me?"

As the event proved, it did signify to him more than he imagined.

Herbert was not the only person besides his uncle who noticed the announcement in the papers of the arrival of Captain Mottram from India. The valet of the late major, who had shared all his master's secrets, saw it. The fellow had made one or two ineffectual attempts to obtain an interview with the successful duellist—who, deeming his business of little or no importance, refused to see him.

"Humph!" said the valet, with a knowing look, as he read the announcement; "the game isn't up yet!"

The speaker drew from his pocket a small memorandum-book, such as are generally used by men engaged in betting transactions on the turf. It had been his master's, and he had contrived to secure it on his death, before the arrival of the constables.

"Here it is!" he said, "in his own handwriting: both I and his brother can swear to that! He won't see me, won't he! Then he shall see some one else!"

So saying, he put on his hat, and left his humble lodgings to seek for Captain Mottram.

At an early hour the following morning, whilst Herbert was still at breakfast, his servant handed him a card.

"Colonel Vandeleur!" repeated his master, as he read it with a certain uneasy sensation; "I know no such person—in some marching regiment, I suppose!"

"Doubtless, sir!" replied the man; "he looks as if he had just arrived from India, or some outlandish place where the line are generally sent to. His face is as brown as a berry."

"Not at home!" said the captain, sharply.

"I told him so, sir!" continued the domestic; "for I knew that you disliked visitors, and expected to meet your lawyers; but he said that his visit was not one of idle ceremony—that you must see him."

The "must" grated terribly on the ear of the ex-Guardsman.

"If I must see him," he answered, "be it so—show him in. But first give me a glass of brandy—my nerves are decidedly shaken this morning."

His valet thought so, too, but made no observation. Silently handing him the liquor, he retired to usher in the unwelcome visitor.

Colonel Vandeleur was the commanding officer in the regiment in which Captain Mottram served, and had just been invalided with him from India. He was a soldier of the old school—a strict disciplinarian, and a man of the strictest honour. He had been present when the valet of the late major sought out the brother of Herbert's victim, and explained to him the treacherous manner in which he had been killed—that the duel was a previously arranged affair—and produced the book in which the bet had been entered. In his indignation, the colonel not only advised the captain to call the duellist to account, but proffered his service as his second.

"To what am I indebted for the honour of this visit?" inquired Herbert, in his blandest tone.

The stern old soldier looked significantly, first at the domestic and then towards the door.

"Leave the room!" said the captain.

The valet did as he was ordered; but consoled himself by listening at the door.

"Now that we are alone," observed the colonel, "I will explain the motive of my visit to Captain Herbert!"

"If you please," observed the gentleman, pointing to a chair.

"It is, to request that he will refer me to a friend with whom I can arrange the time and place for a meeting with Captain Mottram!"

"Captain Mottram!" repeated the conscience-stricken man. "I have not the honour of his acquaintance!"

"He has heard of you!" observed his visitor, significantly. "But if it will in the least assist your recollection," he added, in a tone of bitter irony, "he is the brother of the man you lately murdered!"

"Murdered!" exclaimed the ex-Guardsman, with an air of insulted dignity. "Colonel Vandeleur, you forget yourself! That Captain Mottram feels aggrieved at the death of his brother, I can well conceive!"

"Can you, indeed!" said the old man, satirically.

"But that he should accuse me of his murder is most infamous! The major, after inflicting on me the deepest injury which one man can offer to another—destroying my domestic happiness—fell by me, it is true! But he fell in fair and honourable fight!"

"Pray, Captain Herbert," inquired his visitor, with the most provoking coolness, "do men of honour generally bet upon the chastity of their wives?"

"Bet—be—ridiculous!"

"It would be so," retorted the colonel, "were it not contemptible! That such was the case, I hold the proof in my hand!"

The speaker drew from his pocket the note-book of the unfortunate major. Even the effrontery of Herbert was not proof against such evidence. He was dumbfounded, and hesitated.

"It was a large sum—a very large one," continued the old soldier, "in your present circumstances—so many thousands upon a woman's chastity—and proves—"

"My confidence in her virtue!" exclaimed the captain.

"Or anxiety to get rid of her!" quietly observed the colonel. "The transaction, I regret to say it, was no less disgraceful to the brother of my friend than to yourself! But you have your choice, sir—a meeting within four-and-twenty hours with the brother of the man you so cleverly murdered, or a public exposure!"

"Without fearing the latter," answered Herbert, firmly, "I accept the first; but on one condition!"

"Pray name it?"

"That the pocket-book in which this ridiculous bet is entered—a bet which, mark me, I neither acknowledge nor deny—shall be given up to the survivor!"

The old gentleman reflected for a few moments before he replied.

"I see your object, sir!" he said. "But I agree to it."

"Will you give me a memorandum to that effect?"

"No!" replied the colonel, sternly. "It shall remain in my hands till the affair is decided! My honour must be your only guarantee!"

"As you please!" answered Herbert, carelessly—for he had recovered much of his habitual self-possession.

"May I offer you —"

"The name of your friend, sir?" said his visitor, interrupting him. "I came not here to exchange empty courtesies!"

"As you please, colonel!" coolly observed the husband of Isabel, who was far from considering himself check-mated—for he was an excellent shot. "There is the address of my friend, Lord Ilford, who, I doubt not, will lend his services on the present occasion as efficiently as he did upon the last!"

"Perhaps not!" said Colonel Vandeleur, placing the card in his note-case. "Captain Mottram, unlike his unfortunate brother, will come upon the ground fully prepared to defend himself! A man's hand is frequently less steady," he added, in a sarcastic tone, "when assured that his adversary really means to fire again! Good morning, Captain Herbert!"

Although the heart of the duellist secretly beat with terror—for he more than suspected that his success in the late affair had been in a great measure owing to the certainty of the major firing over his head—the captain dismissed his visitor with a smile as bland and courteous as if he had called to invite him to a festival, instead of a hostile encounter.

"Hang the fellow!" he muttered, as soon as he was alone; "the interview has quite unmanned me! Fool that I was to refuse seeing the major's valet! His visits are explained at last: a few hundreds might have bought the rascal over; but that is too late now! I don't know how it is," he added, seriously, "but my hand does not appear half so steady as it was: as the colonel observed, there certainly is something which gives a fellow nerve in the conviction that his adversary will not fire at him! Poor major! Pshaw! Hang it! If I begin to moralise, all will be over with me! Another glass of brandy!"

Instead of leaving for his club, Captain Herbert remained at home the rest of the morning, in expectation of a visit from Lord Ilford. He was not disappointed: about four, the youthful peer, accompanied by Cornet Graham, called upon him: he had seen Colonel Vandeleur.

"Pon my thoul, Herbert," said the young Guardsman, "it ith weally too bad! Another duel!"

His lordship affected a lisp—he thought it interesting.

"What can I do?" replied his friend, shrugging his shoulders; "they will force it on me! You would not have me show the white feather, for the honour of the corps?"

"Certainly not!" exclaimed the peer.

"Certainly not!" repeated the cornet, whose opinions on every occasion were but the echo of his noble friend's.

"I tell you what it ith, Herbert," continued his second; "I have contrived the meth on thith occasion."

"Well?" anxiously ejaculated the captain.

"They thwink, and I thwink tho, too, that ath we are bound in conthequente of our lathth affair, the duel muht come off in Franthe or Belgium, or thome plathe of that thort."

The duellist began to breathe more freely: it was at least a respite.

"I've then Vandeleur, who lithenth to reathon—that'th why Gwaham and I did not call before!"

"I am in your hands," observed the captain, "and must submit!"

"Of courthe you muht! tho it'th thettled that in eight dayth we meet at Calath: it giveth time for leave of abthenthe, and all that thort of thing! The old boy wath obthinate at firth," added the lordling, with an air of conceit; "but I talked him over!"

"My dear fellow, I am eternally your debtor!"

"Not at all!" said the peer; "you have been ecth-twently ill-uthed—made to look quite widiculouth—the wothth thing that can happen to any man—ith it not, Gwaham?"

"Certainly, my lord!" answered the echo.

"Thoote the fellow, by all meanth, Herbert: it will make you popular!"

"I'll do my best!"

"And come and dine with me," added the peer; "I ecthpect Alvary, and a few more; quite a quiet thing: we feed at eight!"

The captain was glad of any excuse to fly from his own thoughts, and promised to be punctual.

"Eight days!" he muttered, as he retired to his room to dress; "much may turn up in eight days!"

(To be continued in our next.)

ENSIGN SIMMONDS, OF THE TENTH.

WHEN railway travelling was undreamt of, and mail coaches were "alone in their glory," the ancient and sooty town of Sheffield rejoiced in the possession of an inhabitant named Mr. Samuel Peach. To have inquired for him, however, by that appellation, would have been next to useless. Not only in Sheffield, but throughout the length and breadth of the three Ridings of Yorkshire, he was known, and familiarly spoken of, as "Sam Peach, of the Angel coach-office," just as people speak of "Tom Waddell, of the Hen and Chickens, at Birmingham," or "Isaac Taylor, of the Lion, at Shrewsbury."

Eccentric in many things, yet with a dash of quiet humour, and a most catholic spirit of humanity in his nature, was this same Sam Peach. He was wealthy, of course—for eccentricity is too great a luxury for a poor man to indulge in. Of the importance of his position, as autocrat of the mail and stage coaches which travelled to and from Sheffield, he had a high opinion. Not having any connection with the Statistical Society, it would be impossible to state, with the requisite fulness and particularity of detail, how many of these coaches he possessed—how many horses he had "on the road"—how many quarters of oats and loads of hay his cattle annually consumed—how many miles per diem his carriages travelled—to how many families his calling gave bread. Enough is it to say, that Sam Peach, engrossing the "conveyancing department" in and from Sheffield, was considered a very wealthy personage—the rather, perhaps, because he studiously avoided the display of riches. He had purchased some land in the neighbourhood of Sheffield, extensive enough to be called an estate. He always spoke of it as "the farm," though the house he had erected thereon, was of sufficiently imposing appearance and extent to make it sometimes taken for the country seat of one of the squirearchy. With that "order" Sam Peach had no desire to be identified. Plain and somewhat brusque in his manner, he was proud of the business by which he had acquired an independence; and it is yet remembered as a fact, that on one occasion, when a distinguished commoner in the neighbourhood (since become a peer and a Cabinet minister) addressed him as "Samuel Peach, Esquire," the recipient, who knew the writing, returned the letter to the postman, with an indorsement, "not known at the Angel coach-office!"

Wealth and integrity, backed by his eccentricity, had made Sam Peach quite a popular character in Sheffield. Never did any one care less for popularity. His rule of conduct was to pursue the right, whatever should betide. His very peculiarities "leaned to mercy's side!" It was as much as any of his coachmen's place was worth, for one of them to see a tired foot traveller on the road, and not immediately "pull up," and invite the wayfarer to a seat. The sterling character of the man was estimated from the fact, that most of the people around him had been in his employment for upwards of twenty years.

It is more than probable that Sam Peach had never heard of the name and system of Lavater, and yet it is certain that he had a habit of taking likes and dislikes to people's faces, which involved the putting them "inside for outside fare," or for no fare, or the stout refusal to take them inside or outside of any of his coaches, at any price.

It happened, one sunny day in September, 1815, that Sam Peach was sitting in his coach office—"his custom ever of an afternoon"—engaged in examining a ledger; for he used to say that, by attending to business, he was pretty sure of business attending to him. A gentleman came in and asked what was the coach-fare to London?

The booking-clerk, with pen across his mouth, after the fashion of persons who would fain appear exceedingly busy, answered, "One pun' fifteen out; two pun' ten in."

The traveller desired to be booked for an outside place, if there were room.

"Not one seat taken," said the booking-clerk.

"I suppose I had better pay you here?" inquired the traveller.

"Just as you please," was the reply; "only, until we have the money, you neither put foot into the coach, nor on it."

The money was accordingly disbursed out of a not very plenteous purse.

"What name?" asked the booking-clerk.

"What name?" echoed the traveller.

"I thought I spoke plain enough," said the clerk, sulkily. "What name are we to book you by? You have a name, I suppose?"

"I beg your pardon," said the traveller, with a smile; "but I have been for some years where a man's name was the last thing required from him. Put me down Ensign Simmonds, of the Tenth."

Mr. Simmonds was duly entered in the book, and thence in the way-bill?—Indeed he was not!

The moment that the traveller had described himself as "Ensign Simmonds, of the Tenth," Sam Peach closed the big ledger, with an emphasis which sounded not unlike a pistol-shot—pushed the fat-headed booking-clerk aside—took his place, with a countenance quite radiant with excitement—and, in his blandest tone, asked what name he should enter in the day-book.

"Ensign Simmonds, of the Tenth."

"Well!" said Sam, in the subdued manner of a man holding a confidential conversation with himself. "Well! my ears did not deceive me! What a singular thing this is, to be sure!" Then, addressing Mr. Simmonds, he said, "In the army, sir?"

"Why, considering that I bear his majesty's commission, I think I may safely say that I am."

"Seen any actual service?"

"Yes; two years in the Peninsula, and in the last brush with the French at Waterloo."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed Sam Peach. "Got a Waterloo medal?"

"Ay, and a Waterloo wound. Indeed, I have been at home since my return, getting cured; and now that I am on my legs again, I am off to town to report myself at the Horse Guards for duty. Our second battalion is to be disbanded; and as we are likely to have a long peace, I am afraid I shall have some difficulty in getting upon full pay in another regiment."

"Then," said Sam Peach, rather anxiously, "I suppose you are not bound to be at the Horse Guards by any particular day?"

Mr. Simmonds replied that he was not.

"That being the case, sir," said Sam Peach, "it can't make any great difference your not being able to travel by any of my coaches this afternoon?"

"Not go? after paying for my seat!"

"Afraid not. All the seats are engaged."

Here the fat-headed book-keeper chimed in with "Not one on 'em! Only look at the way-bill!"

But Sam Peach pushed aside the officious underling, and declared that he "was a stoopid, who did not know what he was saying." Then, resuming his conversation with Mr. Simmonds, he added:

"The fact is, sir, all the seats are engaged. But as you have paid your fare, I am bound to send you forward in a post-chaise, or make the delay of no loss to you. My house is only a few miles out of town. I shall feel gratified by your coming out to dine with me to-day. In the morning I shall drive you in, if you like, and you can start for London by any coach you please."

Vainly did Mr. Simmonds assure Sam Peach that he had much rather proceed to London without delay; that he did not wish to intrude upon his hospitality; that he would prefer remaining at the Angel. Vainly, too, did he endeavour to ascertain why (when there evidently was no real impediment to his immediate departure for London), Sam Peach should wish to detain him. But Sam, determined to play the host, steadily declined giving an explanation; and the result was, that, at six o'clock that afternoon, Mr. Simmonds found himself at Sam Peach's table, discussing what any gentleman, even if he had not campaigned in the Peninsula, and had hospital fare at Brussels for some weeks after the day of Waterloo, would be justified in considering an excellent dinner.

Such a thing as "taking the pledge" (except at the Lombard Arms), was not thought of at that time; and therefore a few glasses of old wine did them no essential harm. Much they talked: Ensign Simmonds of the adventures he had met with while on foreign service; and Sam Peach, who was a capital listener, pleasantly keeping up the ball by occasional shrewd questions and racy remarks. At last—but this was about the conclusion of the second bottle of that incomparable port, which tasted like nectar, and smelt like a bouquet—Sam Peach grew communicative about himself; told how he had risen to opulence by industry, from a small commencement; and boasted how, far above his wealth, he prized his only daughter.

"You shall see her in the morning," said he; "for I did not like to introduce you until I saw whether my first impressions would be confirmed on closer acquaintance. It is not every one, I can tell you, that I would introduce as my friend to my daughter Mary!"

A capital breakfast the next morning; and not the less pleasant because pretty Mary Peach presided at the board, assisted in such social duties (as her mother had been dead for many years), by a maiden aunt, who was neither skinny nor shrewish.

"Pleasant weather!" observed Sam. "Are you much of a sportsman?"

"Rather!" said Mr. Simmonds. "We had plenty of practice at the red-legged partridges in the Peninsula. You should have seen how Lord Wellington peppered them when he had nothing else to do!"

"Well," said Sam, "unfortunately I had not the chance of seeing him. I think you said that you are not exactly tied to time as to your being in London; and if you can only make up your mind not to start until to-morrow, there's a famous Joe Manton in the hall. I happen to own the preserve across yonder valley, and I can tell you that that a gun has been fired there this season."

Mr. Simmonds remained for that day? To be sure he did. Fancy a young man of five-and-twenty, who had been on foreign service for three years, with a heart beating quick and strong within his bosom, and (at that time) not engaged in any particular love affair!—fancy him suddenly thrown into the society of Mary Peach—really a well-educated and pretty, if not quite a beautiful girl; pressed to make the place his home as long as he pleased, and the quarters surprisingly comfortable! Fancy all this, and wonder, if you can, at Mr. Simmonds quite forgetting that he had ever disbursed "one pun' fifteen" for the outside fare to London. Then there were such beautiful snatches of scenery all along that Glossop Road, which Mary Peach recommended him to look at, and to which she kindly accompanied him, as he might not be able to find them out without her assistance; and she had so much to ask, and he to tell her, about foreign countries, and the perils he had been in; and she made him tell her again and again how he had got his wound at Waterloo; and she had such a pretty way of seeming to listen with her dark-grey eyes, and—but I need not go on. It was a clear case!

"Then there were sighs, the deeper for suppression,

And stolen glances, sweeter for the theft."

In short, it had come to pass that Mr. Simmonds had a palpitation of the heart whenever Mary Peach spoke to him or looked at him.

"In love with her?" you will say. You know how it will end: a scene with the lady—a blush or two—half a dozen tears—the whole to conclude, with a whispered, "Speak to my father!"

Not exactly so; for when our hero found that he was in love, he took the opportunity of speaking to Sam Peach, before he mentioned a word of the matter to the lady.

You will think that he was in a pretty passion, no doubt?

Wrong again. Sam told Mr. Simmonds that he had been expecting something of the kind, having full use of his eyes and ears; that, under this expectation, he had made inquiries as to Mr. Simmonds and his prospects; that he was satisfied with what he had heard; and, if Mr. Simmonds could obtain the lady's consent, no man upon earth would be more acceptable as a son-in-law.

Shortly after, Mr. Simmonds and Mary Peach were united—she being too good a daughter to decline giving an acceptable son-in-law to her father. What fortune she had was never exactly known; but they drove off from church in a handsome chariot-and-four, which Sam Peach had presented "to the happy couple;" and just as the bridegroom was about stepping into the vehicle, where sat the bride, all beauty and blonde, Sam Peach delivered himself as follows:

"Simmonds, you never asked me what I saw in you, when first we met, to take a fancy to you, and bring you home with me. Know, then, that in the five-and-thirty years I have been at the head of the coaching in Sheffield, I have had hundreds of military men in my office, to be booked for places—generals, colonels, majors, and a crowd of captains—but you were the only ENSIGN that ever came across me! For the singularity of the thing, I thought that phenomenon worthy of a good dinner; and your own good qualities have done the rest. Good bye, now! God bless you! and let me hear from you and Mary every day!"

ISABELLE DE CROYE.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

ON, soldiers of St. Louis!—On, gallant youths of France! Ride for the Boar of Ardenness—upon him with the lance! Upon him—spur and spare not, until his blood be spilt;—And he—the curs'd of Heaven—lie as deep in gore as guilt!

Think of our noble Prelate—that white anointed brow, All cloven by the brutal axe—and spur for Vengeance now!

Think of the murderer, De La Marck, and of his ruffian horde—

And on them, like a thunderbolt, with arrow, spear and sword!

And fast and far—from hall and tower—prince, peer, and knight sweep by,

The banners of the fleur-de-lis rush, like a storm, on high! And many an upward gaze is cast—as rank by rank march on,

Where crowd the fair and beauteous o'er the gateway of Peronne.

There, lovely as the face of morn, when light hath kissed its cheek,

And golden clouds around its brow in grace and beauty break;

The love of every minstrel lute—the theme of every lay—Fair Isabelle de Croye appeared, and bore all hearts away!

Yet she—for whom e'en royalty had sought, and sued in vain,—

She, whom the Prince of Orleans had perill'd life to gain; The shrine of every soldier's hope, the star of every glance, Prefers a knight of Scotland to all the peers of France.

While, swiftly 'neath the battlements, in chivalrous array,

Advance the spears of Crawford, of Crevecoeur, and Dumois;

The thoughtful cheek of Isabelle waxed pale as if with woe,

Till Quentin, and the Scottish guard, sprang forth in gallant show!

Then flushed her brow with crimson—then throbb'd her snowy breast—

And love, in every glance and grace, came beauteously confest;

Oh, scarcely could her trembling breath the simplest word command,

When Quentin's favour'd lance convey'd a letter to her hand!

"Farewell, love, ne'er to see me more—or see me crown'd with fame!

To win thy hand I first must win a Hero's lofty name; And I have vowed by Scotia's saint!—by Honour's sacred shrine!

That you bright orb shall see me dead—or Conquest see me thine!

"Farewell! thy hand is still the prize for which I venture all!

And if—oh, if—dear Isabelle, despite of hope, I fall! Forget not 'mid the courtly throng, when others bend the knee,

The heart that 'mid the battle died—and died still loving thee!"

THE PROMISING DAUGHTER.

A STORY FROM REAL LIFE.

ONE sunny morning in August, a lady might been seen walking upon the "glorious Battery," apparently enjoying the coolness of the sea-breeze, as it came on its viewless steeds over the brightly sparkling waters of the bay, and bore to her whose cheeks it kissed, as it wantonly disarranged the ringlets of the beautiful child who was walking with her, a vivid remembrance of the cold mountain-waves over which it had passed.

The scene was enlivening to the lady, and as she seated herself to gaze upon those green islands which gemmed the blue waters stretching far away, and bearing on their bosom a countless variety of sea-craft,—from the ship-of-war and steamer to the ferry-boat and the tiny skiff—she seemed to inhale the refreshing air of the morning with positive delight.

Oh, how delightful to leave the dusty, noisy streets of the metropolis, and enjoy the refreshment of the ocean-breeze. It is wisdom—true wisdom—which dictates to any people the propriety of setting aside a particular spot where the rich and the poor can alike enjoy the shade of the trees, the cooling breeze, the sparkling fountain, and the green grass and beautiful flowers. Thus is the country, with its healthful influences, allowed a little space within the busy city, that the care-worn and the sickly may turn aside from the city's din, and dust, and wickedness, and commune for a season with the good, the excellent, the lovely, as they revel in the free air and sunshine gathering health of body and of mind.

But to return to the lady, whose name, let me inform you, is Mrs. Maitland. She looks quite happy, as she thus enjoys her promenade, but more joyous still is her light-hearted daughter.

Beautiful as a little fairy, Eudora Maitland was almost idolised by her mother, who, since her own widowhood, had lavished upon her all that wealth of affection which was once bestowed upon her husband. Eudora was as affectionate and intelligent as she was beautiful, and having naturally a poetic temperament, she enjoyed exceedingly a ramble with her mother amid the scenes of nature. She would choose a beautiful flower instead of a golden ornament, and a smooth, white pebble from the mossy brook near the house of her grandfather, in the country, was of more value than the prettiest toy to her. It was not strange, then, that, though so young that few would suspect her to feel so much, she yet greatly enjoyed this morning walk upon the Battery with her mother. No cloud of sorrow had ever darkened the sky of her youth, and all her pathway was illumined. With loving friends, and neither care nor poverty to steal the roses from her cheeks or the light from her eye, Eudora continued for years as joyous as on this fair morning.

While Mrs. Maitland, as we before remarked, was sitting, Eudora skipped with lamb-like agility and grace around her; and ever and anon her merrily-ringing laugh was to be heard, while her glowing cheeks and sparkling eyes evinced also the delight she was experiencing.

A gentleman and lady, passing near them, paused a few moments, and heard her say:

"Oh, mamma, how happy I am this morning!"

"Would that you could ever remain so!" exclaimed the gentleman, almost involuntarily, yielding to the impulse of the moment.

"And why may she not?" inquired his fair companion, in a tone of surprise.

"You must be almost perfect, Emma," was the gentleman's reply, "or you could not have asked. Experience teaches us many a hard truth which we might otherwise never learn."

And then he told her why he thought a shadow might come over the pathway of the beautiful little girl—even such a shadow as might make her mother wish that she had been taken to the angels ere the gloom of that shadow settled around her.

Let us trace the earthly progress of Eudora, and learn if the gentleman was wise in his remarks, and could predict with any degree of success the scenes of the far-o and mysterious future.

Some ten years passed away, leaving their usual impress upon those who were but mere children when they commenced their rapid flight; and upon none more than upon Eudora.

In the brilliantly-lighted saloon of a city mansion, were assembled the gay and fashionable, the wealthy and the beautiful, the aristocratic and the intellectual. It was a birth-night ball which gathered such a multitude together, and Eudora was the star of the evening. Attired in tasteful and rather costly style, though not extravagantly, she looked as beautiful as when, with the elastic step of early childhood, she gambolled amid the birds and flowers. Since the hour when we spoke of her as being on the Battery with her mother, she had improved in appearance as well as mentally. She had been the inmate of a boarding-school, where the accomplishments which so enhance the charms of youth and beauty were imparted to her.

And few who had seen her on this her birth-night ball—given "because," as she said, playfully, "she was emancipated from boarding-school slavery"—would have been unwilling to acknowledge that her instructors had been eminently successful. Gracefully did she glide through the changes of the cotillon and the routine of the contredanse, and captivated all who are charmed by the "poetry of motion," by her inimitable waltzing.

At last the music ceased, and, leaning on the arm of Orville Raymond, who felt himself highly honoured by her preference, and was disposed to triumph over his less successful companions, she entered the supper-room, and there delighted all within the sound of her voice by her sprightly tones and animated conversation. She had been the belle of the ball-room, for the gracefulness and ease of motion; she was now the "observed of all observers," for her conversational powers. But still more were the gathered friends interested when, as they adjourned to the piano, she proved to them that the instruction of her music-master had not been rendered in vain. And they who had failed to applaud her dancing or conversation, bowed to the mighty spell of her music, and acknowledged her to be the centre of the brilliant circle in which she moved.

It is true, there were some present who, knowing the influences which had ever been around her—the fond indulgence of her mother, the fashionable and sometimes heartless associates of the boarding-school—feared that the mind had been cultivated at the expense of the heart; and they received, as they thought, evidence of the fact in Eudora's conversation.

Oh, how can mothers sever their children from healthful home-influences, and place them where the influences, if not actually pernicious, are at least of a doubtful character?

The evening glided imperceptibly away, and the stars grew pale ere the last of that brilliant assembly sought their homes and their pillows. Orville Raymond lingered long enough to impress a kiss on the fair hand of Eudora, and then departed, to dream of her as the queen of fairy-land.

How was it with Eudora? She sought her chamber that night with a joyful heart, and when her mother, the next morning, inquired of her how she enjoyed the previous evening, she declared it the most delightful she had ever known, and wished it could always have lasted.

Then the thought arose in the mind of her mother—"Will all her life be as joyous as the past? Will there ever come a shadow?" Let us watch and see.

We will change the scene to the country residence of Eudora and her mother. It is several months later than the evening of the birth-night ball, and it is evening again; the moon is beaming brightly, and two forms may be seen by its mild light passing out of the little gate which led into a quiet path, shaded by the tall trees on either side, and leading to a beautiful lake. It is Eudora and her lover, Orville Raymond.

We call him her lover, but he had never asked to be considered such until this evening. The lovely twilight hour was chosen by him for the utterance of those words which conveyed to Eudora his desire for her companionship through life; and in that hour he had received with joy, from her mother and herself, the assurance that, when the appointed time arrived, Eudora should become his bride. Was it strange that, loving each other as they did, ardently and truly, their hearts should throb with joyous emotion, as they strolled forth together on that beautiful moonlight evening? Was it strange that no thought of a coming shadow, flinging deep gloom over her path-way, entered Eudora's heart?

Upon the brink of the placid sheet of water at last they stood. The tall forest-trees came in some places quite down to the water's edge, and were there mirrored, as the thoughts of Orville and Eudora were now mirrored in each other's hearts. In some places they apparently receded, leaving a small sandy beach, upon which stood the beautiful Eudora and her betrothed.

For a long time did they converse of the future, which seemed spread out gloriously before them, and many were their plans for future enjoyment.

At last they returned to their homes, but the same road was frequently trodden by them during the month of Orville's stay—and, alas! the sad result was, that the tempter's wiles were too powerful, and Eudora fell from the serene heights of virtue, and the shadow fell on all her earthly, and perhaps on all her eternal future!

Looking forward as Eudora did to a speedy marriage with the idol of her young heart's affections, she saw not before her the sad consequences of her fault; and therefore imagined but little how deep, dark, and dense the shadow would become which now rested on her conscience.

Ere we advance farther, let me ask, dear reader, what made the shadow? Like the cloud slowly rising from the horizon to the meridian, so was this gloomy shadow creeping over her path. It has reached her conscience, and, from the fact that it first enshrouded that, I answer to the query—what made the shadow?—thus: it was sin. Let us follow still farther, and see if this shadow mars Eudora's happiness only by resting on her conscience.

One month only had glided away since Orville's departure, and Mrs. Maitland was suddenly taken ill. Physicians of eminence and skill were summoned—but alas! in vain; and soon Eudora was an orphan. Once only, from the time of her seizure, did Mrs. Maitland recover her senses so far as to inquire for Eudora, urge her to be virtuous, and ask her forgiveness, if she had ever been harsh towards her.

Oh, mistaken mother! She had been too indulgent—for, had she but always urged her daughter to pursue the onward and upward path, she would have spared that daughter the bitter pangs of a wounded conscience, as she cast herself, with many tears, upon her knees at her mother's bed-side, and asked that she herself might be forgiven. And if that dying mother had known all the sad consequences of her false kindness—had she realised that the dark shadow caused by sin was resting on that daughter's conscience—her last hours would have been hours of deep repentance and untold anguish of spirit. But there was no confession mingled with the wild cry for pardon which burst from Eudora's lips; and, too ill to notice that her daughter's agitation was any greater than she might naturally expect at such a time, Mrs. Maitland pronounced her forgiveness, and added words of blessing.

On the morning of her mother's funeral day, Eudora arose early, for she could not sleep, and, descending to the parlour, gazed once more on the countenance of that loved, loved parent, whose features, though still familiar, were now placid in the repose of death. Then a tide of emotion swept over her soul. The dark shadow which had already, as we have said, settled on her conscience, now reared, in all the gloom of bereavement, upon her affections. She had loved her mother as she had loved but one other—and that other her future husband; and she could plainly see that her sin had rendered more terrible the affliction which was now her portion; and the tears that fell from Eudora's eyes that morning were not for her bereavement only, but for the sin which caused so dark a shadow.

Still crept the shadow on rapidly—too rapidly for Eudora's happiness. Already had it settled on her conscience and her affections—soon it enshrouded her hopes.

After her mother's death, it was found that very little remained of her property which could be rendered available for Eudora's need, and she aroused from the stupor into which she sank at the time of her mother's burial, in order to devise some plan for her future support.

Orville came to her as soon as he heard of her bereavement, and with him she devised a plan which, as they were so soon to be married, seemed to be the best.

Eudora possessed, as we have before seen, great talent for music, and she proposed to teach a class of young girls, if she could obtain such a class in a place not too far for her to meet Orville frequently, and make, with him, the requisite preparations for their marriage.

Orville left her to seek such a class. His own home was in a manufacturing village, not far from the city, to which he had repaired on a visit at the time he first met Eudora, when he had accompanied his cousin to her birth-night ball. He returned thither, and after a conversation with his parents, who were already apprised of his engagement, and fully approved it, it was decided that, if a class could be obtained in that village, Eudora should reside with them, and become a teacher.

Orville then sought pupils, and succeeded admirably. To his own great joy, Eudora would now have a home beneath his father's roof, and ere long he hoped to call her his bride.

It was a lovely evening when Eudora, accompanied by Orville, rode out from the city in the family carriage, and arrived at his early home. The house of his parents was spacious and somewhat elegant, though not very new. Beautiful woodbines and honeysuckles twined around the pillars of the front piazza, and a variety of trees and flowers filled the garden in front.

"This is a lovely spot!" exclaimed Eudora, "and if I am as happy here as the place is beautiful, I shall indeed be happier than I have been for many weeks that are past!"

"Do not reflect upon the past, dear Eudora," said Orville; "but look forward into the future. We shall be united in marriage soon, you know."

They had arrived at the gate by this time, and saw on the piazza the father and mother of young Raymond.

"Cheer up, now, dearest!" was Orville's only remark, as he drove up to the steps, and they alighted.

Eudora's reception was very cordial, and since she had lost all her nearest relatives by death, she soon learned to regard these good old people as her best and dearest friends. It was evident to others, as well as to herself, that Mr. and Mrs. Raymond regarded her already as their daughter, and they ever treated her as such.

Time passed on. Her class made rapid progress, and Eudora gave universal satisfaction. She became quite cheerful, being thus constantly in the society of her intended husband and his excellent parents.

Orville was engaged in a manufacturing establishment, and was so successful in business that he looked forward with confidence to the hour when he should place Eudora in a comfortable and elegant home. But the shadow was deepening and advancing.

One morning it became Orville's duty to attend to some repairs, and in so doing he was obliged to take a very dangerous position among the machinery. The machinery, however, was not in motion, and therefore at first there was no real danger. Suddenly the means which had been used to arrest the motion of the machinery failed to perform the desired object, and Orville was caught by an ascending band and carried over a wheel, which would have crushed him instantly to death, had it not been speedily stopped. As it was, Orville was taken from the awful situation in which he was placed, and carried, bruised and senseless, to his home. He lingered a few hours in extreme agony, and then died.

Before his death, he requested all but his parents to retire from the room, and he then solemnly and earnestly requested them to provide for Eudora, and receive her as their child—"for," said he, "she is my wife in the sight of heaven."

With deep repentance he then called for Eudora, and, though in great pain of body, seemed in yet greater anguish of mind, as he implored her to forgive him, and, placing her hands in those of his father and mother, he said:

"Take her for your daughter." And, after a few words in a low tone to Eudora, he passed away from earth.

Poor girl! she was almost beside herself during the time intervening between his death and burial. Here was an end to all her bright anticipations of a happy home, with Orville as her husband. Now, that dark shadow had fallen on her cherished hopes, and rendered her misery in parting with her lover still more intense. Their communion had been pleasant—but, oh! it was like the apple of Eden—sweet but destructive—and therefore she could not bear the thought that he who alone could offer any atonement for his sin, had departed, and left the shadow still resting and darkening upon her. Conscience, affection, cherished hopes, had felt its blighting influence, and yet one other hour of suffering was before her: then it might, perhaps, brood over a dishonoured grave.

For the first week after Orville's burial she felt no energy of body or of mind, and seemed scarcely to notice what was passing around her. Then she turned to her music-class, and strove in exertion there to rise above the depressing influences around.

Very kind were all the actions and words of Orville's parents and his other relatives. All the neighbourhood pitied her and sympathised with her, and as she passed through the village, or sat in the village church, arrayed in the habiliments of mourning, many a kind heart ached in sympathy for her who was now a widow in all but the name.

Orville's parents would have had Eudora relinquish her music-teaching—but no: she felt that at present she could not be a burthen on them, and must endeavour to obtain her own support. She was abundantly successful, but, as her health began to fail, her adopted parents began to urge her more and more to leave her duties, and seek health and repose in retirement from every effort to teach. She at last consented—for indeed her health required it; and bade farewell to her class with many tears. They loved her, and were sad at parting; but her sadness was greater than theirs, inasmuch as they had no grief preying upon their spirits, and no dark prospect before them. They bade her adieu, leaving with her various little gifts as tokens of their affectionate regard; and she left the room in which they had so often met, never more to enter it again.

She sought her home, and for weeks and months after that she never left her room. The house she never left, save to walk in the adjoining grounds for exercise, till she was carried out of it to her grave.

Ere long there was another grave by the side of Orville Raymond, and its tombstone bore the name of Eudora Maitland.

Reader, mine has been a sad story, but, alas! it is but too frequently that such a record might be given; and the truthful historian must at times present the dark side of human nature, and the dense shadow which hangs over the path of sin, that they who read may be warned in season to escape a fate as sad and mournful as Eudora's.

NEW INVENTIONS, &c.

LEGUMEN CHEESE.—The Chinese prepare an actual cheese from peas, called "tao-foo," which they sell in the streets of Canton. In preparing this cheese, the paste from steeped ground peas is boiled, which causes the starch to dissolve with the casein. After straining the liquid, it is coagulated by a solution of gypsum. This coagulum is worked up like sour milk, salted, and pressed into moulds, to make cheese.

EXPORTATION OF BEER AND ALE.—From returns lately published, it appears that large quantities of beer and ale were exported, in the month ending June 5. The value of beer and ale exported was £186,147—whereas the value of the same articles exported in the same month of 1852, was only £74,933.

CURIOUS CALCULATIONS.—The ocean, accepting the supposed average depth of it as 1000 feet, contains 29 millions of cubic miles of water; and to fill its basin would require all the rivers of the earth pouring their waters into it for 40,000 years. The amount of heat received from the sun every year would suffice to melt a crust of ice 32 feet thick, enveloping the whole earth. According to the technical reckoning, the solar heat which annually raises the sea-water in the form of vapour, corresponds to the enormous sum of sixteen billions of horse power.

BALMORAL.—We understand that the work of building the new mansion-house for the Queen and Prince Albert at Balmoral, is now proceeding rapidly. The snows among the mountains kept back the operations till a very late period of the season; but latterly a large force of men has been engaged by the builder, who is adding to their number. The walls are now considerably above the level of the ground, and the work will no doubt go on with celerity as the season advances.

CURE FOR CANCER.—Col. Ussery, of the parish of De Soto, informs the editor of the Caddo (U. S.) Gazette, that he fully tested a remedy for cancer, recommended to him by a Spanish woman, a native of the country. The remedy is this: Take an egg and break it, pour out the white, retaining the yolk in the shell, put in salt and mix with the yolk as long as it will receive it, stir them together until the salve is formed; put a portion of this on a piece of sticking plaster, and apply it to the cancer about twice a day. He has tried the remedy twice in his own family, with complete success.

FLORIDA PAINT ROOT.—This root grows in great abundance in the flat woods, near the streams, and in the savannahs of the counties of Levy, Marion, and South Florida. It has a top similar to the flag, and a root about the size of a man's thumb, of various lengths, running horizontal, not far below the surface. It is very juicy, and of a deep red colour. Hogs are exceedingly fond of it, and fatten on it rapidly, if they are black, or have black hoofs. It is said by the old settlers that hogs with white hoofs seem to founder, and their hoofs come off, which causes them to perish unless fed well till they recover. Even when the animal has only one white hoof, and the others black, the white hoof comes off. The root colours the flesh, bones, and marrow of hogs that feed upon it. There is no doubt this root may be substituted for madder, and become a source of no inconsiderable traffic. Like the arrow-root or compta, it grows spontaneously in great abundance, and may be cultivated, if thought advantageous.

ANATOMICAL DISSECTION OF ALLIGATORS.—A Dr. Cartwright, of New Orleans, amuses himself with the anatomical dissection of alligators—his object being, as he alleges, the demonstration of certain new physiological views that he entertains. On a recent occasion he cut up three of these monsters in the presence of a large number of scientific gentlemen, with the following results, according to a reporter: He divided the spinal marrow in three places—at the base of the neck, in the middle, and at the base of the back; nay, he divided the nerves emerging from the spine—and still, on irritating the nerve between the section and the extremity, he demonstrated that the animal possessed a diffused sensibility, a capacity to recognise pain, and even an intelligent power to act against or attempt to escape the cause of the pain. Cutting off the head of the animal, jobbing out the spinal marrow, dividing the nerves coming from them, and irritating them along their distal portions, they still retained this independent sensibility, and the mutilated limbs of the headless animal would make intelligent motions for getting rid of the local torture. These are curious and important discoveries. Dr. Cartwright contends, against long odds, it is true, that in the lungs, not the heart, resides the motive power of the circulation; that literally, as Moses asserted, the blood is the life of the flesh, and the air the life of the blood. He affirms, that after death, when the pulse has stopped, the heart is still, and the body is insensible to pain; by producing artificial respiration, by inflating the lungs, the blood can be started anew, its life revived, and the body resurrected absolutely from the cold abstractions of death. Both of his alligators had their windpipes tied, and one of them had his chest opened; with his heart, lungs, stomach, &c., exposed. In the course of two hours both animals were dead, pulseless, and quiet over flames of fire. Then, a bellows-nozzle being inserted into the trachea, inflation was begun, and continued for some minutes. We saw the motionless heart throb, the blood beginning to flow from the lungs to that organ—the eyes of the alligator opened, and the hapless “victim” lived again! The alligator whose chest was exposed, had his carotid artery accidentally cut—thereby losing a considerable quantity of blood: and hence it was not made so briskly alive as the other, which retained all its vital fluid.

USEFUL INVENTION.—A M. Berard, of Paris, by taking unburnt bricks from the field in layers, builds up a block of any required size, and then burns it like an ordinary brick, merely filling up crevices as the mass sinks in burning. For building bridges, docks, quays, &c., these blocks are particularly suitable, being indestructible by either sea or fresh water.

GLOVE-MAKING MACHINE.—A complete revolution is about to take place in the manufacture of gloves. Two inhabitants of Grenoble invented about the same time a machine for sewing gloves; but instead of competing with each other, they agreed to unite the advantages of each invention. One found means to sew mechanically the fingers of gloves, while the other, after sewing the remainder of the glove, was compelled to employ operatives to sew the fingers. The inventors, by combining the two machines, have produced one which sews gloves perfectly. This discovery has produced a great sensation at Grenoble, where the manufacturers were not able to supply the demand, for want of a sufficient number of operatives.

ACOUSTICS AND VENTILATION.—An architect of Canterbury, Mr. Marshall, has patented a method “for the diffusion and conveyance of sound in churches and all buildings,” which depends entirely, as it is explained to us, on the regulated transmission and emission of air. Air is brought in at the bottom and led away at the top into the tower, if there be one, or a turret formed for the purpose, if not. Some churches are spoken of as having been improved for hearing by partial application of the system—Faversham Church, and that of St. Mary, Bredin, at Canterbury, but we have not seen them; the patentee, however, is about to operate on St. Dunstan's in the West, and we shall then be able to test his system. His plan rests mainly on what he calls his “Phonette,” the object of which is to prevent a down-draught. This is a small box, open at both ends, but so contrived within as to give an easy passage to the air one way, and offer a complete stoppage to it the other. Thus, by a pair of bellows applied to one end, a candle at the other may be easily extinguished. But when you reverse the two, you cannot make the slightest impression upon the flame. This effect is obtained by the intersection of thin blades of wood within the box. This arrangement is one of great value. He applies his patent, too, to the improvement of musical instruments.

MR. HOBBS AND THE ENGLISH LOCKSMITHS.—It is now pretty generally known that until the year of the Great Exhibition nobody had succeeded in obtaining the “200 guineas” offered by Messrs. Braham to any person who could pick their celebrated lock. This piece of mechanical ingenuity was at last performed by Mr. Hobbs, from America, who was not a locksmith, but a lockpicker; since then the art of picking locks has become somewhat elevated, and has attracted the attention of several of our first-rate engineers. The Society of Arts, in John Street, Adelphi, desirous of promoting the skill of English locksmiths, issued a circular last year for premiums on various articles of manufactures, among which was one “for the invention of a good lock,” combining strength, and great security from fraudulent attempts, cheapness, freedom from disarrangement by dirt, and requiring only a small key. The conditions upon which the prize of £10 was to be awarded, seem to be somewhat inconsistent with the object required; but nevertheless the offer commanded attention, and the successful competitor was Mr. Saxley, of Sheerness; and to him the prize was awarded by the committee, the chairman being Mr. Chubb, the locksmith, in St. Paul's Churchyard. By a letter from Mr. Hobbs, which appears in the “Journal of the Society of Arts” of the 24th of June, we find that Mr. Hobbs's curiosity, which was only equalled by his modesty in not competing for the prize, induced him to inspect this piece of mechanism which the committee, presided over by Mr. Chubb, had pronounced to be one most in accordance with the prescribed rules of the society: when, so far from its possessing that “great security” required, he discovered that it was constructed on the principle of the “Yale lock,” such as are manufactured by Mr. Cotterill, of Birmingham; and to prove to the persons present that it possessed no “security,” Mr. Hobbs, taking a small straight iron wire from his pocket, and a thin strip of steel, opened it in the presence of several members of the society in three minutes! Without offering anything of a personal insult to Mr. Chubb, it is impossible not to question the accuracy of his judgment on this branch of mechanical art. There can be no doubt that the first requisite in a lock is perfect security; but if the public are misled by the mistaken judgment of men who decide upon the merits of the question, it will undoubtedly throw great suspicion upon the character of public scientific institutions.

POWER'S PATENT FOR SILVERING ALL SORTS OF METALS AND OF GLASS.—The patentee's process is performed as follows: He takes one ounce of crystallised nitrate of silver, dissolves it in twice its weight of distilled water, and adds 9½ per cent. by weight of nitrate of liquid ammonia. He then adds six times the weight of the nitrate of silver, of spirits of wine, agitates the liquid, and adds 15 per cent. on the whole volume of resinous spirit (composed of one part of resinous matter, by preference, gum galbanum, to five parts of spirits of wine). The liquid is then left to settle, and filtered, after which it has added to it nine times its quantity of spirits of wine, with the further introduction of 8 per cent. of liquid ammonia, and a quantity of spirits of wine equal to its whole volume. The solution will then contain about 5 parts nitrate of silver to 1000 parts of liquid. The liquid thus prepared and filtered may be used immediately in connection with a galvanic battery, in the manner usually practised by platers—but it is better to let it remain quiescent for some time. The anode, or thin sheet of silver in connection with the positive pole, acts perfectly in this liquid, and gradually dissolves in the bath; the deposition commences immediately on the objects to be plated being introduced into the bath, in a white and brilliant form, and the thickness of coating can be regulated at pleasure. To insure its more perfect adhesion, in certain cases the metals may be first passed through a solution of nitrate of mercury. When glass is the material to be coated, a thin film of silver is previously formed on it, by adding to the liquid a few drops of spirits of cloves in a separate bath, and the quantity of ammonia used in preparing the bath is only from 2 to 8 per cent. By precipitating copper on the silvered glass, and then detaching the two metals, plates may be produced suitable for daguerreotype or photographic purposes.

COLD WATER SAFETY STEAM-ENGINE.—The Cincinnati Nonpareil says that it has examined a new machine, invented by Mr. H. Triplett, of Washington City, which he calls “The cold water safety steam-engine.” This engine has occupied the attention of the inventor for twenty years past, and he now seems sanguine that his invention will surpass all others. When we saw it in operation it worked very smoothly and well, fully equal to any high or low pressure engine we have ever seen. The principle by which Mr. Triplett's engine is propelled, is as follows: A jet of cold water is injected into the generators, which is formed immediately into steam, highly rarefied. The steam having no space to exist in the generators, has to form an existence in the cylinders by the departure of the pistons—which power of departure is equal to the amount of water injected into the generators. The generators are formed of two cylinders each, the external one is neatly bored out, and the internal one is turned off, so as to fit the external one within the distance of one-sixteenth of an inch. So these cylinders form a thin heated surface between. The fire passes through the external and all round the internal cylinder, keeping both their surfaces continually heated. The water then injected, passes all around this heated surface, and is converted into steam acting on the piston. There are two pistons and two cylinders, acting as two cannons, one firing, the other loading, in Mr. Triplett's present model; but the same principle may be applied to one cylinder, on both ends, as in the ordinary manner of high-pressure engines.

THE WAX-INSECT TREE.

In a late flower-show of the Royal Botanic Society, there was exhibited in one of the tents, by Messrs. Rolleston, a by no means conspicuous-looking shrub, labelled—the “Wax-Insect Tree of China.” By many, doubtless, the shrub in question was passed unnoticed; lost in the blaze of floral splendour by which it was surrounded. But all those who are in any measure acquainted with the controversies to which it has given rise, and its great value in an economical point of view, will like to know more about it.

The inhabitants of the Celestial Empire have, it seems, great use for candles. Their gods cannot be worshipped acceptably without them, and no one ventures abroad after dark without a candle and lantern. Hence the consumption of these articles is very great. As among ourselves, both tallow and wax-candles are used: the latter being the more costly. Prior to the thirteenth century, wax-candles were made in China exclusively from bees' wax; but at that time a discovery was made of a new kind of wax, the product of another and very different insect from the bee. This, from its superiority, gradually and in the end entirely superseded the former material, and came to be exclusively used—being known under the name of Pe-la, or insect wax.

In the spring, the cocoons containing the eggs of the insect are folded up by the cultivators in leaves—sometimes of the ginger-plant—and suspended at various distances on the tree which is to be stocked. After having been thus exposed for from one to four weeks, the eggs are hatched, and the insects, which are white, and of the size of millet seeds, emerge and attach themselves to the branches of the tree, or conceal themselves beneath its leaves. Some authors state that the insects have at this period a tendency to descend the tree; and to obviate this difficulty, the Chinese keep the gravel perfectly bare, so that they are induced to ascend. Fixing themselves on the branches, the young insects speedily commence the formation of a white waxy secretion, which, becoming harder, suggests the idea of the tree becoming covered with hoar frost. The insect becomes, as the Chinese say, changed into (gradually imbedded in?) wax. The branches of the tree are now scraped, the collected matter forming the crude wax.

Dr. Macgowan estimates the annual produce of Chinese wax at not far short of 400,000lbs. The only considerable importations into England that we are aware of, were in the years 1846 and 1847, when nearly three tons were imported into London. Some of this wax, sold in April, 1847, fetched 1s. 3d. per pound—a price too low, we believe, to be remunerative; and no further importation, that we know of, has since taken place.

In China, candles are made of the insect-wax per se, but more commonly of a mixture of it with some softer fatty substance. To give to these softer candles a hard coating, they are dipped into melted insect-wax—often coloured red with alkanet root, or green with verdigris. As a medicine, the insect wax is used by the Chinese, both externally and internally, for a great variety of ailments. •Grozier—besides mentioning its employment as an application for wounds—states that it is sometimes swallowed to the extent of an ounce at a time, as a stimulant, by those about to speak in public.

A STRANGE AND IMPRESSIVE CUSTOM.

I WITNESSED one night a most singular custom among the native South Americans, which made a deep impression on me. On returning home rather late, after accompanying some captains of my acquaintance to the landing, where their boat was waiting for them, I passed a low-roofed house, in whose well-lit room music and dancing were going on. I tried to get a look through the curtained window, but did not succeed, and was just passing on when the door opened, and two men came out. A third one was just going to shut the door again, when he saw me, and, addressing me, asked, in the most friendly way, to come in and be welcome. Always ready to see what I could, wherever I got a chance, I followed on this kind invitation, and found myself the next minute in a perfect flood of light, but in a very small room, crowded with people. Taking in the whole at the first glance, the room seemed rather poorly furnished, with whitewashed walls, only here and there ornamented with small and coloured pictures of saints and martyrs. The tables and chairs were made of pine-wood—the latter with cane bottoms; and one corner of the room, and a great part of the whole space, in fact, was taken up by a large bed covered with flowered curtains, instead of a mosquito net, but the curtains thrown back at present, to afford room for those guests who would not dance themselves. Aqua-ardeute and dulces were handed round, while all, men and women—the dancers excepted—smoked their cigarillos. But the most remarkable thing in the room seemed to me a large kind of scaffold, which occupied the other corner, opposite the bed, consisting of a light frame-work, ornamented all over with artificial flowers, little pictures of saints, and a small quantity of small lighted wax candles. On the top of it, a most extraordinary well made wax figure of a little child was seated on a low wooden chair, dressed in a snow-white little frock: the eyes were closed, the pale cheeks tinged by a soft, rosy hue, and the whole figure perfectly strewn with flowers. It was so deceptive, that when I drew near at first, I thought it a real child, while a young woman below it, pale, and with tears in her eyes, might very well have been the mother. But that was most certainly a mistake; for at this moment one of the men stepped up to her and invited her to the dance—and a few minutes afterwards she was one of the merriest in the crowd. But it must really be a child—no sculptor could have formed that little face so exquisitely; and now one light went out, close to the little head, and the cheek lost its rosy hue. My neighbours at last remarked the attention with which I looked upon the figure, or child, whichever it was; and the nearest one informed me, as far as I could understand him, that the little thing up there was really the child of the woman with the pale face, who was dancing just then so merrily; the whole festivity, in fact, was only on account of that little angel. I shook my head doubtfully, and my neighbour, to convince me, took my arm and led me to the frame, where I had to step upon the chair and nearest table, and touch the cheek and hand of the child. It was a corpse! And the mother, seeing I had doubted it, but was now convinced, came up to me and smilingly told me it had been her child, and was now a little angel in heaven. The guitars and cacaes commenced wildly again, and she had to return to the dance. I left the house as in a dream, but afterwards heard the explanation of this ceremony. If a little child—I believe up to four years of age—dies in Chili, it is thought to go straight to heaven, and become a little angel; the mother being prouder of that—before the eyes of the world, at least—than if she had reared her child to happy man or womanhood. The little corpse is exhibited then, as I had seen it; and they often continue dancing and singing around it till it displays signs of putrefaction. But the mother, whatever the feelings of her heart may be, must laugh, and sing, and dance; she dare not give way to any selfish wishes—for is not the happiness of her child secured? Poor mother!—Journey Round the World.

[THE GREAT DRIVING ENGINE IN THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION.]

SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION
IN DUBLIN.

OUR illustrations in the present number comprise two subjects which may truly be said to be representatives of agents that are not only ruling the world, but actually daily creating in it conditions of the most revolutionary character. Machinery is changing the aspect of society, gold is accumulating for the purpose of being used as a medium for facilitating the manifold operations that are required by, and which arise out of, the necessities of society. Machinery is the productive power—gold the agent; and any intelligent visitor to the Dublin Exhibition can see this eloquently exemplified.

Our first illustration is the great driving engine which moves all the machinery that gives animation—we might add, intelligence—to the brilliant display of the products of native and foreign manufacturing industry which graces the Exhibition in Dublin. It was erected by the well known firm of Messrs. Fairbairn and Sons, and the new feature in its construction, apart from the magnitude of its machinery, is, that it is fitted with Mr. L. B. Pitcher's motive regulator. Without entering into the minutiae of a scientific explanation, we may state that this engine gives the motive power to the enormous spindles that work the various machinery in the halls assigned to the exposition of the more active operations of industry, and that the regulation is applied to the highly requisite purpose of distributing, equalising, and checking the power given to the spindles—the one, for instance, that runs the entire length of the Machinery Hall: so that when one machine—a loom, let it be supposed—is thrown out of play, the power thus given back to the spindles—or rather unemployed—shall not be imparted to the other machines at work, so as to disarrange them; but, as it were, be wasted, or returned to the spindle, without its turning faster or slower than before. It is a very nice as well as accurate arrangement, and does great credit to the inventor. The engine itself amply sustains the world-wide fame of its builders, and is justly considered not the least interesting attraction of the rich collection of objects of art and industry which now adorns the Irish capital.

For ourselves, we always prefer either to philosophise a little, or to look at such matters through a poetical medium. To us there is something awfully grand in the contemplation of a vast steam-engine. Stand amid its ponderous beams and bars, wheels and cylinders, and watch their unceasing play—how regular and how powerful! The machinery of a lady's watch is not more nicely adjusted—the rush of the avalanche is not more awful in its strength. Old Gothic cathedrals are solemn places, preaching solemn lessons touching solemn things; but to him who thinks, an engine-room may preach a more solemn lesson still. It will tell him of mind—of mind wielding matter at its will—mind triumphing over physical difficulties—man asserting his great supremacy—intellect battling with the elements. And how exquisitely complete is every detail—how subordinate every part towards the one great end—how every little bar and screw fit and work together! Vast as is the machine, let a bolt be but the tenth of an inch too long or too short, and the whole fabric is disorganised. It is one complete piece of harmony—an iron essay on unity of design and completeness of execution. There is deep poetry in the steam-engine—more of the poetry of motion than in the bound of an antelope—more of the poetry of power than in the dash of the cataract. And ought it not to be a lesson to those who laugh at novelties, and put no faith in inventions, to consider that this complex fabric, this triumph of art and science, was once the laughing-stock of jeering thousands, and once only the waking phantasy of a boy's mind, as he sat and, in seeming idleness, watched a little column of vapour rise from the spout of a tea-kettle. And then to think of the great minds that have been employed upon its creation—upon the hours, days, years, of nervous, brain-throbbing study it has cost, the money and industry that have been expended upon its erection, and the manifold uses to which its services are applied: and thus thinking, it must be cheerfully conceded that it is one of the most poetical of subjects; and, in a practical sense, the great champion of the rights of intellect, and the illustrious forerunner of a time when the majority of mankind shall not labour like the yoked beasts of the field, but equitably and generously participate in the good things which Providence has spread before his industry, tact, and cultivated capacity.

And as Ireland has hitherto been far behind in her appreciation of the value of machinery, we must be allowed to indulge in the opinion that she never will be a happy and prosperous country, until she takes to her bosom those means and appliances which exalt industry to "the highest heaven of invention." But, say the ignorant, machinery competes with labour—and so depreciates the condition of the labourer. That is absurd—it is the unequal distribution of the products of machinery that presses heavily on the labouring community: have better institutions, and the public themselves would be the very first to rally round machinery as their best friend—the staunch conservator of their dearest interests. To those who dread the innovations of machinery, we will take the liberty of addressing a few serious words on the dreaded, but much misunderstood subject of competition. To develop our intention, we take the subject per se. What is competition? What are its attributes, either for good or evil? When we hear of a number of displaced or unplaced labourers striving to insinuate themselves among others who are employed, we hear at the same time that competition lowers wages. When we hear of manufactories starting into existence under the auspices of enterprising capitalists, we hear at the same time that competition raises wages. In like manner we are told that competition lowers rents, profits, and interests, and also that it raises them. Ought we to believe all that we hear? Are all these wonders that are attributed to the influence of competition, possible and credible—or are they contradictory and impossible, and therefore incredible?

One would fancy it must be found a little strange to those who have habituated themselves to the notion that competition is largely instrumental in producing misery, to hear that competing men are not only acting in different directions, but that they are always acting in a direction opposite to that of their own wishes. But something yet stranger remains to be presented to them. Amidst what is called the strife of competition, a good harvest causes the price of corn to fall, as a bad harvest causes it to rise.

A population rapidly increasing in civilisation and numbers causes rents to rise, as a population retrograding in civilisation and numbers would cause them to fall. Capital increasing more rapidly than the numbers of a people, will make wages rise; while an increase of the number of the people more rapid than the increase of capital, will make wages fall; where capital earns large profit, the rate of interest is high; and where capital earns but small profit, the rate of interest is low.

Man, in whatever part of the world we find him, is as much a competing animal as we know him to be at home. But his competition seems to be exercised in the midst of very different results. If, for example, we compare the United States and Australia with the United Kingdom, we observe competition in the two first accompanied by low rents and low prices of raw produce, and high prices of manufactured articles; while in the United Kingdom competition is accompanied by high rents and high prices of raw produce, and by low wages, low rates of profit and interest, and low prices of manufactured articles.

The preceding facts and reflections must, we should think, lead to the suspicion that the phenomena of high and low prices, high and low rents, high and low wages, and high and low rates of profit and interest, are all the effects of causes among which competition acts a very subordinate and insignificant part. All men compete, more or less; by their very nature they must compete. They compete to make themselves comfortable, agreeably to what their notions of comfort may be. When actively engaged in any department of productive or professional industry, they compete to make their efforts successful and profitable. But their success or want of success cannot be correctly attributed to competition; and if it be really attributable to other causes, a knowledge of which is indispensable to our well-being, there must be danger if we allow the word "competition" to act as a charm upon our thoughts, to distract them from that course of inquiry which is likely to lead us to the discovery of those causes. When an engineer, a physician, a surgeon, or a lawyer, has established a character for usefulness in his profession, the public compete for his services, and his emoluments are large. The cause of his success is his professional merit, or rather the public competition.

When one belonging to any of these classes has failed to establish a character for usefulness in his profession, the public feel no desire to compete for his slender services, and his emoluments are small. The cause of his success may more truly be said to be the deficiency of his own merit, than the want of public competition.

A working man unpossessed of capital, or whose capabilities can be turned to the best account, in alliance with the capital of others, has, through a long course of active service, established a character for usefulness among the employers in his department of industry. They compete for the purchase of his labour—he obtains comparatively high wages.

If the employer, either through mismanagement or some vicissitude of trade, is obliged to suspend his work and to discharge his workmen, other employers are eager to secure the services of so valuable a man. Surely this workman's success is owing to his own merit rather than to the competition of employers.

Again, other working men, either through indolence, ignorance, unskillfulness, dishonesty, unpunctuality, drunkenness, or recklessness, fail to inspire capitalists with a notion that their labour can be regularly turned to account. Some of them, however, will obtain employment, but will soon lose it by their ill conduct. When they look in, the cause of their so looking in being no secret, other capitalists are slow to purchase what has little or no value. The whole class of such men become the casual labourers of society—the labourers who, in the convulsive movements of industrial employment, are apt to be thrown aside, unthought of and uncared for.

They compete among one another for the scanty and casual wages that are still hoped for, although difficult to be obtained. Their competition may assume a most hideous form—it may resemble the ferocious struggle of a pack of wolves for the small scraps of a single carcase. The wages, when obtained, are miserably low; constant employment is obtainable by none, and not even casual by all; and misery is general among them. Surely this misery is more correctly attributable to the character than to the competition of the workmen.

A difficulty will suggest itself here to most inquirers, who will remind us that workmen of good as well as those of bad character will sometimes find themselves in the position of temporary supernumeraries. This is undeniable, and the difficulty must be investigated.

On close inspection it will be seen at once that workmen can no more be divided into two classes—good and bad—than they can be bisected into tall and short, and weak and strong. The individual workmen of whom the whole body is composed descend by insensible gradations from the best to the worst. An uncivil or an ill-tempered man will part from his employer, when a civil or a good-tempered man will not. From one extreme to the other, it will be found that those workmen who combine in themselves the largest number of good qualities have high wages and constant employment, and those who are most nearly destitute of all, will have the lowest wages and the least certain employment. It is true there are branches of business, the employment in which is necessarily uncertain and intermittent; but the good workmen attached to this department of industry will either combine other re-have been blessed with industrious and provident parents, who have known their duties to their offspring, and have striven to perform them—parents who have provided themselves with the means of developing the strength and intelligence of their children, and of forming their habits so that they may be able, when men, to take their share of active duties of life with comfort, respectability, and usefulness; while it was probably the lot of the worse workmen to be prematurely turned adrift from parental protection, or to have their undeveloped strength, unenlightened intelligence, and unformed character, sold to the higher bidder by their own wretched parents, as a means of relief from a distasteful duty.

But people who have been long accustomed to pronounce and to think that low wages, low prices, and low profits, are caused by competition, cannot readily rectify the association which has established itself in their understandings. What is called competition lies on the surface of society, much as the hands on the surface of a clock, of which the spring and regulator of movement are hidden from view, but must be studied and understood. Equally necessary is it to study and understand the less apparent fixings and regulators of industrial enterprise.

IMPROVED SAFETY RAILWAY SIGNAL.

Not the least interesting features of the Dublin Exhibition are the railway signals that are laid before the public, for their inspection. Speed on a railway can be obtained to almost any extent. We ourselves have travelled at the rate of sixty miles an hour on the Great Western; but comparative safety is an advantage still to be introduced. The various companies have exerted themselves in the matter; but what they have hitherto done has not been sufficient to prevent the occurrence of the most lamentable accidents. It must be evident that stationary signals cannot effect much; but what they do contribute to the protection of the travelling public is considerable.

Our illustration shows a signal which can be worked by one man, and with great rapidity. This is effected by turning a handle; and by the same movement of the hand directing either the semaphores by day, or the slides in the lamp by night. This is considered a wonderful improvement over the old system, and we do not doubt, if it came into general use, that it would not only afford some extra protection to the public, but greatly facilitate railway travelling. But our own impression is, that safety at high rates of speed will never be realised until the management is changed. There must be a more stringent check, not only on the engine-drivers, but the managers, and directors; and competing lines must be restrained in their anxiety to obtain dividends by cutting down the salaries of workmen. A stringent supervision of railways by the government has now become a national necessity, and the proprietary of the companies would consult their best and most lasting interests by urging upon their respective directories to submit to the most generous proposition that may be thrown out, either by the executive of the country, or some one capable of advising in so serious a matter.

QUARTZ CRUSHING AND GOLD-CLEANING MACHINE.

Our second illustration leads us from the discussion of the principles involved in the national acceptance of machinery, as the second active industrial agent in existence: to gold—bright, shining, glistening, yellow gold—gold, dug from the bosom, or gathered from the surface, of bountiful earth. It is a quartz-crushing and gold-cleaning machine, the invention of Mr. P. J. Klasen. To enable our readers to become better acquainted with its merits and uses, we must indulge in a short disquisition on gold, and where it may be found. The celebrated traveller, Humboldt, informs us that "gold is a constant in meridian-directed mountains;" and recent facts have amply proved the correctness of this observation. Both in California and Australia, as well as the Ural, the general bearing of all those mountains in which gold is found is meridional, or north and south. But it must be borne in mind that, though it is generally true that the auriferous mountains—such as the Ural, the Californian, and Australian ranges—all lie in the line of the meridian, yet there are several slight deflections, or deviations, from this general rule,—since, from all these leading ranges, especially from our Australian Cordillera, there proceed, in various directions, several spurs, or on close to which pepitas—vulgarily called nuggets—of gold have been found.

There is nothing peculiar in the appearance of the gold country. Stunted vegetation, broken ridges, and continuous hills of quartz or clay slate, are the chief characteristics. The general aspect of our gold-fields is barren. The prevailing rocks are quartz and slate. Quartz—which, par parenthese, we may mention is silica, or flint in its crystalline form—is said to be the matrix of gold—that is, its original position, from which it has been removed by some violent concussion, when the fragmentary ruins were washed down by the rains, and scattered over the plains below. In Argyle, gold has lately been found incased in granite—and hence it has been said that there it has a granitic matrix.

It may here be asked, how comes it, since quartz, or granite, is the matrix of gold, that so small a proportion of it has been found in these rocks, compared to the quantities dug out of clay slate? In Victoria the richest yield of gold is obtained from a stratum of blue clay, situated at a depth varying from two to ten feet. At Mount Alexander, from which more gold has been dug than from all other places in Australia put together, the precious metal has been found in the greatest abundance between strata of clay slate, standing nearly perpendicularly to the plane of the horizon. It is among the cleavage fissures of those slaty rocks that the experienced digger looks for his rich nuggets. In such a position gold is found battered, abraded, and water-worn. That gold should be found thus situated, and in such quantities, is clearly explained in the following manner:

munerative labour with it, or will, by economy, provide against the vicissitudes inseparable from their business. Another security against suffering from temporary suspension of employment is always to be found among the better workmen of society—a security which should teach us in what direction to look for the amelioration of the lot of the worse workmen. The better workmen, as a rule,

"The clay slate laminae are perpendicular; and, striking upright as they do, they catch the gold that has been detached by the breaking up of the quartz veins, and that has, in the gradual wearing down of the hills, been carried over them."

The largest specimen of gold hitherto discovered in Australia has been found imbedded in quartz.

Gold is found in quartz, or schists, or granite; but it has also been found in other rocks. In the Ural Mountains gold is found in limestones, as well as in quartz and schists. On Mr. Wentworth's property, at Frederick's Valley (near Bathurst), gold has been found in ironstone; and at Shoalhaven gold has been found, by the Rev. Mr. Clarke, in argillaceous iron clay; and a specimen of gold incased in ironstone is now in England.

Gold has also been found buried in alluvia, on both the banks and bars of creeks, whither it was washed down by the rains.

Gold has also been picked up from the surface of the ground, chiefly in fragmentary quartz; and it is evident that the gold thus found cannot have been removed far from the rock in which it originated, as it is not abraded or water-worn. We are informed that lumps of rock have been taken at random in Australia and sent to Sydney; where, on being carefully examined, they were found to contain 5 per cent. of pure gold; and yet this is the very metal with which, for years past, the roads and bridges in that neighbourhood have been paved! Truly we may well boast of our geological learning, when we remained half a century ignorant of the boundless treasures which we were daily kicking away with our feet!

As in the Ural Mountains, gold is found in Australia at all elevations—from a few hundred feet to the height of at least two thousand feet above the level of the sea.

It is evident, from this slight resumé of the aspects of the gold-fields of the world, that the largest quantity is still imbedded in quartz, and that the amount hitherto gathered bears but a small proportion to that which may be anticipated. In 1843, the entire annual production of gold from all sources was estimated at £1,290,000; in 1848, by the aid of the Ural Mountain mines, £4,160,000; in 1850, by the aid of California, £14,790,000; in the present year the yield from all sources is expected to be not less than £40,000,000. But if quartz-crushing—that is, delivering the gold from its hard imprisonment in crystallised flint—can be prosecuted with advantage, that quantity, in the course of two or three years, must be doubled. Mr. Klaser, by the facilities which his machine affords, should it be adopted to any extent in Australia and California, promises this result. As will be seen by the engraving, it is worked by water power; but of course, should it be found necessary or more advantageous, steam power could easily be brought into requisition.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XLIV.

Sincerity, thou first of virtues, let
No mortal leave thy onward path,
Though from the gulf beneath destruction cry,
To take dissimulation's winding way.

TRULY have our great moralists observed, that crime is ever the parent of crime. No sooner do we take one false step in the path of virtue, than it entails on us a perilous descent: the second and succeeding ones are all but the inevitable consequences of the first.

Elizabeth appears, through her long life and reign, to have been haunted by a fixed terror—the claims of those who stood in succession to her crown. She was conscious, perhaps, of the defect in her own title; and hated those who, in the eyes of legists and many grave authorities, possessed a better. Her cruelty to Lady Katherine Grey, whose children she had branded with illegitimacy—her persecution of the royal line of Lennox, and ignoble conduct towards the captive Queen of Scots, are indelible stains upon her memory. Posterity has judged her for cruelty and treachery, and condemned her.

Every engine which her unscrupulous policy could devise was set in motion to obtain possession of the infant King of Scots, who, after his mother, was the direct heir of her throne. Overtures were first made to Murray and the rebel lords who had deposed their sovereign—but the wily traitors knew Elizabeth too well to trust her with so precious a hostage. In vain did she promise to leave them in undisturbed possession of the regency of their distracted country—to assist them with men and supplies to maintain their authority against the partisans of the queen: they were neither to be bribed nor cajoled. Attempts were made to carry off the infant James, but they failed. The northern foxes on this occasion were too much for the English lioness, with all her address and power.

Had she succeeded, Elizabeth would have held within her grasp every being in the line of succession. Happily for her fame, the project failed. History, in recording the events of her reign, has one dark page the less to be inscribed with its pen of iron.

Elizabeth was far too shrewd not to perceive the great political advantages which the downfall of Mary gave her. Her unhappy kinswoman, accused of the double crimes of adultery and murder, agreed, as well as the triumphant leaders of the faction which had driven her from the throne, to submit the entire question to the judgment of the English queen, who might have made her own terms as the price of restoring Mary to her crown; but no—the woman triumphed over the politician. The unworthy pleasure she felt in keeping her rival a captive, prevailed over the advice of her counsellors and the dictates of prudence and honour.

The crime, however, like most crimes, carried its punishment along with it. The interest excited amongst her nobility and the people of the north, by the misfortunes and beauty of Mary, tore her heart with jealous forebodings. She was like some foolish person who had wantonly grasped a serpent by the neck, and feared to relinquish her hold, lest it should turn and sting her.

The commissioners appointed to decide between the parties assembled at York, where her enemies produced a number of letters and sonnets, said to have been written by her to Bothwell. In vain the captive Mary demanded to be confronted with her accusers—the boon was denied her; but so convinced was the Duke of Norfolk of her innocence, that he made her an offer of his hand—a project which was at once revealed to Elizabeth by the Earl of Leicester, to whom he had foolishly confided it.

Mary was soon afterwards taken from the custody of Lord Scroop, and sent to the safe keeping of the Earl of Shrewsbury, who, from that day, never knew a peaceful hour. Although considerably advanced in years, and already a grandfather, his termagant wife either was, or pretended to be, jealous of her royal captive, whom she treated with the greatest indignity and harshness.

Elizabeth was not even a generous gaoler; for although she thought fit to keep an independent sovereign, who had sought refuge in her dominions, captive, her parsimony was such that she could not bring herself to provide for her necessities.

Curious letters are still extant, in which the earl makes dreadful complaints to Cecil of the great charge he is at for the keep of his illustrious captive, and begging for remittances.

The delusion under which the Countess of Lennox laboured, that Mary was the murderess of her son, was speedily dissipated. She saw through the artifices of her persecutors, and not only absolved her in her own mind from all participation in the crime, but manifested as much sympathy as she dared to show towards her.

From this dark shade in the character of the great Protestant queen, it is cheering to turn to a brighter side of the picture. The persecutions of the reformed church in the Low Countries excited her warmest sympathy. Many of its members, forced by the cruelties of the monster, Alva, to abandon their homes and country, were honourably received in England by Elizabeth, who accorded them not only protection but assistance—a proceeding which naturally embroiled her with the Spanish court.

Hostilities were commenced in the Gulf of Mexico, where several English ships, engaged in the slave-trade—which Elizabeth, for the sake of the gain it brought, greatly encouraged—were taken by the Spanish vessels.

Bitterly did the haughty daughter of Henry VIII. resent this insult to her flag. Orders were given for reprisals, and four ships belonging to the King of Spain, laden with treasure, being driven by pirates for shelter into the English ports, her majesty ordered them to be detained, and confiscated the money to her own use, under pretence, as war had not yet been formally declared, of borrowing it for a short time.

Alva—for whose service in the Low Countries the money was destined, and who felt that it was absolutely necessary for the prosecution of his infamous designs—wrote a most insolent letter, demanding its restitution. Elizabeth treated it with the contempt it merited.

It was one of those cool circumstances in which the maxim that "the end justifies the means," may be admitted—since the loss of the gold crippled the power of one of the most infamous persecutors that ever disgraced the Church of Rome.

Don Guerran d'Espes, the Spanish ambassador, was one of the most finished courtiers and adroit flatterers of his time. By his delicately turned compliments he had gradually worked himself into favour with Elizabeth—which favour, however, did not prevent her causing his letters to be intercepted, and every movement well watched: despite her vigilance, a portion of his correspondence reached its destination, and Alva, acting on the advice of the writer, laid an embargo upon all English property and subjects in Antwerp, then one of the first commercial cities in the world.

Elizabeth was in her closet, previous to holding her usual morning reception, when Cecil brought her the news.

The mincing, affected, girlish air of Elizabeth vanished in an instant as the secretary read the communication, as well as the additional proofs of Don Guerran's advice to Alva. The blood flushed over her temples and neck—which, according to the custom of unmarried English ladies, was exposed—and even showed through the thick coating of rouge upon her cheek.

"God's death!" she exclaimed, striking her hand sharply upon the table; "are we to be braved with impunity by this persecuting duke—our subjects imprisoned—their property, which we are equally bound to protect, taken from them? If I cannot handle my father's sword, I at least sway his sceptre! We must take measures with this fire-brand!"

"May it please your majesty," replied the minister, "orders have been issued to urge on the works at Plymouth and the ports as speedily as possible."

"Right, Cecil—right!" observed his mistress. "Should the King of Spain sanction the conduct of Alva, or the insolent letters of his ambassador, we must prepare for war!"

"The King of Spain has sanctioned it, madam!" answered Cecil; "here," he added, "is a letter, written by Don Guerran to the duke, in which he alludes to the instructions he has received from His Catholic Majesty, and even ventures to—to—"

"To what?" impatiently interrupted Elizabeth; "do not mince your words—I am no child; speak out!"

"To characterise your majesty by an expression which loyalty and respect forbid my lips to repeat!"

So saying, he bent the knee, and handed the queen the last dispatch which he had intercepted.

The letter, amongst other matters, contained an infamous libel on the character and life of Elizabeth, under the title of "Amadis Oriana."

Cecil, who, in the course of his correspondence with the English ministers of the different courts of Europe, had to encounter their representations of the scandalous reports spread concerning the queen in foreign countries, secretly was not displeased, perhaps, at the lesson which the discovery of the ambassador's treacherous libels conveyed to his coquetish sovereign, who stamped and swore with rage.

So greatly was she incensed, that the prudent minister began to doubt the wisdom of the step he had taken.

"Give orders," she said, bitterly, "to arrest every Spaniard in our dominions: not one exception! mark me, not one!"

"Madam, I —"

"Obey!" interrupted the queen, fiercely, "of course! no need of words! A British sovereign, who has been insulted, has no need to look far for a minister to vindicate the honour of the crown he serves! The traitor!" she added, bitterly; "the double-faced, smooth-tongued traitor! but he shall find, if I have the red hair of the lioness"—this was in allusion to one of the ambassador's expressions concerning her—"I am not without its fangs!"

Elizabeth, even as an aged woman, was particularly tenacious of any slight to her personal charms, and affected a girlish, coquetish deportment—which only served to render her ridiculous in the sight of the foreign ambassadors; but at the period of which we at present write, she was in the very prime of life, and not an unhandsome personage.

"However great—however justifiable your royal indignation," observed the secretary, who now began to feel alarmed at her violence, "your majesty, I am sure, will remember what is due to the character of the ambassador of Spain, whom, as I passed to the royal closet, I saw, with the nobility and foreign ministers, in the great hall, waiting to offer his respectful homage!"

"His homage," exclaimed Elizabeth, scornfully, "in the great hall! 'Tis well! I'll shame the knave in the presence of my court! Not a word, Cecil," she added, with a frown, "even from your lips, my trusty, faithful counsellor and friend! I cannot bear it now!"

So saying, with a most unroyal step she marched, or rather ran, from the apartment in the palace of Hampton where the above scene had taken place—forgetting, in her anger, to take a glance at her attire in the large Venetian mirror which she had previously been consulting: the surest possible indication of her having entirely lost all control over her temper.

Cecil followed, anticipating the scene which was to ensue.

CHAPTER XLV.

No scandal against Queen Elizabeth, I hope.

THE CRITIC.

THE great hall at Hampton Court, which Wolsey had caused to be adorned with rich tapestry from the looms of Arras and Beauvais, was crowded with the highest nobility of the realm, who had assembled to pay their morning respects to the virgin queen. The ladies—although court mournings were not yet de requier—in imitation of their sovereign, were in black, on account not only of the death of the young and beautiful Queen of Spain, but of the Lady Knollys—Elizabeth's near kinswoman—one of the few females who were promised her friendship, and whose loss she appears to have mourned with more sincerity and affection than she generally entertained towards any of her own sex. But Lady Knollys, not being of the blood royal, and consequently removed from all chance of the succession, was not an object of jealousy to her on the point upon which she appears to have been most susceptible. Amongst her courtiers were the noble Earl of Sussex, her old admirer, Arundel, the favourite, Leicester—who at this time had given up all hope of obtaining her hand—the gallant Raleigh, and the adventurous Drake—names which shed so much lustre on the annals of her reign.

Don Guerran d'Espes, the Spanish ambassador, was also present, little dreaming of the storm about to burst upon him. His excellency was in conversation with Throgmorton, who had just returned from Scotland, when the lord chamberlain, seeing the gentlemen ushers throw open the great doors, and hearing the clank of the partisans borne by the yeomen of the guard, upon the floor in the antechamber, announced, in a loud voice, "Her Majesty the Queen!"

Conversation in an instant was suspended, as Elizabeth—her countenance flushed with rage—entered the apartment. Several of the nobility, who had favours to solicit, or suits to promote, bent the knee as she passed; but the royal virago took no notice of them. She was in no mood for sweet words or hollow promises. Directing her steps towards the great painted window where Don Guerran was standing, she paused directly opposite to him, and eyed him for an instant with a bitter, sarcastic smile. The wily diplomat saw in an instant that he was the object of her anger, but, with habitual self-possession, howed; not a feature moved, although he must have guessed the storm about to break.

"So, sir," she exclaimed, "your master's agent, Alva, has, I hear, laid an embargo on the merchantmen of my subjects! Anon I will send him ships not quite so peaceful in their character! How long is it," she added, laughingly, "since a subject, duke though he is, has arrogated the right to make war upon the ally of his master?"

"Doubtless, madam," replied the minister, calmly, "the proceedings of the duke can be explained! Your harsh conduct to him, touching the treasure destined to pay his troops, and the reception you have afforded to the rebel subjects of the king, his master, who have fled to England, justify him, in his own mind, for the steps he has reluctantly been obliged to take!"

"Let him thank his own cruelty for the latter!" retorted the queen. "As a Christian woman, I cannot but feel for those of my persuasion whom he hath persecuted and plundered! As a sovereign, I shall neither ask of the duke, nor the king, his master, how I shall receive those who seek shelter in my dominions—which ever have been, and whilst I live ever shall be, free from the control of any foreign prince! But, thank God," she added, "we are neither unadvised nor unprepared!"

The ambassador replied again by a low bow and somewhat ironical smile. Knowing how the country was divided—the great embarrassment caused to the government of Elizabeth by the presence of the Queen of Scots in her dominions—he was not prepared for the rigorous measures which Elizabeth, with great promptness and courage, had decided upon.

"And pray, Sir Minister," continued her majesty, "tell me—who you are a gallant cavalier—the pink of courtesy and breeding—what does the envoy of a foreign state deserve, who slanders and libels the sovereign to whose court he is accredited—and that sovereign a woman?"

Don Guernan was thunderstruck.

"God's death! answer me, knave! If I am a red-haired lioness, beware my fangs! Amadis Oriana! to the queen of England! Did I wear a sword, I should know how to use it—as it is, I must content myself with my woman's sceptre!"

"If your majesty has been insulted," exclaimed the Earl of Sussex, drawing near, "it is for the nobility of England to avenge your quarrel upon this insolent Spaniard!"

The high spirited noble was about to draw his sword, when Cecil, who had followed Elizabeth into the great hall, laid his hand upon his arm and restrained him.

Several other peers, amongst whom were the Dukes of Norfolk and Leicester, drew nearer to the circle in which the singular scene was being enacted.

"Not so, Sussex," said his royal mistress, gratefully; "we can avenge the double insult offered to us, both as a queen and a woman, without the service of your loyal arm! We have already given orders," she added, in a calmer tone, "for the arrest of every Spaniard in our dominions! If Spain wishes for war, England will not shrink from the contest!"

"Every Spaniard!" repeated the ambassador, seriously; "your majesty surely forgets one native of that country who must be exempt from such an outrage!"

"And who may he be?" carelessly asked the queen.

"The ambassador of its monarch!" answered Don Guernan, proudly; "my office, madam," he added, "is sacred!"

"And what is mine," firmly demanded the daughter of the Plantagenets and Tudors, "that thou shouldst insult and brave me? or the Duke of Alva, that he writes an insolent letter demanding restitution of treasure not his own? Am I so little, or he so great, that no more ceremony is necessary between us? To your lodging," she added; "those of my guard will attend you. Fear not, man—they will answer for your safety!"

So saying, she turned upon her heel, and left the discomfited diplomat overwhelmed with confusion and shame at the discovery of the double treachery of which he had been guilty.

On leaving the palace he was arrested by the captain of the royal guard, and conducted to his residence in London, where three gentlemen were appointed to guard him: despite her indignation, Elizabeth not thinking fit to inflict the additional disgrace of sending him, as she at first meditated, to the Tower.

Extraordinary as this step was, it has been considered justified by the treatment which her own minister, Dr. Man, received at the court of Spain: that ridiculous person, in the excess of his Protestant zeal, having thought proper to publish an insolent defiance and challenge to the Pope, whilst accredited to his most Catholic majesty—for which offence he had been banished to a village some miles from the capital.

Although the decision of Elizabeth had been hastily taken, she was too haughty, too confident in the support of her subjects in a war with Spain, to recede. Preparations were commanded and pushed forward with uncommon vigour; every port and arsenal in the kingdom resounded with the note of warlike preparation.

Shortly after the arrest of Don Guernan, the Duke of Alva had the insolence to accredit an envoy to Elizabeth, as if he had been a sovereign prince; but before he could present his credentials, she caused him to be arrested, commanded that he should be shown the great arsenal, and the ships of war which she was building; then had him conveyed to London, separated from his attendants, and kept in strict confinement.

The unfortunate messenger, unable to communicate with the ambassador, employed a Spanish gentleman to present his letter to the queen; but Cecil, who was determined that he should declare the object of his mission before he saw Don Guernan d'Espes, forcibly took possession of the letter, even in the presence-chamber of his sovereign: a step he would never have ventured to take without her previous sanction.

The prospect of a war with Spain was exceedingly popular with the Protestant party throughout the kingdom: so greatly had the impolitic conduct of Philip to his subjects of the reformed church in the Low Countries, and the atrocities of his instrument, the infamous Duke of Alva, incensed men's minds against them.

Persecution is the least likely means of crushing a sect or party—the seed which is sown in blood is almost sure to ripen.

ESSAYS.

NO. CXCV.—TEMPLE BAR.

EVERY resident in the metropolis is familiar with Temple Bar—that memorial of an age and of opinions of which the England of the present day is justly ashamed. Visitors from the country recognise it as a very ugly arch, with a room overhead, said to be in the occupancy of a banking firm, and lent on such grand occasions as a royal visit to the City, or the burial of some hero in St. Paul's Cathedral, to eminent personages, who delight in spectacles to which London, per se, furnishes its contingent—Gog and Magog, the twin deities of Guildhall, to the great grief of all the 'prentice boys of the metropolis, being of late not exhibited in propria persona. The drivers of cabs and omnibuses indulge in awful expletives over the stoppages to which they are subjected at its grim portals, and on sundry and divers occasions, both the servants of the public and the public itself exclaim: "Take it away! why don't the corporation remove it?"

"It's not no manner of good, whatsoever," cries a cockney tradesman; but, notwithstanding this fierce popular indignation, Temple Bar stands, and is likely to stand. And why should it not? Is the City to be stripped of every vestige of the past, and go down to posterity shorn of every ancestral honour? Turtle and venison forbid it! Let us, for the sake of the unities, so long as there is within sight of Bow Church a very respectable triumphal arch, preserve this one monument of a period of which we have so many stirring and solemn lesson-teaching traditions. Temple Bar is instructive. It points significantly to now and then. In its dim windows, and on its beetle brows and mud-plastered gates, we can read stories of the past. The present is alive, and speaking in organ volumes—so it can answer for itself; but Temple Bar, all smoke-begrimed as it is, must tell its own tale—or why is it allowed to stand? "I ask you with a tear, let that old bar stand," is the pathetic entreaty of Alderman Gobbie—and let it stand! Who wants it down? Stand, then, old bar, as black and ugly as of yore—but tell us why thou standest? Suppose one of thy statues, Orson-like, to be endowed with reason, what would be the round, unvarnished tale its loosened tongue would unfold? Would it not be something after this fashion? In the good old times of Charles II., King James, King William, Queen Anne, and the blessed Georges, it was the custom, even "my father's custom," not to bid the guests to a feast of cakes, and nuts, and rich grapes from sunny Spain—but to a banquet of skulls and grinning fleshless jaws. London Bridge, in the olden time—the fog days of England's heart and head—enjoyed the privilege of being host on these convivial occasions: but after the massacre of the Fifth Monarchy zealots by that exemplary gallant, Charles II., the honour was transferred to Temple Bar—because, being placed between the liberties of the cities of London and Westminster, it sets to each a limit. Thenceforth its historical renown became imperishable. Stand or fall, its associations must survive while there are eyes to read and printers to give vitality to intelligence. Who, then, brought the venerable City gate into notoriety? Not Sir Christopher Wren—for he blushed at his own design—but one Sir Thomas Armstrong, whom the unscrupulous government of that day had entangled in the pretended Rye House conspiracy. All the world knows that on this awful occasion—awful, because God's life was sworn away by a hired informer, and the majesty of law and justice was polluted—we say that on this dreadful occasion, Lord William Russell, the husband of the incomparable wife, Lady Rachel Russell, died on the scaffold in Lincoln's Inn Fields; Algernon Sidney—in morals and politics sans peur et sans reproche—prayed for his murderers on Tower Hill; Holloway, dragged from the West Indies, suffered at Tyburn; and Sir Thomas Armstrong, basely delivered up by the Dutch, and adjudged, in his absence, of complicity in the alleged plot, was hanged at the same place. Sir Thomas was a staunch royalist, but he was a Protestant, and a friend to the Duke of Monmouth, the son of Lucy Waters, who was believed to have been lawfully married to the infamous Charles II. This provoked the vengeance of the heir apparent—the papistical, vindictive, and stupid Duke of York—and Sir Thomas fell a victim to his fears and cold-blooded hatred of every one who viewed his accession to the throne with apprehension. After his mock trial, the mission of Temple Bar was inaugurated. But let the diligent historian tell the story without embellishment.*

During Sir Thomas Armstrong's absence in Holland, an indictment had been preferred against him in London for high treason, upon which he had been outlawed. On his arrival, the government resolved to proceed against him upon this outlawry, without allowing him the benefit of a trial. On the 10th of June, therefore—the day on which he reached London—he was committed to Newgate under a warrant from the Secretary of State; and on the 14th of the same month was carried to the King's Bench at Westminster, when the Attorney-General, Sir Robert Sawyer, moved the court for an award of execution upon the outlawry. The scene that followed between the prisoner and the Chief Justice (the inhuman Jefferies) is of a character too remarkable to be slightly passed over. The Clerk of the Crown having arraigned him upon the outlawry, Sir Thomas Armstrong addressed the Chief Justice:

"My lord, I was beyond seas at the time of the outlawry, and beg I may be tried!"

Lord Chief Justice: "That is not material at all to us. We have here a record of an outlawry against you, Sir Thomas!"

Sir Thomas Armstrong: "I desire to be put upon my trial, my lord!"

Lord Chief Justice: "We cannot allow any such thing. We have nothing to do upon this record before us, but to award execution! Captain Richardson, which are your usual days of execution?"

Captain Richardson: "Wednesdays and Fridays, my lord!"

Sir Thomas Armstrong, having afterwards called the attention of the Chief Justice to an Act made in the sixth year of Edward VI., which allowed a party a twelvemonth to surrender to an outlawry, contended that that period had not expired. In doing this, he was repeatedly interrupted by the Chief Justice, who manifested the greatest impatience to pronounce sentence upon him; and Sir Thomas, having finally urged that he should have the benefit of the law, "That you shall have," jeeringly exclaimed the Chief Justice, "by the grace of God! See that execution be done on Friday next, according to law! You shall have the full benefit of the law!"

Thus terminated a proceeding, alike disgraceful to the judge that pronounced, and to the sovereign that could permit such a sentence to be carried into effect.

On the 20th of June, about nine in the morning, he was placed on a sledge, and, attended by the sheriffs and a numerous guard, conducted from Newgate to Tyburn. On his way, he employed his time in reading the "Whole Duty of Man;" and having reached the appointed place, he laid aside the book, and requested that Dr. Tension might be permitted to come near him—to whom he delivered a paper for the sheriff, and knelt down with him for a few minutes. He then resigned himself, with perfect composure of mind, into the hands of the executioner. After hanging about half-an-hour, he was cut down; and, pursuant to his sentence, his heart and bowels were taken out and committed to the flames, his body divided into four parts—which, with his head, were conveyed back to Newgate, to be disposed of according to his majesty's pleasure—and were afterwards publicly exposed. His head being set up upon Westminster Hall, between those of Cromwell and Bradshaw, one of the quarters upon Temple Bar, two others on Aldersgate and Aldgate, and the fourth was sent down to Stafford, which borough he had represented in Parliament.

Shortly after this event, when Jefferies had an interview with the king at Windsor, Charles took from his finger a diamond ring of great value, and gave it to him. This ring was ever after called the "bloodstone." His majesty prudently added this advice—to be careful not to drink too much wine on circuit.

Thus did Temple Bar acquire fame as a city monument, and this accumulated so rapidly, that for nearly a century it presented to grieved, astonished, and gaping London and Westminster, the ghastly spectacle of a human head—sometimes three, but always one—grinning dumbly on the passers-by below.

After Armstrong's brutal murder, twelve years had elapsed, and the Stuarts had been kicked out of the country. Still they had partisans. The loyalty of some Englishmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen, and Welchmen of that day for the House of Stuart, was a passion that misfortunes, persecution, even death, readily kindled into a flame. Sir John Friend and Sir William Parkins were tried and found guilty of being concerned in a conspiracy to assassinate William III. The quarters of Sir William Parkins and Sir John Friend, together with the head of the former, were placed on Temple Bar. Evelyn, in his "Diary," quaintly remarks: "A dismal sight, which many pities. I think there never was such a Temple Bar till now, except once in the time of King Charles the Second—viz., Sir Thomas Armstrong."

After the good Queen Anne—good, we imagine, because the rigid exigencies of the state, during her reign of thirteen years, did not contribute a single skull or limb to Temple Bar—came George I.: and the old bar once more "grinned ghastly a terrible smile." The troubles of 1715 contributed to Temple Bar the head of Colonel Henry Oxburg, a Lancashire gentleman devoted to the interests of the exiled family. Tower Hill, in the same year, was stained with the blood of the youthful Earl of Derwentwater—Her Majesty Queen Victoria gains small credit for withholding the title from his legitimate descendant. The aged Lord Kenmore, a Gordon, true to the badge of his clan—the ivy—also suffered, as did the Earl of Carnwath and Lord Widdington, round whom gathered the prestige of the glory gained by his ancestor at the battle of Chevy Chase. Scant was the mercy in the bosom of a Guelph for these chivalrous and unfortunate men. They all perished; and in their deaths were as illustrious as their lives had been pure—for even their enemies admitted, that "by their bounty, the poor and needy had been fed, and to them the widow and the fatherless had never appealed in vain for protection." But what mercy could the adherents of the house of Stuart expect in a reign tarnished with such Newgate Calendar atrocities as these?

"James Shepperd, executed for high treason at Tyburn, the 17th March, 1718, at the age of eighteen."

"John Matthews, a printer, for printing and publishing a seditious libel, executed at the age of nineteen, at Tyburn, November 6, 1719."

Women were also burnt to death. The law assigned this horrible punishment for the crime of high and petty treason.

For the latter crime, the last to suffer in London was Catherine Hayes, burnt to death at Tyburn, for the murder of her husband—for the former, Catherine Murphy, for colouring a piece of metal to resemble a shilling—made high treason by the 15th and 16th Geo. II. c. 28.—was burnt in the Old Bailey, on the 18th March, 1789; by the humanity of the sheriff, however, she was first strangled. By the 30th Geo. III., c. 48, this revolting mode of punishment was abolished, and hanging substituted.

The next sacrifice to the appetite of our modern Gogotha, was one Christopher Laver, a lawyer. His head, we are told, frowned longer from the summit of the arch than that of any other occupant. He was more a cavalier than an attorney; for he was addicted to wine and women. The latter betrayed him. His crime was rashly undertaking—no doubt at the instigation of some of his noble clients—to overturn the Hanoverian succession.

He died with remarkable firmness, habited in a court suit and a tie-wig. At the place of execution he openly declared his adherence to King James, and offered up a prayer for the restoration of the exiled royal family. He had not accommodated himself to the opinion that the idea of the divine right of kings was only adapted to Milton's "Paradise of Fools;" and for his want of that wisdom, on the day subsequent to his execution his head was placed on Temple Bar, as a warning to all politicians of the same class; and there it remained, blackened and weatherbeaten with the storms of many years, until it actually became the oldest occupant. It remained fixed on the summit of the arch for thirty years—a whole generation, according to the average rate of mortality that then prevailed. It was one of the sights of London for that dreary period; but one stormy night—there was heavenly mercy in that gust of wind—it descended from the arch into the Strand. The head, begrimed and black with the smoke and rain of thirty years, was picked up by a Mr. John Pearce, who showed it to some persons at a public-house, under the floor of which it was interred. "A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind."

But before it fell, the "rising of '45," and the decisive defeat at Culloden, brought it some companions. Francis Townley and George Fletcher, with 114 other Englishmen, surrendered at Carlisle, on the 30th December, 1745; and on the 29th July, in the following year, perished on the scaffold. The execution, on Kennington Common, was a disgusting spectacle. While the executioner was burning the still palpitating heart of one of the victims, a woman, young and beautiful, gave one hysteric shriek—one loud, long-drawn cry of agony—and died on the spot. Her heart broke, and her loving spirit mingled with that of her lover. The heads of Townley and Fletcher were placed on Temple Bar, and so brutalised were the public of that day, that glasses were let out on hire, "that the morbid feeling of the masses might be indulged by a closer examination."

These were the last profanations of the holy temple of intellect permitted in England. The French revolution and the march of knowledge put an end to these inhuman exhibitions. The history of the "Bar" here should terminate; but we cannot avoid informing our readers that on the 31st March, 1772, one of the remaining heads was swept from its lofty position, and very shortly afterwards, on a very windy night, the other fell; and Temple Bar has been unoccupied by such ghastly tenants ever since. Such is the veritable history of a building which the City of London preserves with dogged veneration. Does it fear to offend the Crown by its removal? Or is it, being like all other corporations, destitute of a conscience, indifferent to public opinion.

We fear such is the case, and that Temple Bar will stand, to be a nuisance and a reproach to London, for many years to come. As a memorial of the past it is repugnant to the instincts of the present day. It serves to revive memories which had better be buried in oblivion; and to the imaginations of those who can feel for men who perished nobly for conscience sake, it is robbed in horrors. But if the all-potent corporation of London say it must stand, stand it must. So let it stand, invested with every tradition that can render it an object of loathing and abhorrence.

LEGEND OF BLARNEY CASTLE.

How many have heard of Blarney, and how few know how and why this appropriate term has originated. How could they, indeed, unless they had made a pilgrimage to the Castle, as I did, in order to manœuvre Tim Cronin into a narration of its legends. They may go to Blarney whenever they please, but the genius loci has vanished. Tim Cronin has been gathered to his fathers. By no lingering or vulgar disease did he perish; he died—of a sudden.

Scarcely any part of Ireland has attained more celebrity than the far-famed village of Blarney, in the county and near the city of Cork. At Blarney may be seen the mysterious talisman, which has the extraordinary power of conferring remarkable gifts of persuasion on the lips which, with due reverence and proper faith in its virtues, invoke the hidden geni of The Stone to yield them its inspiration. The ceremony is brief;—only a kiss on the flinty rock, and the kisser is instantly endowed with the happy faculty of flattering the fair sex ad libitum, without their once suspecting that it can be flattery. On the masculine gender it is not less effective. Altogether, it enables the kisser, like History,

"To lie like truth, and still most truly lie."

Immortal poesie has already celebrated the locality of Blarney. The far-famed chanson, written by Richard Alfred Milliken, and called "The Groves of Blarney," has been heard or read by every one: in these later days the polyglot edition, by him who has assumed the name of Father Prout, is well known to the public.

Blarney Castle is surrounded by the Groves mentioned in the song. It stands four miles to the north-west of "the beautiful city called Cork," and, of course, in the fox-hunting district of Muskerry. All that can now be seen are the remains of an antique castellated pile, to the east of which was rather incongruously attached, a century ago, a large mansion of modern architecture.

The Castle stands on the north side of a precipitous ridge of limestone rock, rising from a deep valley, and its base is washed by a small and beautifully clear river, called the Aw-martin. A large, square, and massive tower—a sort of Keep—is all that remains of the original fortress. The top of this building is surrounded with a parapet, breast high, and on the very summit is the famous Stone which is said to possess the power, already mentioned, of conferring on every gentleman who kisses it the peculiar property of telling anything, in the way of praise, with unblushing cheek and "forehead unabashed." As the fair sex derive this gift from nature, the oscular homage to the Stone conveys no power to them. From the virtues which it communicates to the masculine pilgrims, we have the well-known term blarney and blarney-stone.

The real Stone is in such a dangerous position, from its elevation, that it is rarely kissed, except by very adventurous pilgrims of the Tom Sheridan class, who will do the thing, and not be content with saying they have done it! The stone which officiates as its deputy is one which was loosened by a shot from the cannon of Oliver Cromwell's troops, who were encamped on the hill behind the Castle. This stone is secured in its place by iron stanchions—and it is this that the visitors kiss, as aforesaid, and by mistake.

Between Blarney Castle and the hill whereon Cromwell's troops bivouacked, is a sweet vale, called "The Rock Close." This is a charming spot, whereon (or legends lie!) the little elves of fairy-land loved to assemble in midnight revelry. At one end of this vale is a lake of unfathomable depth, and Superstition delights to relate stories of its wonders.

In the summer of 1825, Sir Walter Scott visited Blarney, accompanied by Miss Anne Scott, Miss Edgeworth, and Mr. Loekhart. A few days after he was there, it was my fortune to tread in his steps to the same classic shrine.

The bare-footed and talkative guide who would accompany me over the Castle, thus described the "Aristo of the North" and his companions:

"A tall, bulky man, who halted a great deal, came here, with his daughter and a very small lady, and a dash of a gentleman, with a bright, keen eye, that looked here, and there, and everywhere in a minute. They thrust themselves, ransacking, into every nook and cranny that a rat would not go through scarcely. When the lame gentleman came to the top of the Castle, wasn't he delighted, and didn't he take all the country down upon paper with a pencil, while one of us sang 'The Groves of Blarney.' He made us sing it again, and gave me a crown-piece, and said that he'd converse a poem on the Castle, himself, maybe!"

While I am thus gossiping, I am neglecting Tim Cronin, "the best story-teller (to use his own words) within the whole length, and breadth, and cubic mensuration of the Island!"

After my visit to Blarney Castle, I met this worthy. I had struck from the common path into that which led through the Rock Close. This valley is divided into several fields—all of which are extremely fertile, except that immediately washed by the waters of the lake. It was now in the month of June; and although the mowers had begun to cut down the rich grass of the other fields, there was scarcely a blade upon this. It was as smooth, green, and close-shaven as the trim turf before a cottage ornée. While I was remarking this, I was startled by a sudden touch upon the shoulder; and, turning round, I found myself vis-à-vis with a Herculean-built fellow, who doffed his hat with a sort of rude courtesy, made an attempt at a bow, and, before I could say a word, struck into conversation.

"Wondering at this meadow being so bare, I warrant you, sir?"

I confessed that it had surprised me.

"Didn't know the why nor the wherefore of it, maybe? It's Tim Cronin—and that's myself—that can tell you all about it, before you have time to get fat!"

I ventured to exhibit my ignorance, by asking who Tim Cronin might be?

"Faith, sir, you may know a great deal of Latin and Greek—and 'tis easy to see that the University mark is upon you; but you know little of real literature in old Ireland, if you don't know me! Not know Cronin, the renowned philomath, that bothered the Provost of old Trinity in Algebra—from the Saxon al, noble, and the Arabic geber, the philosopher! Never once heard, perhaps, of the great Cronin, that does all the problems and answers for the 'Lady's Diary' in mathematics—from the Greek mathema, instruction? Nothing like getting at the roots of words—the unde derivatur!"

Even at the hazard of appearing as an ignoramus in the eyes of Mr. Cronin, I was fain to admit that I had not previously heard of his name and erudition. I ventured to intimate, as a sort of half-apology, that I was a stranger in that part of the country.

"Strange enough, I'll be bound!" said he, with a shrug of the shoulders. "Know, then, that I am that same Tim Cronin—our ingenious correspondent, as the 'Mathematical Journal' calls me, when it refuses one of my articles, 'from want of space'—bad luck to 'em, as if they could not push out something else to make room for me! Curious, sir, not to have heard of me, that keeps one of the finest academies, under a hedge, in the Province of Munster? Just sit down on the bank here, and I'll soon enlighten you so, about that good-looking lake before your two eyes, that I'll be bound you won't forget me in a hurry!"

Complying with the request of this august personage, I had the satisfaction of listening to his legend, thus.

"Once upon a time, and there was no lake here, at all. In the middle of the place where that lake is, there stood a large castle, and in it dwelt an unbaptised giant—it was before blessed Saint Patrick came into the country—and this giant had martial rule over all the country, far and near.

"In his time, the Aw-martin, nor any other river, did not flow near us. Indeed, though there was plenty of wine in the Castle, there was a great want of water. This was very inconvenient for the ladies—the fellow had as many wives as a Turk—because they were always wanting to wash their clothes, and their pretty faces, and their white hands, and their well-shaped bodies; and, more than that, they could not make themselves a raking cup of tea by any means, for the want of good, soft water. So, one and all, they sent a petition to the giant, praying that he would have the kindness to procure them a well of water. When he read it, he made no ado, but whipped off through the air—just like a bird of Paradise—to his old aunt, who was a fairy, and had foretold that, some day or other, water would be the death of him. Perhaps that was the reason that he always took his liquor neat.

"Well, he told her what he had come about, and after a world of entreaty—for she had a foreboding that something unfortunate would come of it—the old fairy put a little bottle into his hands. 'Take this,' said she, 'and drill a hole in the rock at the foot of the Castle barbacan, where the sun throws his latest ray before he sinks into the west. Make a stone cover for the top of it—one that will fit it exactly. Then pour the water from this bottle into that hole in the rock, and there will be a well of pure water, for the use of yourself and your family. But, when no one is actually taking water out of this well, be sure that the close-fitting stone cover is always left upon it—for it is the nature of the liquid to overflow, unless it be kept confined.'

"He gave her a thousand thanks, and shone he went. The first thing he did was to drill a hole in the rock (and he did not find that a very easy job), then to fit it with an air-tight stone-cover, and, lastly, to pour in the water out of the little bottle.

"Sure enough, there immediately bubbled up an abundance of bright, clear, and sparkling water. The giant then assembled all his family, and told them how the stone cover must always be kept over the well when they were not using it. And then his wives agreed, as they had been so anxious to get this water, that one of them, turn about, should sit by the well, day and night, and see that no one left it uncovered. They were content to submit to this trouble, rather than run the risk of losing the water.

"Things went on very well for some time. At last, as must be the case when a woman is to the fore, there came a tremendous blow-up. One of the giant's ladies was a foreigner, and had been married, in her own country, before she fell into his hands. Mild and pale she always was, pretty creature! lamenting the land she had left and the lover she had lost.

"It happened one day, as she sat by the well, that an old pilgrim came to the gate, asked for a draught of water, in God's name, and held out his pitcher for it. Her thoughts were far away, never fear, but she had a tender heart, and she raised the cover from the well, to fill his vessel. While she was doing this, the pilgrim pulled off his gown and his false beard, and who should he be but her own husband! She sprang off her seat towards him, and then, faint with joy and pale as death, she sank back into the oaken chair on which she had been sitting as the guardian of the well. A bird never flew through the air faster than he towards her. He seated himself beside her in the chair, held her lovingly in his arms, kissed her cheeks and lips twenty times over, called her all manner of fond names, and sprinkled her with water until the fresh colour came again into her face, and the warm life into her heart.

"All this time the well was left uncovered, and the waters rose—rose—rose, until they surrounded the Castle. Higher and higher did they rise, until, at last, down fell the gates, and then the stream rushed in, drowning every living soul within the place, and settling down into the very lake that we sit by now.

"The moral of the story is, that the lady and the pilgrim escaped—for the oaken chair supported them and floated them until they safely put their feet on dry land. All the rest perished, because they had willingly consented to live in sin with the giant; but this one lady had been kept there entirely against her will. The two thanked God for their escape, and returned to their own country, where they lived long and happily. It had been the giant's pride to put all his best jewels on whoever kept watch over the well, in order that all who passed by might notice them, and pay respect to his wealth. As this lady had them all upon her when the Castle was swallowed up, she and her husband had money enough, out of the sale of them, to keep them in a very genteel way of life at home. Some people say that, at times, the walls of the drowned Castle can be seen through the waters of the lake—but I won't swear to the fact, as I never noticed it myself."

AN HEIRESS FOR A SIXPENCE!

A BEAUTIFUL young heiress had become so disgusted with the flattering set of soft-pated, pomatum-haired, moustache-lipped, strongly perfumed suitors for her hand, that she shut herself from the fashionable (?) world—turned all her property into money—deposited it all in banks—donned a cheap wardrobe—put on a mask, and she went, pedestrian-like, through the city in which she had hitherto moved with so much display and magnificence. She asked alms of those who of late had knelt at her feet, and sued for her hand. They knew her not, and, casting a look of scorn upon her veiled face, and coarse wardrobe, bade her "begone!" She entered the country—here she met with derision and scorn. A few kind-hearted people, it is true, bestowed aid; but these were of the poorer class, who had hard work to procure their own daily bread; but they could not turn a fellow-creature hungry from their door, and therefore gave a small pittance from their scanty store.

One summer's day a large company met on — Beach. They were mostly from the city. The disguised heiress, from some cause or other, had wandered there. She asked alms of one or two, termed "upper tens." They spake tauntingly, but gave nothing. What they had said had been heard by quite a number of their company. Most of them laughed, or looked as if they thought it "served her right!" The beggar woman turned about, and was walking sadly away, when a well-looking gentleman stepped forward, and, catching hold of her arm, thus spoke:

"Stay, my good woman! Tell me what you want?"

She replied in a low, trembling tone:

"I want a sixpence—only a sixpence!"

The gentleman drew forth a sixpence, and gave it to the strange being beside him.

The mask dropped from the face of the female, and the beautiful heiress was portrayed before the astonished gentleman.

That they were afterwards married, the reader has already imagined—for the heiress used this means of procuring a worthy husband; and the generous gentleman had long been looking for "an angel in disguise."

The happy husband is often heard to say, that he got an "heiress for a sixpence!"

FARMER'S WEATHER-OMETER.

BY A RURALIST.

A rainbow in the morning
Is the shepherd's warning,
But a rainbow at night
Is the shepherd's delight.

A rainbow in fair weather denotes foul: if foul, fair weather will follow. A double rainbow indicates much rain.

A predominance of the purple colour on the rainbow, shows wind and rain; dark red, tempest; light red, wind; yellow, dry weather; green, rain; blue denotes that the air is clearing.

If the Aurora Borealis appears after several warm days, it is generally succeeded by a cloudiness of the air. If the Aurora Borealis has been considerable, either an increased degree of cold is immediately produced, or bodies of clouds are immediately formed.

If in a very wet season, the sky is tinged with a sea-green colour, near the bottom, where it ought to be blue, it shows that rain will speedily follow, and increase; when it is of a deep, dead blue, it is overcharged with vapours, and the weather will be showery.

When the sun appears white at the setting, or goes down into a bank of clouds, which lie in the horizon, they indicate the approach or continuance of bad weather.

When it rains with an east wind, it will probably continue twenty-four hours.

The harvest rains, when of long continuance, generally begin with the wind blowing easterly—which gradually veers round to the south—and the rains do not cease until the wind has got to the west, or a little north-west.

While rain is falling, if any small space of the sky is visible, it is almost a certain sign that the rain will speedily cease.

If the clouds that move with the wind become stationary when they arrive at the part of the horizon which is opposite to the wind, and appear to accumulate, they announce a speedy fall of rain.

A frequent change of wind, with an agitation of the clouds, denotes a sudden storm.

A fresh breeze generally springs up before sunset, particularly in the summer.

The weather usually clears up at noon—but if it rains at midnight, it seldom clears till sunset.

The winds which begin to blow in the day-time are much stronger, and endure longer, than those which begin to blow only in the night.

A hollow or whistling wind denotes rain.

If the wind follow the course of the sun, air weather will follow.

Weather, either good or bad, which takes place in the night time, is not generally of long duration—and, for the most part, wind is more uncommon in the night than in the day-time. Fine weather in the night, with scattering clouds, does not last.

Violent winds prevail more in the vicinity of mountains than in open plains.

A Venetian author says, "A sudden storm from the north does not last three days."

If it thunders in December, moderate and fine weather may be expected.

If it thunders at intervals in the spring season, before the trees have acquired leaves, cold weather is still to be expected.

Thunder in the morning denotes wind at noon; in the evening, rain and tempest.

If in summer there is no thunder, the ensuing fall and winter will be sickly.

LENDING AND BORROWING MONEY.

NEVER lend money to a friend, unless you are satisfied that he does wisely and well in borrowing it. Borrowing is one of the most ordinary ways in which weak men sacrifice the future to the present—and thence it is that the gratitude for a loan is so proverbially evanescent; for the future, becoming present in its turn, will not be well pleased with those who have assisted in doing it an injury. By conspiring with your friend to defraud his future self, you naturally incur his future displeasure. Take to heart, therefore, the admonition of the ancient courtier:

Neither a borrower nor a lender be;
For loan oft loseth both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.

To withstand solicitations for loans is often a great trial of firmness; the more especially as the pleas and pretexts alleged are generally made plausible at the expense of truth; for nothing breaks down a man's truthfulness more surely than pecuniary embarrassment.

An unthrift is a liar from all time;
Never was a debtor that was not deceiver.

The refusal which is at once the most safe from vacillation, and perhaps as little apt to give offence as any, is the point blank refusal, without reasons assigned. Acquiescence is more easily given in the decisions of a strong will than in reasons which weak men, under the bias of self-love, will always imagine themselves competent to controvert.

Some men will lend money to a friend in order, as it were, to purchase a right of remonstrance; but the right so purchased is worth nothing. You may buy the man's ears, but not his heart or his understanding.

I have never known a debtor or a prodigal who was not, in his own estimation, an injured man; and I have generally found that those who had not suffered by them were disposed to side with them; for it is the weak who make an outcry, and it is by the outcry that the world is wont to judge. They who lend money to spendthrifts should be prepared, therefore, to suffer in their reputation as well as in their purse. Let us learn from the son of Sirach:

"Many, when a thing was lent them, reckoned it to be found, and put them to trouble that helped them. Till he hath received he will kiss a man's hand; and for his neighbour's money he will speak submissively; but when he should repay, he will prolong the time, and return words of grief, and complain of the time. If he prevail, he shall hardly receive the half, and he will count as if he had found it; if not, he hath deprived him of his money, and he hath gotten him an enemy without cause: he payeth him with cursing and railing, and for honour he will pay him with disgrace."

It is a common reproach with which mankind assails mankind, that those who fall into poverty are forsaken by their friends.

Ay, quoth Jaques,
Sweep on, you fat and greasy citizens;
'Tis just the fashion: wherefore do you look
Upon that poor and broken bankrupt there?

But before the friends of the poor be condemned, it would be well to inquire whether their poverty be honestly come by; and I believe it would very rarely be found that a person in a fair condition of life is allowed to sink unassisted into extreme indigence, without some serious fault or offence; and the person having so sunk, it will be found to be still more rarely the case that the pressure of poverty is not too strong for his character. It is when the character has given way, that poverty is deserted; for pity and affection divorced from respect, lose the main element of their strength and permanency.

The ordinary course of things, then, is as follows:

A. becoming embarrassed, through some—perhaps venial—imprudence, is kindly assisted by his friends, B., C., and D.; who, however, do not altogether approve his conduct, but think it would be ungenerous in them, under the protection of the favours they are conferring, to assail him with reproaches. So far all goes smoothly between A. on the one hand, and B., C., and D. on the other. But A., having, by the loans he has received, staved off any immediate consequences of his imprudence, is under a rather stronger temptation than before to forego the severe self-denial which would set him right again. He has now broken the ice in the matter of asking favours: he has incurred whatever humiliation belongs to it; and having begged once, it costs him comparatively little to beg again. This process of begging and borrowing goes on, therefore, becoming continually more frequent and less efficacious; and as the borrower grows less and less scrupulous, he nourishes his pride—the ordinary refuge of those who lose their independence—and resents every repulse as an insult. B., C., and D. then discover that they are not to be thanked for what they have lent, but rather reproached for not lending more and more: whereupon they withdraw their friendship; and those who ignorantly look on, or perhaps hear the story of A., whilst B., C., and D. are silent, out of consideration for him, make remarks on inconstancy in friendship, and the manner in which men are forsaken in their adversity and distress.

The desertion by friends, however well-merited, leads the embarrassed man to consider himself as a castaway, and throw himself into still more reckless and shameless courses; and on the part of men in this condition there is sometimes seen a perfect infatuation of extravagance, which seems to proceed from the delusions of a disordered mind and a sort of fascination in ruin.

INTERESTING DISCOVERY AT JERUSALEM.

THE following, from a letter dated Jerusalem, May 16, 1853, has been sent by Mr. James Cook Richmond, for publication. "I was spending a couple of days in Artas, the hortusclusus of the monks, and probably the 'garden inclosed' of the Canticles, when I was told there was a kind of tunnel under the Pool of Solomon. I went and found one of the most interesting things that I have seen in my travels, and of which no one in Jerusalem appears to have heard. I mentioned it to the British Consul, who takes great interest in these matters, and to the Rev. Mr. Nicolayson, who has been here more than twenty years, and they have never heard of it. At the centre of the eastern side of the lowest of the three pools, there is an entrance nearly closed up; then follows a vaulted passage some 50 feet long, leading to a chamber about 15 feet square and 8 feet high, also vaulted; and from this there is a passage, also arched, under the pool, and intended to convey the water of a spring, or of the pool itself, into the aqueduct which leads to Jerusalem, and is now commonly attributed to Pontius Pilate. This arched passage is six feet high, and three or four feet wide. Each of the two other pools has a similar arched way, which has not been blocked up, and one of which I saw by descending first into the rectangular well. The great point of interest in this discovery is this. It has now been thought for some years that the opinion of the invention of the arch by the Romans has been too hastily adopted. The usual period assigned to the arch is about B.C. 600. We thought we discovered a contradiction of this idea in Egypt, but the present case is far more satisfactory. The whole of the long passage of 50 feet, the chamber 15 feet square, the two doors, and the passage under the pools in each case are true 'Roman' arches, with a perfect key-stone. Now, as it has never been seriously doubted that Solomon built the pools ascribed to him, and to which he probably refers in Ecclesiastes ii. 6, the arch must of course have been well known, about or before the time of the building of the first temple, B.C. 1012. The 'sealed fountain,' which is near, has the same arch in several places; but this might have been Roman. But here the arched ways pass probably the whole distance under the pools, and are therefore at least coeval with them, or were rather built before them, in order to convey the water down the valley, 'to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees.' What I saw convinced me, at least, that the perfect key-stone Roman arch was in familiar use in the time of Solomon, or 1000 years before the Christian era."
